I am particularly indebted to the late Mr. James Laichas of Glendale, California, who reviewed a number of chapters and made significant contributions to the text based on his very broad experience. Mr. Kenneth Dzien, Pasadena, California, also provided numerous insights, also based on his decades of experience. My special thanks go to my son, Mr. John F. Nielsen, a title insurance attorney in the Minneapolis area, for serving as editor and proofreader for one entire summer and his helpful commentary in the years since; and Mr. Ronald Antoine, for his friendship, mentoring and steady support. Finally, and most importantly, I thank my wife Sarah for her encouragement and support throughout this project, which has spanned more than twenty-five years. I am sorry I forgot to tell you when I started that this book would never be completed this side of the River Jordan.

I thank American Land Title Association for agreeing in 2013 to assume the publication of this book, as well as its monthly companion, The Title Insurance Law Newsletter. I offer many thanks to ALTA's officers and staff for their considerable effort in accomplishing this smooth transition. I especially thank former Chief Executive Officer Michelle L. Korsmo for making the decision to offer this publication through ALTA, to Legislative & Regulatory Counsel Steve Gottheim for making it happen, and to Kelly Romeo and everyone else who worked so hard on this project.

Introduction

This treatise is intended as a guide for the resolution of disputes about title insurance policies, real estate escrows and closings, and related issues involving title insurers, title agents, approved attorneys and escrowees. It is intended for claim administrators, retained counsel, insurance underwriters and others who deal with title claims and coverage disputes. The commentary is intended to be practical rather than academic. The goal is to give guidance on commonly-encountered issues, whether or not they have been addressed by the courts. This work is limited in scope. It is not intended as an all-encompassing treatise on the land title industry.

The book is organized to follow the decision-making process used by claims counsel or claim administrators. The first chapter provides decision trees and addresses essential issues about claim handling. Chapter 2 addressed more claim administration issues. Chapters 3 and 4 cover the resolution of covered claims and defense of the insured, which are the two primary means by which claims are resolved. Chapter 5 is on recoupment and subrogation rights. Chapter 6 concerns the title insurance commitment. Chapters 7 through 12 discuss the terms of the title insurance policy. Chapters 13 through 17 discuss non-policy liability (escrows, closing protection letters, title searches and tort liability on insurance policies) and issues concerning title agents and approved attorneys.

The claims practices suggested by this treatise indicate general rules or practices only. Every claim situation is different, and state laws regarding claim settlement practices vary significantly. The approaches suggested in this volume are not appropriate or correct in all cases. In fact, some of the rules and practices described are not appropriate in some jurisdictions, as the book explains wherever possible. The book also does not attempt to describe every possible decision or position that might be appropriate in a particular case. Therefore, any use of words such as "should," "must," "shall," "will" or the like, in describing an insurer's duties or options, is strictly for brevity's sake rather than to state a mandate imposed by policy terms, statutes, regulations or the courts.

The views expressed in this book are those of the author, and are not the official views of the American Land Title Association or any of its members. This book also does not represent the uniform custom and practice in the title insurance industry in the administration of claims, or any insurer's internal claim standards or practices. This work is not sanctioned, sponsored or approved by any title insurer.

However, the practices and views expressed herein are not mere opinions developed in a vacuum. I have resolved thousands of claims and title disputes for more than 38 years. I was employed by title insurers for 16 years and received superlative training from my supervisors and peers. The handling of title disputes remains my nearly-exclusive employment as a practicing lawyer, and I continue to receive information and insights from title industry members from all regions of the United States. This book is intended to impart the wisdom that I have received, in addition to my own analysis of cases, statutes and regulations. I believe it is the combination of practical knowledge with scholarship that has made this book useful since it was first published in 1996.

Finally, the analysis in this book reflects my belief that most cases on this subject can be reconciled to indicate a level of consistency in the interpretation of the policy language. Where there is a split of authority that the courts themselves recognize or which is obvious, the book explains the differing positions. Throughout the book, my goal is to present an honest and objective explanation of the subject and the decisions, and not to suggest what the law should now be or how it should evolve.

1 Decision Trees and Forms

1.1 Decision Trees

The decision trees below provide a method by which a claim administrator may assess the insurer's rights and duties in responding to a claim. They also suggest the more common options available to the insurer when resolving a claim. The decision trees and checklists cover most situations.

1.1.1 Tender Of Defense--General

The following two decision trees are for use with tenders of defense.

1.1.2 Tender Of Defense--Deciding Whether To Accept Or Reject

Consider the following issues in determining whether or not the insurer has a duty to accept a proffered defense of an action.

Has a policy been issued, or paid for and the commitment requirements met?	See §2.3.4 regarding proof that policy has been issued and §6.4 regarding commitment requirements and cancellation.
Is the claimant an insured or a party entitled to a defense?	See Chapter 7 regarding the definition of insured.
What standard is applicable to the scope of the duty to defend?	See Chapter 4 regarding the "four corners of the complaint" rule versus the "allegations of the complaint plus extrinsic facts" rule.
Does the lawsuit allege a matter involving the land insured?	See Chapter 8 regarding the definition of Land.
Does the pleading contain an allegation which creates the potential for coverage?	See Chapter 9 regarding covered title risks. See Chapter 4 regarding the duty to defend.
Is the matter excluded?	See Chapter 11 regarding policy exclusions.
Has the insured prejudiced the right to a defense by delay or otherwise?	See §2.3.3 regarding prejudice because of tardy notice.
Is the matter excepted?	See Chapter 12 regarding "standard" exceptions, including §12.7 as to "special" exceptions.

If it appears that there is a duty to defend, proceed to §1.1.3 Tender Of Defense--Options On Acceptance.

1.1.3 Tender Of Defense--Options On Acceptance

The following are the most common options when the insurer accepts a tendered defense:

Accept full defense without limitation	See Chapter 9 regarding defense of the insured.
Accept defense of covered counts only	See §4.7 regarding provision of a limited defense.
Accept defense with reservation of rights	See §4.9 regarding reservations of rights. As discussed therein, the insurer must further decide whether or not it elects or is required to accept the insured's choice of counsel, if any.
Accept or deny, and bring declaratory action	See §4.14 regarding declaratory judgment actions.

See the full discussion of the duty to defend at the above-referenced sections, and the forms and letters referenced within those sections.

1.1.4 Claim Of Loss Decision Tree 1--General

The following decision tree is for use with claims of loss. Under the method contemplated by these decision trees and the letters on the Forms CD-ROM, the following will be the ordinary course of a claim of loss:

1. Knowledge of claim
2. Acknowledgment of claim and delivery of claim notice form
3. Investigation of claim by insurer
4. Proof of loss by insured
5. Analysis of claim by letter, if not covered, or resolution of claim, if covered
6. Response, if any, by insured to claim analysis
7. Reply of insurer and acceptance of claim if warranted
8. If no response by insured, notice by insurer that it will close file

1.1.5 Claim Of Loss Decision Tree 2--Basis For Coverage

Consider the following issues in evaluating a claim of loss. Any one of the following issues may be a proper basis on which to deny a claim.

Has a policy been issued, or the premium paid and the commitment requirements met?	See §2.3.4 regarding proof that policy has been issued and §6.4 regarding commitment requirements and commitment cancellation.
Is the claimant an insured?	See Chapter 7 regarding the definition of insured.
Does the claim involve the land insured?	See Chapter 8 regarding the definition of Land.
Does the claim involve a covered title risk?	See Chapter 9 regarding covered title risks.
Is the matter excluded?	See Chapter 11 regarding policy exclusions.
Has the insured prejudiced rights by delay or otherwise?	See §2.3.3 regarding prejudice because of tardy notice.
Is the matter excepted?	See Chapter 12 regarding "standard" exceptions, including §12.7 as to exceptions specific to the insured title chain ("special" exceptions).

If it appears that the claim is covered, proceed to §1.1.6 Claim Of Loss Decision Tree 3--Resolving Covered Claims.

1.1.6 Claim Of Loss Decision Tree 3--Resolving Covered Claims

If a claim of loss is covered by the policy, the insurer will normally pursue one or more of the following options:

Pay policy limits	See §3.5 regarding this option.
Pay loss of less than policy limits	See §1.1.7 Paying Partial Loss decision tree.
Pay off a third party claimant	See §3.6 regarding this option.
Bring an action to clear title	See §3.4, discussing the right to clear title.
Get an easement or other instrument that will correct title	See §3.7 as to this option.
Pay the insured the salvage value of the real estate or mortgage	See §5.11 regarding the insurer's right of salvage.
Arbitrate with the insured as to liability, and/or damages	Arbitration is addressed at §2.10.

1.1.7 Paying Partial Loss

The following list gives the most common factors which go into deciding how to value a partial loss of land:

Review proof of loss	See §2.7 regarding proofs of loss.
Appraisal	Appraisal is one of two common methods of setting value. Appraisals and appraisal method are discussed at §3.2.3.6.
Mathematical formula	The second common means of valuing a partial loss is by use of a mathematical formula explained beginning at §3.2.3.5.
Does the coinsurance provision apply?	The coinsurance provision of the 1992 ALTA Owner's policy reduces the loss paid if the property is underinsured, is discussed at §3.2.3.3.
Should the parties arbitrate the amount of loss?	Arbitration is addressed at §2.10.

1.2 Using Included Sample Claim Forms

Sample claim letters, notices and other forms are printed in Appendix A and included in electronic format with the electronic version of this book. The Appendix A Forms are numbered. The electronic file names correspond to those numbers. Relevant Appendix A Forms are noted at the beginning of certain sections of the book. The use of these documents permits a claim administrator to further automate the claim handling process.

Appendix B contains ALTA and other policy forms. Those forms are also included in electronic format with the electronic version of this book.

2 Claim Administration

This chapter is intended as a guide to procedures and deadlines in responding to claims, the claim investigation, the insured's notice of claim and proof of loss, the effect of a tardy claim notice or a voluntary settlement of the claim, payment of loss, arbitration, and claim denials. The reader should also consult Chapter 1, which includes claim analysis decision trees and checklists, and instructions on use of the letters found in Appendix A.

The reader should take care to be familiar with applicable state insurance statutes or regulations. A number of states impose duties and standards regarding the subjects discussed in this chapter. This treatise does not attempt to annotate each state's regulations on the subjects discussed.

2.1 Unfair Claims Practice Acts

A number of states have adopted variants of the National Association of Insurance Commissioners' model Unfair Claims Practice Act (UCPA), deceptive trade practices acts, or similar statutes.[1] These statutes identify certain insurance claim handling practices that are prohibited by

Sections 3 and 4 of the UCPA list a number of prohibited acts:

Section 3. Unfair Claims Settlement Practices Prohibited
It is an improper claims practice for any domestic, foreign, or alien insurer transacting business in this State to commit any act defined in Section 4 of this Act if:

A. It is committed flagrantly and in conscious disregard of this Act or any rules promulgated hereunder; or

B. It has been committed with such frequency to indicate a general business practice to engage in that type of conduct.

Section 4. Unfair Claims Practices Defined
Any of the following acts by an insurer, if committed in violation of Section 3, constitutes an unfair claims practice:

A. Knowingly misrepresenting to claimants and insureds relevant facts or policy provisions relating to coverages at issue;

B. Failing to acknowledge with reasonable promptness pertinent communications with respect to claims arising under its policies;

C. Failing to adopt and implement reasonable standards for the prompt investigation and settlement of claims arising under its policies;

D. Not attempting in good faith to effectuate prompt, fair and equitable settlement of claims submitted in which liability has become reasonably clear;

E. Compelling insureds or beneficiaries to institute suits to recover amounts due under its policies by offering substantially less than the amounts ultimately recovered in suits brought by them;

F. Refusing to pay claims without conducting a reasonable investigation;

G. Failing to affirm or deny coverage of claims within a reasonable time after having completed its investigation related to such claim or claims;

H. Attempting to settle or settling claims for less than the amount to which a reasonable person would believe the insured or beneficiary was entitled by reference to written or printed advertising material accompanying or made part of an application;

I. Attempting to settle or settling claims on the basis of an application that was materially altered without notice to, or knowledge or consent of, the insured;

J. Making claims payments to an insured or beneficiary without indicating the

The book covers all of the model acts promulgated by the NAIC, including the Property and Casualty Insurance Policy Simplification Model Act, Unfair Claims Practices Model Act, and the Unfair Trade Practices Model Act. It also gives good detail regarding the state variants of these model acts. This is a particularly handy reference for the person who must administer claims in more than one state.

coverage under which each payment is being made;

K. Unreasonably delaying the investigation or payment of claims by requiring both a formal proof of loss form and subsequent verification that would result in duplication of information and verification appearing in the formal proof of loss form;

L. Failing in the case of claims denials or offers of compromise settlement to promptly provide a reasonable and accurate explanation of the basis for such actions;

M. Failing to provide forms necessary to present claims within fifteen (15) calendar days of a request with reasonable explanations regarding their use;

N. Failing to adopt and implement reasonable standards to assure that the repairs of a repairer owned by or required to be used by the insurer are performed in a workmanlike manner.

2.1.1 Regulations Promulgated Under UCPA--California

In 1977, the NAIC promulgated a set of regulations that correspond to the UCPA. The state of California adopted regulations on December 15, 1992 that are similar to the NAIC model regulations. The California regulations are found at Subchapter 7.5 of the California Administrative Code (§§ 2695.1-.17). Because of the high level of oversight created by the California regulations, the standards imposed by those regulations are referenced in this chapter. The NAIC model regulations are also noted. The reader should be familiar with the regulations in effect in the jurisdiction applicable to a claim.

2.1.2 Torts Based On Deceptive Trade Or Claims Practice Act

Claims practice and deceptive trade practice statutes have been applied to title insurers in several contexts other than as standards for claim administration. The Texas Deceptive Trade Practices Act, for example, has been the basis for an insurer's liability in tort for having failed to except an encumbrance on title, as discussed at §15.8. Also, compliance or lack thereof with an unfair claims practice act is sometimes considered evidence that an insurer acted in good or bad faith, in the context of a first-party bad faith suit, as discussed at §16.1.3.[2] Finally, some states have adopted insurance claim practice, vexatious refusal to pay or bad faith statutes that prescribe penalties for improper claim practices, as discussed at §16.1.3. Unfair claims practices acts may or may not support private causes of action, depending on the jurisdiction.[3] However, a court will sometimes permit the introduction of the practices described in such an act as evidence that the insurer acted in good faith or failed to do so. Most states do not consider an insurer to have a fiduciary duty toward the insured, as is discussed at §9.1.3.1.

2.1.3 Complaint To Insurance Department Based On Claim Denial

All or most state insurance departments have the statutory authority to investigate a complaint by an insured that an insurer has acted without justification in denying a claim for indemnity or tender of defense in litigation, and to sanction an insurer if state law or regulations are violated in the handling of a claim or by a pattern or practice in the insurer's claim administration. When an insured submits a complaint to the insurance department based on a claim denial or other claimed violation of state law, the insurance department typically asks the insurer to respond to the complaint by explaining its decision. The insurer typically has a specific and rather short period of time in which to respond.

Title insurers treat any complaint to or inquiry from an insurance department as an important matter. A title insurer responds to the insurance department within the allotted time and by giving a full explanation of its actions and the bases therefor. It is not uncommon for an insured to use the complaint process as a means of applying pressure on the insurer to reconsider its coverage determination. A reconsideration is always appropriate if the insured presents new facts or information suggesting that the coverage decision was incorrect or fairly debatable. However, absent such additional information, the insurer typically responds to the complaint by reiterating its original coverage position, sometimes with further elaboration for the benefit of the insurance department personnel. The insurer will sometimes further explain the status of the claim, especially if litigation has been brought by either party about the claim.

An insurance department may bring an administrative action against a title insurer if its handling of one or more claims is deemed by the department to violate state law. However, the filing of a complaint with the insurance department is not an administrative action by the department, or evidence that such an action is imminent.[4]

2.2 Claim File Retention And Documentation

Some states impose standards as to the number of years a claim file must be retained and preserved after a claim is resolved. In California, for example, the insurer must retain claim files for the preceding four years.[5] Another common requirement is that the insurer document all communication between its representatives and the insured. The NAIC Model Regulations require that claim records be available for inspection by a member of the insurance department, and that they "contain all notes and work papers pertaining to the claim in such detail that pertinent events and the dates of such events can be reconstructed."[6] California requires that the claim file contain all:

[4] In WFG Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. Peniel Holdings, LLC, 2016 WL 7117252 (N.D.Tex.) (unpublished), the court held that the fact that the insured had filed a complaint with the state insurance department over the insurer's refusal to pay a claim did not compel a federal court to abstain from ruling in the insurer's declaratory judgment action, under the notion that there was a pending administrative action before the state department. The court ruled that the complaint was not an administrative action, and its filing did not suggest that the insurance department was about to bring such an action.

[5] California Code of Regulations, Title 10, Chapter 5, Subchapter 7.5, § 2695.3.

[6] Section 4, Model Regulations (1977).

> documents, notes and work papers (including copies of all correspondence) which reasonably pertain to each claim in such detail that pertinent events and the dates of the events can be reconstructed and the licensee's actions pertaining to the claim can be determined... .[7]

To accomplish the above purpose, the state may obligate the insurer to mark each communication with the insured with the date on which it was sent or received.[8]

2.3 Notice Of Claim

FORM 58, Appendix A
Notice of claim form

The policy states that the insured is to give the insurer prompt, written notice of a claim. Conditions 3 and 18 of the 2006 ALTA policies state:

> 3. NOTICE OF CLAIM TO BE GIVEN BY INSURED CLAIMANT
> The Insured shall notify the Company promptly in writing (i) in case of any litigation as set forth in Section 5(a) of these Conditions, (ii) in case Knowledge shall come to an Insured hereunder of any claim of title or interest that is adverse to the Title, as insured, and that might cause loss or damage for which the Company may be liable by virtue of this policy, or (iii) if the Title, as insured, is rejected as Unmarketable Title. If the Company is prejudiced by the failure of the Insured Claimant to provide prompt notice, the Company's liability to the Insured Claimant under the policy shall be reduced to the extent of the prejudice.
> 18. NOTICES, WHERE SENT
> Any notice of claim and any other notice or statement in writing required to be given to the Company under this policy must be given to the Company at [address].

The policy's notice provision has been found to be unambiguous and enforceable.[9] Despite the policy's clear requirement of notice to the company at the specified address, however, some state laws broaden the definition of notice of claim. In California, a "notice of claim" is defined as follows:

[7] California Code of Regulations, Title 10, Chapter 5, Subchapter 7.5, § 2695.3(a).

[8] California Code of Regulations, Title 10, Chapter 5, Subchapter 7.5, § 2695.3(b)(2).

[9] In Lurie v. Commonwealth Land Title Co., LLC, 558 S.W.3d 583 (Mo.App.E.D. 2018), the insured argued that the notice provision in the 1992 ALTA owner's policy was "vague, undefined, and unenforceable." The court disagreed, saying that "policy conditions requiring the insured immediately to notify the insurance company of a claim and forward all legal documents to the insurer are valid, enforceable, binding, and of vital importance to the insurer." The court said that the ALTA notice provision "uses direct and clear language and 'prompt' is defined in the case law." The court took its definition of the word "prompt" from Missouri decisions construing policies under other lines of insurance.

> a verbal or written communication or communications by a claimant to an insurer or its claims agent that reasonably appraises the insurer of the following:
> (A) the date, time and place of the loss;
>
> (B) the name and address of the claimant and any other person(s) known by the claimant to be involved in the loss;
>
> (C) the name and address of the insured under the insurance policy in question; and
> (D) the insurance policy number, if known by the claimant... .[10]

However, the California regulations permit the insurer to require written notice of claim if the policy so states.[11]

2.3.1 Notice To Agent

State law controls on the issue of whether delivery of a claim notice to a policy-issuing agent is adequate notice of a claim. The court may apply general insurance or agency law to find that such notice is or is not an adequate substitute for the policy's requirement of written notice delivered directly to the insurer at the address stated in the policy.[12] In California, notice to a title agent (termed an "underwritten title company") is addressed by regulation specific to the title insurance industry:

> If a notification of a claim against the policy of title insurance is given to an underwritten title company which participated in the issuance of that policy of title insurance, then the insurer which issued that policy shall be under the duty to ensure that such underwritten title company immediately forward such claim to the insurer

[12] See The Security Title Guar. Corp. of Baltimore v. GMFS, LLC, 910 So.2d 787 (Ala.Civ.App. 2005), in which a statute stating that knowledge of an agent is imputed to the principal gave effect to a notice of claim that was delivered to the agent only, to excuse the insured's failure to deliver a tender of defense to the insurer until after the insured mortgage had been extinguished by a foreclosure and sale. In Gibbs v. Williams, 2015 WL 5440628 (W.D.Wis. 2015) (unpublished), the court found that an attorney did not commit malpractice by failing to submit a tender of defense to the insurer because a Wisconsin statute says that notice to an insurance agent is deemed to be notice to the insurer. See Wis.Stat. §631.09. Similarly, in Purcell v. Land Title Guarantee Co., 94 Mo.App. 5, 67 S.W. 726 (1902), when an agent told the insured to ignore a mortgage and that the claim would be handled, the insured was justified in assuming that he had given sufficient claim notice. See also Worthey v. Sedillo Title Guar., Inc., 85 N.M. 339, 512 P.2d 667 (1973); New Jersey Dep't of Environmental Protection v. DiFlorio, 2007 WL 4553046 (N.J.Super.A.D.) (unpublished) (notice to agent only, and only orally rather than in writing, was not sufficient under state law or the terms of the policy); *Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. > responsible for the issued policy. The underwriting agreement between the insurer and underwritten title company shall provide for the duty of the underwritten title company to immediately forward such claim to the insurer.[13]

An insured sometimes seeks to overcome the prejudicial effect of his or her tardy notice of claim or tender of defense by asserting that he or she gave prompt notice to the policy-issuing agent. See §17.6 for a discussion of an agent's duties when it receives a notice of claim or tender of defense from the insured. The effect of an insured's submission of a tardy claim notice or tender of defense is discussed at §2.3.3.

2.3.2 Notice Of Claim Affecting More Than One Insured

Sometimes, the insurer receives notice of a title matter that affects more than one parcel or interest, and thus has the potential to affect more than one insured. For example, a construction lien or easement may affect several subdivision lots or condominium units.

An insured sometimes seeks to overcome the prejudicial effect of his or her tardy notice of claim or tender of defense by asserting that another insured put the insurer on notice. The effect of an insured's submission of a tardy claim notice or tender of defense is discussed at §2.3.3. An insured should not succeed in asserting that notice by a commonly-situated insured has excused the insured from giving separate notice of the claim to the insurer, for the reasons stated in §4.3 concerning tenders of defense. One important such reason is that a title insurer does not have a database of current insureds and their addresses, since title insurance policies can remain in effect for many years and no renewal premiums are paid. It would be extremely time-consuming for a title insurer to determine from public records whether or not any other policies it had issued that might be affected are still in force. In fact, only the insured has accurate information on policy termination, since the policy can be terminated by partnership dissolution, a person's death, corporation dissolution, stock transfer and other events that cannot be detected by a search of real estate records. See §7.8 regarding the termination of owner's policies.

If the insurer has actual knowledge that other insureds are affected, however, the insurer may wish to contact those insureds and ask what, if anything, the insureds want the insurer to do. The insurer should not assume that all insureds having the same title defect have the same policy coverage or loss. Thus, if the insurer contacts other insureds, the claim administrator may wish to request that they submit notices of claim and proofs of loss.

2.3.3 Prejudice Caused By Late Notice

FORM 91, Appendix A
Prejudice by tardy notice of claim

The policy states that the insurer's duties are terminated to the extent that the insurer is prejudiced by the insured's failure to give timely notice of a claim for indemnity. Condition 3 of the 2006 ALTA policies states that the insured shall give prompt notice of a claim, and that:

> If the Company is prejudiced by the failure of the Insured Claimant to provide prompt notice, the Company's liability to the Insured Claimant under the policy shall be reduced to the extent of the prejudice.

This provision corresponded to Conditions & Stipulations 3 of the 1992 ALTA policies. The 1992 ALTA policies and some other versions also contained provisions concerning tardy submission of a proof of loss. See §2.7 for a discussion of the proof of loss. The 2006 ALTA policies do not contain a corresponding provision concerning tardy submission of a proof of loss. The notice provision has been found not to be ambiguous.[14]

See below, this section, for a discussion of cases concerning a tardy tender of defense by the insured. An insured who tenders his or her defense to the insurer also has an obligation to cooperate with the insurer in the defense of the case, which includes a duty to act promptly. The cooperation duty in the defense of the insured in litigation is discussed at §4.10. The insured's duty to cooperate in the clearing of title is discussed at §3.4.1.2.

An insurer cannot have breached a duty to indemnify an insured when the insured has not submitted a claim notice and the insurer has not been given the opportunity to investigate the claim and make a coverage decision. Thus, an insured's lawsuit for breach of a duty to indemnify the insured is premature and not ripe unless the insured can allege that it has submitted a claim notice and the insurer has denied the claim.[15] One court found that the insured's delivery of a claim notice and proof of loss was not a condition precedent to policy coverage, but rather that the tardy notice limited the insured's recovery to the extent that the tardiness prejudiced the insurer.[16]

[14] In Lurie v. Commonwealth Land Title Co., LLC, 558 S.W.3d 583 (Mo.App.E.D. 2018), the insured argued that the notice provision in the 1992 ALTA owner's policy was "vague, undefined, and unenforceable." The court disagreed, saying that "policy conditions requiring the insured immediately to notify the insurance company of a claim and forward all legal documents to the insurer are valid, enforceable, binding, and of vital importance to the insurer." The court said that the ALTA notice provision "uses direct and clear language and 'prompt' is defined in the case law." The court took its definition of the word "prompt" from Missouri decisions construing policies under other lines of insurance.

[15] See Lennen v. Marriott Ownership Resorts, Inc., ___ F.Supp.3d ___, 2019 WL 1440092 (M.D.Fla. 2019) (permanent citation not yet available), appeal filed August 21, 2019, in which the court said that the insureds "have not sufficiently alleged that their cause of action is ripe as Plaintiffs do not state whether they have made a claim under their policy." The court cited Yacht Club on the Intercoastal Condo. Ass'n v. Lexington Ins. Co., 509 F. App'x 919, 922–23 (11th Cir. (Fla.) 2013) for the rule that, in Florida, a claim for breach of an insurance contract is not ripe until a claim has been made and denied by the insurer.

[16] Commercial Credit Plan, Inc. v. Estate of Smith, 1998 WL 312855 (Tenn.App.) (unpublished).

When the insured gives the insurer late notice of a claim, tender of defense, or proof of loss, the issue is the resulting harm to the insurer. A court will typically balance the economic harm to the insurer caused by a tardy claim notice, such as the loss of its subrogation rights against others, versus the harm to the insured in losing its policy benefits because of its tardy claim notice.[17]

The insurer is prejudiced when the insured or its agent or attorney became aware of the claim issue at a time when the insurer could have taken action to protect the insured, but gave notice to the insurer after that time had passed.[18] However, the insurer must prove that the insured was aware of the title issue when it was still possible to protect the insured.[19] The insurer has not sustained its burden of proof when it does not adduce evidence of a loss of rights or benefits.[20] A mere lapse of time between discovery of the title problem and notice to the insurer does not establish a bar to recovery, because harm does not automatically result from passage of time.[21] The prejudicial effect of a tardy claim notice may be ameliorated by a separate, prompt notice to the insurer's agent, even if notice to an agent is not generally deemed to be compliance with the policy's terms.[22] Also, a court may find that an insurer was not harmed by the insured's tardy claim notice when the insurer caused the title defect or knew of it on date of policy, and thus could have taken action to protect against the title risk before receiving the claim notice.[23]

[17] See Costagliola v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 560 A.2d 1285 (N.J. Super. 1988), in which the court found that New Jersey law required proof of "appreciable harm" in order for late notice to bar the duty to pay an otherwise compensable defense cost.

[18] For example, in Emigrant Bank v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 2017 WL 4286335 (S.D.N.Y.) (unpublished), the insurer was harmed because the tardiness of the claim notice prevented it from defending the priority of the insured mortgage or recovering from the borrowers and others. The court imputed the knowledge of the insured lender's counsel to the insured in finding that the insured knew of the title issue at a time when prompt notice would have prevented the prejudice. In Lurie v. Commonwealth Land Title Co., LLC, 558 S.W.3d 583 (Mo.App.E.D. 2018), the court held that the insured lost the right to make his insurer pay for a title lawsuit when he gave notice to the insurer years after the lawsuit was filed and dismissed.

[19] In U.S. Bank, N.A. v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 2012 WL 2362456 (Mich.App.) (unpublished), the insured mortgage was extinguished by foreclosure of a prior condominium association lien that could have been resolved inexpensively by redemption. However, the court held that the insurer had not proven that the insured knew about the association lien before the redemption period expired, and thus did not establish the required prejudice.

[22] In The Security Title Guar. Corp. of Baltimore v. GMFS, LLC, 910 So.2d 787 (Ala.Civ.App. 2005), the insurer was found not to have been prejudiced by late notice when the insured gave notice to the title agent reasonably promptly. See §2.3.1 concerning notice of claim sent to a policy-issuing agent.

[23] In Dreibelbiss Title Co., Inc. v. MorEquity, Inc., 861 N.E.2d 1218 (Ind.App. 2007), when a title insurer paid off a home equity loan but failed to deliver the borrowers' "close my account" instruction, and the insured lender was wiped out by the equity lender's foreclosure, the insured lender's failure to either tender the foreclosure to the title company or to contest priority was found not to negate policy coverage. In U.S. Bank, N.A. v. Stewart Title Ins. Co., 37 A.D.3d 822,

The most common form of prejudice is the loss of the opportunity to assert a meritorious defense.[24] Prejudice occurs when the insured makes a tender after a default judgment has been taken against it or the lawsuit has been concluded, if the insurer could have asserted meritorious defenses on behalf of the insured.[25] Tender of defense after the lawsuit has been settled has been found to prejudice the insurer by depriving it of the opportunity to present any meritorious defenses.[26] A 832 N.Y.S.2d 223 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept. 2007), an insurer was found to have waived the defense of tardy notice when it was aware of the lien and had agreed to indemnify against it, albeit on the mistaken assumption that the debt had been paid. In Moe v. Transamerica Title Ins. Co., 21 Cal.App.3d 289, 98 Cal.Rptr. 547 (Cal.App. 1 Dist. 1971), the property was sold by a bankruptcy trustee free and clear of liens, including the insured deed of trust. The insurer had removed from its policy a reference to the already-pending bankruptcy and certain prior liens. The insured defended against the sale free and clear with some vigor, but without success. The court found that the insurer was not prejudiced by the insured's tardy claim notice because it was aware of the sale terms when it issued the policy.

(unpublished) (claim notice sent a year after a lawsuit was filed that did not refer to lawsuit or request a defense was not a tender of defense; tender made eight months later, after judgment was entered, was tardy and prejudicial, because several valid defenses had not been asserted, terminating coverage); U.S. Bank, N.A. v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2012 WL 1080876 (M.D.Fla.) (unpublished) (lender's tender one week before summary judgment was entered prevented insurer from asserting equitable subrogation, which would have reduced loss payable to lender; prejudice equal to amount of paid-off loan). In Huntington Nat'l Bank v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2012 WL 1890233 (Mich.App.) (unpublished), an insured lender was found to have terminated coverage as to two construction liens by tendering its defense in the lien foreclosure action 16 months after the suit was filed and, most importantly, three weeks after signing a stipulation admitting that the liens had priority over the insured mortgage. The court said the insurer need not prove that it could have succeeded in the litigation, but only that, bound by the stipulations, it faced "almost certain liability" and had "little opportunity to control the direction of the legal proceedings."

[25] In Washington Mutual Bank v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 2010 WL 135685 (Tex.App.-Corpus Christi) (unpublished), a lender voided its policy coverage because it prevented the title insurer from defending the deed of trust by sending its notice of claim four months after the insured deed of trust was extinguished in bankruptcy under an agreed judgment. In Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2008 WL 2595185 (E.D.Wis. 2008) (unpublished), the insured lender tendered after it had been wiped out in the foreclosure of a senior lien. The insurer established that it could have raised meritorious defenses, including equitable subrogation. The court found that the tardy tender negated coverage. It rejected the lender's argument that the insurer might still have settled with the competing lender: "… Countrywide argues that Stewart could have asserted the defenses despite the fact that by the time it learned of the action, a default judgment had already been entered in favor of Associated Bank. In Countrywide's view, "[t]he entry of judgment did not preclude Stewart from attempting to settle the title claim." … But of course, this makes no sense. Once judgment is entered against a party, it is too late to assert a defense, no matter how meritorious, unless the judgment is vacated and the case reopened. Countrywide attempted to do that here, but its motion to vacate the judgment was denied because it was unable to show excusable neglect. … Stewart was unable to assert either of the two potentially meritorious defenses to Associated Bank's claim of priority. The untimely notice resulted in 'a serious impairment of the insurer's ability to investigate, evaluate, or settle a claim.'" In Lurie v. Commonwealth Land Title Co., LLC, 558 S.W.3d 583 (Mo.App.E.D. 2018), the court held that the insured lost the right to make his insurer pay for a title lawsuit when he gave notice to the insurer years after the lawsuit was filed and dismissed.

[26] In Gayheart v. Midland Title Security, Inc., 2004-Ohio-2536, 2004 WL 1109525 (Ohio App. 5 Dist.) (unpublished), the proposed insured's deed was attacked as a forgery. The insured was sued, but failed to tender the action until it was resolved. The court found the commitment had expired, and that its requirement for a "proper deed" notice of claim made prior to the time the insured is sued is not a tender of defense, and the lack of a tender of defense after the litigation is commenced will typically prejudice the insurer.[27] An insurer may be prejudiced by a tardy tender that prevents the insurer from selecting defense counsel and supervising the litigation, which are its rights under the ALTA policy.[28]

The insurer is prejudiced when the insured gives notice to the insurer after it has already lost the ability to protect the title insured, or the delay in giving notice increases the cost of preserving the insured's rights.[29] For example, the insurer is prejudiced when an insured lender gives notice of a claim concerning a superior lien after the foreclosure of that lien has extinguished the insured mortgage.[30] An insured's tardy tender of its defense in litigation, or its failure to make a tender had not been met. It also found the tardy claim notice negated any duty to aid the insured: "[Gayheart's] present damages claim rings hollow when he proposes that Midland 'should have come to his rescue at the time of the settlement conference and/or paid his legal expenses in trying to get the matter resolved.' ... [I]t is difficult for a title insurer to come to the rescue when its alleged insured voluntarily intervenes in a prior action and no notice is provided to the insurer."

[28] In Lurie v. Commonwealth Land Title Co., LLC, 558 S.W.3d 583 (Mo.App.E.D. 2018), the court said the prejudice to the insurer was in the fact that "it was deprived of its specifically expressed contractual rights under the Policy to direct the litigation, pursue a settlement, and most importantly in this case, select the counsel of its choice." In Huntington Nat'l Bank v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2012 WL 1890233 (Mich.App.) (unpublished), an insured lender was found to have terminated coverage by tendering its defense 16 months after suit was filed and after signing a stipulation admitting the priority of competing liens over the insured mortgage. The court said the insurer proved prejudice by showing that it was bound by the stipulations and faced "almost certain liability," and that it had "little opportunity to control the direction of the legal proceedings."

[29] Pike v. Conestoga Title Ins. Co., 44 N.E.3d 787 (Ind.App. 2015) (owner insured's delivery of claim notice about tax foreclosure after redemption period expired was tardy and prejudiced insurer, voiding policy coverage). However, in Emigrant Mortgage Co. v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 4 N.Y.S.3d 491, 126 A.D.3d 636, 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 02684 (N.Y.A.D. 2015), a lender's claim notice that informed the insurer that the deed to its borrower might not have been signed by all of the owners was adequate notice of the dispute, although the lender did not inform the insurer of a judgment voiding the deed until after it was entered.

Shapiro*, 2015 WL 412869 (D.Mass.) (unpublished) (lender that received notice of judgment execution sale that wiped out its mortgage, but neither redeemed nor made a claim before sale, entitled to claim payment of amount it would have cost to redeem from sale, but no more); Emigrant Bank v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 2017 WL 4286335 (S.D.N.Y.) (unpublished) (insurer harmed because tardy claim notice prevented it from defending priority of insured mortgage or recovering from borrowers and others). However, in Green Tree Servicing, LLC v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 499 S.W.3d 771 (Mo.App.E.D. 2016), the court held that an insured lender's claim notice that was submitted only after a competing lender had held its non-judicial foreclosure sale was not tardy as a matter of law, and did not support a motion to dismiss the insured's suit on the policy. The court held that the insured lender was entitled to try to prove that it was excused from giving notice earlier because it reasonably assumed that the other lender held a junior lien that would not wipe out the insured's lien on foreclosure. The foreclosing lender had signed a subordination of its lien to the insured's mortgage, although the loan closer had failed to record the before the lawsuit is completed, will negate the duties to defend and indemnify if the insurer is prejudiced.[31]

An insured also causes prejudice to the insurer if it vitiates the insurer's subrogation rights.[32] For example, when the insured delayed in presenting the claim for 18 months, thus precluding the insurer from recouping against perpetrators of a fraud, the prejudice of the insurer's subrogation rights negated coverage.[33] However, the insurer is not prejudiced by the insured's failure to preserve subrogation rights if no such right existed.[34]

The insurers is also prejudiced when the insured takes action concerning the title claim issue before it gives notice to the insurer, and the insured's actions frustrate or limit the insurer's ability to cure title. One common example of this type of prejudice is when the insured seeks to negotiate a cure to the title defect before giving notice to the insurer, which attempt is rejected by the adverse subordination. In Lurie v. Commonwealth Land Title Co., LLC, 558 S.W.3d 583 (Mo.App.E.D. 2018), the same court distinguished Green Tree, holding that the insured lost the right to make his insurer pay for a title lawsuit when he gave notice to the insurer years after the lawsuit was filed and dismissed. The Lurie court said the prejudice to the insurer was in the fact that "it was deprived of its specifically expressed contractual rights under the Policy to direct the litigation, pursue a settlement, and most importantly in this case, select the counsel of its choice."

Chicago Title Ins. Co*., 974 F.Supp.2d 87 (D.R.I. 2013) (insurer required to prove prejudice caused by tender of defense after lawsuit was completed). The insured's obligation to make a tender of defense is discussed at §4.3. In Gibbs v. Williams, 2015 WL 5440628 (W.D.Wis. 2015) (unpublished), the court agreed that an attorney's failure to submit a tender of defense to the insurer would have caused harm to the insureds because they paid for their own defense, except that the court also ruled that the insurer had no duty to defend the insureds because coverage was excluded. However, in Emigrant Mortgage Co. v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 4 N.Y.S.3d 491, 126 A.D.3d 636, 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 02684 (N.Y.A.D. 2015), a lender's claim notice that informed the insurer that the deed to its borrower might not have been signed by all of the owners was adequate notice of the dispute, although the lender did not inform the insurer of a judgment voiding the deed until after it was entered.

[32] In Interbay Funding, LLC v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 2003 WL 22939275 (E.D.Pa. 2003) (unpublished), the insured lender delayed submitting a notice of claim until after it had completed foreclosure and waived its right to a deficiency judgment against the borrowers. It then submitted its claim concerning liens omitted from the policy. The court found that the claim notice was not timely, but that fact "does not purport to authorize wholesale denial of a claim for a bare failure to notify promptly." Rather, the insurer had the burden of proving an amount to serve as a setoff against policy liability. In Branch Banking & Trust Co. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 714 S.E.2d 514 (N.C.App. 2011), the court found that a notice of claim that was sent a year after the insured discovered the title problem did not prejudice the insurer's subrogation rights, because it still had eight days in which to decide to sue a law firm for malpractice and to file the action before the statute of limitation ran. The court justified the ruling by further holding that the insurer was "presumed to have had knowledge of" the title defect from the date of policy, since it was in the public records. In Emigrant Bank v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 2017 WL 4286335 (S.D.N.Y. 2017) (unpublished), the insurer was harmed because the tardy claim notice prevented it from recovering from the borrowers and others.

[34] In Atlanta Title & Trust Co. v. Allied Mortgage Co., 60 Ga.App. 114, 3 S.E.2d 127 (1939); aff'd 64 Ga.App. 38, 12 S.E.2d 147 (1940), the insurer was not harmed when the insured paid off real estate taxes and failed to get an assignment of rights to the insurer, because the seller was not personally liable for the tax debt.

party, and has the effect of negating or limiting the insurer's ability to negotiate a cure. An insurer is not obligated to pay a ransom price to cure title just because the insured has alienated the adverse party. See cases discussed at §3.2.3.1.2. To establish prejudice to its right to clear title, the insurer must establish that there was a good faith basis on which to seek to clear title or defend the insured's interest in the property.[35]

Similarly, an insurer is prejudiced if the insured sells the property before giving the insurer the ability to cure title. The insurer's prejudice is increased if the insured incurs new or additional liability in the course of the sale.[36]

The insurer suffers a form of automatic prejudice to its ability to resolve a covered claim when the first notice of the claim from the insured to the insurer is its filing of a suit for breach of policy. The insurer cannot breach a duty to indemnify the insured if it does not receive a claim notice and have the opportunity to respond in one of the numerous ways provided under the policy. For example, in Commercial Credit Plan, Inc. v. Estate of Smith,[37] the insured first submitted a claim notice, to the agent, five months after the insured became aware of the title dispute. The insured gave no notice to the insurer before it sued the company for breach of contract. The court found that a five-month delay did not constitute prompt notice. Further, it found that the expense of the litigation was itself prejudicial to the insurer:

> The issue then becomes whether the five-month delay in giving notice, or CCP's failure to provide written notice and proof of loss in accordance with the terms of the policy, prejudiced the rights of TRW. TRW asserts that it has incurred attorney fees in the instant litigation that it would not have otherwise incurred if it had received proper notice. It is undisputed that CCP did not comply with the policy provisions requiring written notice of the claim and written sworn proof of loss. It appears that such policy provisions are designed, at least in part, to provide the insurer an opportunity to assess its options without incurring litigation expenses. In this case, TRW did not have that opportunity and was prejudiced to the extent of the extra expense incurred.[38]

Therefore, the court ruled that the insurer was entitled to credit its expenses in the litigation against any judgment in favor of the insured establishing a compensable loss under the policy.

[35] In Trico Manufacturing Co., Inc. v. Penn Title Ins. Co., 657 A.2d 890 (N.J. Super. 1995) because the insurer had not proven that it would have been able to cure title, the court found no "appreciable harm" in late notice. Both the insured mortgage and a prior, undisclosed mortgage were obtained by forgery. Even if the insurer had defeated the prior mortgage, the insured mortgage would still have been void.

[36] In Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. Lunt Land Corp., 162 Tex. 435, 347 S.W.2d 584 (Tex. 1961), for example, an insurer was prejudiced when an insured sold the property and incurred warranty liability before permitting the insurer to remove the encumbrance on title.

[38] Id. at 4.

When the insured submits a tender of defense, the insurer may be prejudiced for reasons other than tardiness causing the insurer to lose the ability to raise a meritorious defense. In Security Union Title Ins. Co., v. Usnick,[39] the insureds' tardy tender was found to negate any defense duty, because the insurer could have had the insureds defended by the same counsel who defended numerous other insureds. The prejudice was in the increased expense of a second set of lawyers. Also, an insured's attempt to cure title may cause policy coverage to terminate if the insured's self-help prejudices the insurer. For example, when the insured first tendered defense after judgment had been entered foreclosing the insured's lien and after the insured failed to bid at the sheriff's sale, it was found to have prejudiced the insurer and terminated policy coverage:

> The delay of plaintiff in giving defendant notice of this foreclosure action prejudiced defendant as a matter of law since defendant was improperly deprived under condition 2(b) of the policy, of its right to defend said foreclosure action, and of its right to prevent or reduce any loss. Under the circumstances, the defendant is relieved of any liability in the second cause of action.[40]

However, when the insurer is not prejudiced by the tardiness of the tender, the late notice does not erase the duty to defend.[41] In the Usnick decision discussed above, the court found no prejudice as to a second mortgage in foreclosure, despite a six-month delay in claim tender, because as to that mortgage there was still sufficient time to assert the insured lender's priority before the foreclosure sale. In another case, even though the tender was made after mediation, the court found no prejudice due to the tardy notice.[42] Also, when an insured settled the suit by agreeing to the [39] Dec. 15, 1998, case no's C97-1986L and C98-1445L, U.S.Dist.Ct. W.D.Wash. (unpublished). In that case, the United States filed suit against the State of Washington to assert Native American tribal rights to take shellfish from tidelands. The insureds were owners of tidelands property and members of an association known as UPOW formed to intervene in the suit. Non-UPOW insureds tendered to the title insurers, who retained a set of lawyers to intervene. The UPOW members hired different counsel. They did not tender their "defense" in the suit until after trial had been held and an appeal filed. The court ruled that this delay caused prejudice because the UPOW members could have been represented by counsel already retained by the insurers. "As it is, they are being asked to pay to defend the Shellfish Case twice." The court found as a matter of law that this was so prejudicial that it negated any duty to defend the insureds. Another court found, however, that the insurer had a duty to pay for the defense even though it was tendered after the suit was finished, because there was no showing that the late notice caused substantial prejudice. The Usnick decision on policy coverage is not published or available. One of the many decisions on the merits of the shellfish controversy is United States v. State of Washington, 157 F.3d 630 (9th Cir. (Wash.) 1998).

[41] In Dreibelbiss Title Co., Inc. v. MorEquity, Inc., 861 N.E.2d 1218 (Ind.App. 2007), the insurer was found to have known of the title defect, an unreleased mortgage, due to its own failure to close the loan account, and thus was not prejudiced by the insured's failure to tender defense until after a judgment had wiped out its lien.

imposition of a judgment before tendering defense, and the insurer's only claimed prejudice was the loss of the ability to negotiate a more favorable settlement rather than to raise a meritorious defense, the court found no prejudice.[43]

Finally, the policy states that the insured shall promptly provide a proof of loss. An insured may prejudice its right to recovery by failing to provide a proof of loss, but under certain circumstances the insurer may be found to be estopped to assert that the failure to provide a proof of loss has an effect on coverage.[44]

2.3.4 Proof Of Policy Issuance

As part of a notice of claim or tender of defense, the claimant must produce evidence that he or she is an insured under a policy that remains in effect. This subject is also discussed in the context of the insurer's claim investigation, at §2.6.

Thus, typically, the insured must produce the policy in order to have a claim honored.[45] If the claimant is unable to establish the existence of a policy, the insurer is entitled to deny the claim.[46] The title insurer typically requires proof that the claimant has possession of the original policy. This proof is most often supplied by the claimant's delivery to the insurer of a copy of the policy. However, secondary evidence of the policy's existence may sometimes be admitted when the original has been lost.[47] Further, when no policy has been issued but all conditions to its issuance have been met, in most cases the insured makes a sufficient proof of insurance by establishing those

Co*., 2012 WL 1080876 (M.D.Fla.) (unpublished) (insurer estopped to raise failure to submit proof of loss because law firm had submitted many other claim notices and insurer "had a practice of acting upon those claim letters … without subsequently requiring a separate proof of loss").

[45] An insurer was found not to be liable under a forged policy in Flagstar Bank, FSB v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 660 Supp.2d 346 (D.Conn. 2009). In Clair v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2007 WL 1063989, 2007-Ohio-1681 (Ohio App. 9 Dist.) (unpublished), when the plaintiff proved that he had paid a premium, but could not produce the title insurance policy, and the insurer produced affidavits showing that it had no record of having issued either a commitment or policy to the plaintiff, the insurer was found entitled to summary judgment declaring that the plaintiff had failed to prove that he was an insured.

[46] See Johnson v. Law Office of Schwartz, 145 A.D.3d 608, 46 N.Y.S.3d 1, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 08931 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept. 2016), in which the court dismissed an action against Stewart Title based on the insurer's evidence that the claimant received a policy from First American Title, and had never proven that he held a policy issued by Stewart Title or was owed such a policy.

[47] In Van de Bovenkamp v. United Title Co., 2006 WL 3530473 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), the court refused to grant a motion to dismiss a complaint for breach of contract based solely on the grounds that the insured was unable to locate the policy. It relied on a case which held that the contents of a lost insurance policy may be proved by secondary evidence, although the burden is on the insured to establish the substance of each policy provision essential to the claim of relief. It found this lesser standard allowed the complaint to survive a motion to dismiss. The insured alleged a contract on information and belief, which the court said "is sufficient to establish the existence of a contract for title insurance…" for purposes of such a motion.

facts. See §6.4 for a discussion of the title insurance commitment's conditions and requirements for issuance of a policy.

Insureds often do not understand why they must establish the existence of a title insurance policy, because insurers in other coverage lines have reliable databases of their current insureds. Title insurance is unique in that it provides almost exclusively retrospective coverage, the insured does not pay renewal premiums, and the policy permits successor insureds. Thus, a title insurer is not able to maintain such a database because it does not receive renewal premiums from its insureds and the policies have no fixed term but can remain in effect for many years. A title insurer has no regular communication with the insured and is not notified when the insured changes its address. Also, many policies are issued by title agencies, approved attorneys and other independent companies. In other lines of insurance, independent agents can issue binders of insurance but policies are always issued directly by the insurer. The insurer then makes the policy and the insured part of its master database of insureds. The title insurance agent has authority to issue policies largely because the title insurer does not keep a master database of its insureds. Thus, the insurer has no central repository of policies in effect. These are the reasons why the claimant must establish the existence of the policy as part of its notice of claim.

2.4 Claims In Which Insureds Are Adverse To Or Aligned With Each Other

When one insurer has issued policies to two or more parties who are adverse to each other in a dispute concerning title, the insurer has separate duties to each insured. It is often a prudent practice in such cases for the insurer to designate different claim administrators for each claim, to limit the possibility that the strategy of one insured could be transmitted to the other insured through the claim administrator. In some situations, it may even be advisable to instruct the two claim administrators not to discuss the claims with each other.

The insurer is sometimes in the unenviable position of paying to prosecute an action to clear title and in defending that action, on behalf of its two (or more) adverse insureds. However, in no sense does an insurer in such a situation have a "conflict of interest," as that concept applies to attorneys.[48] Also, when the insurer is able to establish that its decisions are in line with the coverage of the dueling policies, it is not liable for bad faith damages on the allegation that the insurer has chosen sides for one insured and against the other.[49] Also, the insurer is not estopped from denying coverage to one insured because it has accepted coverage as to its other insured that is adverse to the first, because each policy's coverage or lack thereof must be decided separately and on the basis of

[48] In Fogg v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 89 A.3d 510 (D.C.App. 2014), the insurer had issued policies to both parties who claimed to be the owner of the property, and the insurer was asked to defend the one insured in the suit brought by the other. The insured asserted that the insurer had a "conflict of interest" as a result. The court said that the insurer did not assume a fiduciary duty by entering into an insurance contract and that "there is no conflict of interest when an insurer issues title insurance to different buyers of the same property."

[49] In Fekade v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2011 WL 4906818 (Cal.App. 6 Dist.) (unpublished), the court ruled that the insurer did not act in bad faith toward the plaintiff insured by providing a defense for its other insured, the defendant neighbor whom the insured sued, while refusing to prosecute the action because it did not invoke coverage.

the policy's terms.[50] Thus, the insurer may not be sued by one insured based on the allegation that the insurer has inflicted emotional distress on that party by prosecuting or defending a title clearance lawsuit on behalf of the other insured.[51]

In some cases, one insurer has issued policies to two or more insureds whose interests are aligned in title litigation. In such cases, it is common for the title insurer to appoint the same retained counsel to represent all of the insureds. It is also common for that retained counsel to be supervised by one claim administrator as to all insureds. The fact that the same insurer pays for the defense of several insureds and appoints the same retained counsel does not create a joint defense agreement, under which there is no attorney-client privilege as between the joint defendants.[52]

2.5 Claim Acknowledgment and Processing Deadlines

FORM 1, Appendix A
Acknowledgment of receipt of claim

FORM 58, Appendix A
Notice of claim sample

A title insurer is required to acknowledge receipt of a claim notice from an insured. The acknowledgment letter or notice often further provides the insured with the claim number and the claim administrator's name, address and telephone number.

[50] In 631 North Broad Street, LP v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 2018 WL 4051798 (E.D.Pa. 2018) (unpublished), aff'd 2019 WL 3383878, 778 Fed.Appx. 164 (3rd Cir. (Pa.) 2019) (unpublished), the insurer was not required to defend its insured in a lawsuit about ownership of a portion of a wall located adjacent to the insured parcel, because the policy did not insure the title to the wall or the land on which it rested. Further, the insurer was not estopped from denying coverage because it had agreed to defend the neighboring owner in the same lawsuit. The neighbor was also an insured. The wall at issue was located on that insured's parcel and that policy did not contain a survey exception. The appeals court stated that Commonwealth could not be backed into "defending" one insured, under the doctrine of quasi-estoppel, because it had paid for the other insured's defense, because the two decisions were not inconsistent coverage positions. Rather, the coverage was simply different under the two policies.

[51] In Van de Bovenkamp v. United Title Co., 2006 WL 3530473 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), the court dismissed a claim of intentional infliction of emotional distress brought by a person claiming to be an insured, which was based on the premise that the lawsuit against them had been financed by the title insurer on behalf of its other insured. The court said: "[A]ppellants' emotional distress claims focused on Chicago Title's actions in paying the Developer's litigation expenses for the Underlying Lawsuit and the mental anguish caused by being involved in that lawsuit. Appellants concede, however, that Chicago Title owed a contractual duty to the Developer, having issued it a title policy. A title insurer's decision to accept a duty to defend a party insured under a valid policy cannot be construed as extreme and outrageous conduct. Nor can the title insurer be held responsible for the actions of counsel in vigorously seeking to enforce their client's rights."

[52] See Hall CA-NV, LLC v. Ladera Development, LLC, ___ F.Supp.3d ___, 2019 WL 5448458 (D.Nev. 2019) (permanent citation not yet available), which held that the fact that a law firm was hired by the same title insurer to represent two lenders in mechanic's lien litigation did not mean that there was a joint representation entitling one insured to look at the law firm's confidential file for the other insured client.

Many states impose deadlines for the insurer's issuance of a notice acknowledging receipt of the claim notice.[53] Some state laws mandate that certain notices be incorporated in the claim acknowledgment letter.

The insurer may also use the claim acknowledgment letter to deliver a notice of claim form or proof of loss that the insured is instructed to complete and return to the insurer. A formal notice of claim form can be useful in assisting the claim administrator in analyzing the claim, particularly if the insured's first contact was not in writing or was not very descriptive of the claim issue.

California has established a series of deadlines by which different types of claim responses must be sent by the insurer.[54] All time periods are based on calendar days. The deadlines are as follows:

Response to notice of claim including any claim forms and initiation of investigation	15 days from receipt of notice of claim
Notice that additional 30 days required to accept or deny	40 days from receipt of proof of claim
Accept or deny liability Affirm or deny coverage	40 days from receipt of proof of claim unless time extended
Payment of loss or action to resolve title defect	30 days after affirmation of coverage and liability
Written report to insurance department inquiry	21 days from inquiry by department

When an insurer elects to clear title, the time for paying a covered claim is extended accordingly.[55] However, a Georgia court held that the time for claim payment was not extended while the insurer considered whether or not it would pursue the option of suing to clear title, and ultimately declined to do so.[56]

2.6 Investigation Of Claim

The insurer conducts some form of review or investigation of each policy claim. There is not a standard type of claim investigation, because the investigation depends on the nature of the claim. When the investigation is completed, the insurer issues a coverage determination, as discussed at §2.13.

The ALTA policy forms do not contain any statement about an insurer's obligation to investigate a claim.[57] However, Texas policy forms do. Condition 3 of the Texas T-1 Owner's policy and T-2 Loan Policy state that, on receipt of a notice of claim, the insurer:

> ... shall promptly investigate the charge to determine whether the lien, encumbrance, adverse claim or defect is valid and not barred by law or statute. The Company shall notify the insured in writing, within a reasonable time, of its determination as to the validity or invalidity of the insured's claim or charge under the policy.

Condition 4(b) of the Texas T-1R Residential Owner's policy states, similarly:

> If you report to us that a covered title risk exists, we will promptly investigate to determine if that covered title risk is valid and not barred by law or statute.

Title insurance claims vary widely in their nature and complexity, so no benchmark exists as to the scope of the investigation that must be done on an "average" claim. The investigation performed by an insurer in response to a tender of defense is typically more limited than that conducted for a claim of indemnity. The method prescribed in most jurisdictions for determining the duty to defend is to compare the words in the pleading with the words in the policy. In many states, the insurer is precluded from considering other information. The investigation time is typically quite short. However, there are circumstances in which a more elaborate investigation is appropriate.[58]

State laws often impose a time period for the claim investigation. For example, Section 7 of the NAIC Model Regulations states that the insurer "shall complete investigation of a claim within thirty days after notification of claim, unless such investigation cannot reasonably be completed within such time." It is not uncommon for a title insurer to inform the insured that its claim investigation will take longer than the standard time period. In California, if the insurer needs more [57] One court found that the lack of a claim investigation provision in the ALTA policy gave the insurer "significant leeway for Stewart Title to evaluate and pay claims," putting the burden on the insurer to prove the reasonableness of its handling of the claim without providing a safe harbor for timeliness or diligence. Marcantel v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2017 WL 5991734 (D. Utah 2017) (unpublished).

[58] See Mulhearn v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 2014 WL 213554 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), rev.den. April 9, 2014, in which the court found that "[t]here was no unreasonable conduct or delay" when it "made a coverage determination within six weeks, and then reasonably reconsidered and provided coverage subject to a reservation of rights two-and-a-half weeks later." It said: "Lawyers Title was entitled to a reasonable amount of time to process and investigate Mulhearn's claim, which he made more difficult by tendering claims on behalf of himself as an individual and as trustee." The court further ameliorated the effect of the investigation period by ruling that the insurer was required to pay the defense costs incurred by the insured during the time from tender to the insurer's acceptance of the defense.

than 40 days to investigate after receiving a "proof of claim" from the insured (see the explanation for this statutorily-defined term in §2.7), the insurer must write to the insured to extend the time and to state why more time is needed. That letter extends the investigation period by 30 days. Any additional extensions must also be supported by such a letter.[59]

See the decision trees in Chapter 1 for an outline of the analysis performed by a claim administrator in investigating both claims of indemnity and tenders of defense.

The following is a discussion of at least some of the actions that an insurer may take to investigate a title insurance claim. The insurer will not take all of these actions on any one claim.

Typically, the first step of the claim investigation is to determine that a policy has been issued or is owed, to determine the type of policy issued or owed, and to establish that the claimant is the insured under that policy. See §2.3.4, concerning proof of the policy. Proof of a policy is also the first step listed in the decision trees at §1.1.2 (concerning tenders of defense) and §1.1.4 (concerning claims of indemnity).

The claimant must also establish that he or she is the insured under the policy. Every title insurance policy provides that certain parties may become successor insureds, on the happening of an event. The title insurer receives no notice that such an event has occurred. A person who claims to be a successor insured must establish that fact as part of his or her claim notice. See §7.2 for a complete discussion of successor insureds under owner's policies, and §7.4 for a discussion of successor insureds under loan policies.

Also, the claimant must establish that the policy has not already terminated. A title insurance policy does not have a stated and definite term, but rather terminates on the happening of an event. The claimant must establish that no such terminating event has occurred that would have caused policy coverage to lapse. See §§7.3 and 7.9 for a discussion of the termination of the owner's policy and the loan policy, respectively.

When a title insurance commitment has been issued but a policy has not, the title insurer must determine if a policy is owed and what the agreed-on terms of that policy are. See §§6.2 and 6.4 for a complete discussion of that subject.

The claim administrator may need to collect other relevant documents and locate relevant facts not yet known, and the names of the parties best able to provide those facts. On occasion, the insurer obtains crucial facts from more than one party, to verify their accuracy.

It can be very helpful to take photographs of the site so that details can be preserved, particularly if changes to the property are likely. In some circumstances, the claim administrator will elect to visit the property. Entry onto the insured parcel or neighboring land requires permission obtained in advance.

In cases involving questions of possession or water boundaries, aerial photographs can be extremely valuable. Google Earth is a favorite tool of the claim administrator. The Army Corps of Engineers often has aerial photos, surveys and maps for property under its jurisdiction. Counties and municipalities often have stocks of aerials dating back a considerable period of time, which are typically tied to the county GIS maps.

The claims handler may wish to interview or inquire of the adverse party directly, to get that party's statement of the facts and legal theory, if any. The claim administrator is careful to avoid any discussion of strategy with an adverse party.

If an agent or approved attorney issued the policy, that party may also be an important source of information. See §17.6 regarding the agent's duties in relation to a claim. The claims handler will seek the title agent's complete, original title and escrow file or files. Receipt of the original file allows the insurer to take possession of any original affidavits, waivers, letters or other documents affecting coverage, defenses to the adverse claim, and recoupment from third parties. It also prevents the insurer from making wrong assumptions as to the facts, which can happen if the insurer sees only what the agent or approved attorney believes is important. The claim administrator will typically suggest to the agent that it give notice to its errors and omissions carrier if he or she believes the claim may trigger coverage. Under claims-made-and-reported E & O policies, prompt notice is critical to preserving coverage. See §17.10 for a discussion of those policies.

A title agent that is affiliated with a real estate broker, lender, law firm or developer may have special issues concerning claim information. It is not unusual for a title dispute to also include a claim against the owner of the title agent (the broker, lender, attorney or developer), in which the plaintiff seeks all or some of the same damages from both related parties. If such a dual claim exists, it does not affect the title agent's contractual obligation to assist the insurer in its investigation of the claim. See §17.3 regarding attorney agents and §17.4 regarding other affiliated business arrangements.

A complete investigation of a claim can take considerable time. The passage of time can be a sensitive issue when the insured's building project or other land use is hampered or held in abeyance. An insurer may lose the right to clear title, or face a penalty in its exercise of that right, if it is deemed to have taken too long to make that decision, as discussed at §3.4.1. The claim administrator gives regular reports to the insured as to the status of the claim investigation.

When the insurer has completed its investigation, it will issue a coverage determination letter, as described at §2.13.

The statute of limitations for suit on the policy may be tolled during the time in which the insurer is investigating the claim. In California, if the statute of limitations for suit on the policy or a time limit in the insurance contract will expire, the insurer is required by regulations to notify the insured at least 60 days before the expiration date. That provision does not apply to claimants represented by counsel.[60] See §2.15 for a discussion of the statute of limitations for suit on the policy.

[60] California Code of Regulations, Title 10, Chapter 5, Subchapter 7.5, § 2695.7(f).

2.7 Proof Of Loss

FORM 62, Appendix A
Request for proof of loss

Most policies require the insured to furnish proof of the claimed loss.[61] A requirement to produce a proof of loss obligates the insured to provide information regarding the facts concerning the loss and to calculate the amount of the claimed loss. The insured may not refuse to provide information, or falsify or conceal information. The giving of false information may constitute fraud in the making of an insurance claim, which can void policy coverage and which is typically a criminal act.[62]

The 2006 ALTA policy requires the insured to submit a proof of loss only if the insurer requests that information. That policy states that, if the insurer "is unable to determine the amount of the loss or damage," the insurer may require, "as a condition of payment," that the insured "furnish a signed proof of loss." This change could be read to suggest that the insurer has the obligation to obtain and pay for its own appraisal or evaluation of the loss.

The 1992 and earlier ALTA policies also provided that the failure to submit a proof of loss within 90 days after the insured determines the facts giving rise to the claim terminated the insured's rights under the policy, to the extent that the tardy proof of loss harmed the insurer.[63] The 2006 ALTA policies also do not contain a provision for termination of policy coverage due to the insured's failure to provide a timely or adequate proof of loss.

The insurer is normally not permitted to assert the failure to voluntarily come forward with [61] Conditions & Stipulations 5 of the 1992 ALTA Owner's policy states in part: "In addition to and after the notices required under Section 3 of these Conditions and Stipulations have been provided the Company, a proof of loss or damage signed and sworn to by the insured claimant shall be furnished to the Company within 90 days after the insured claimant shall ascertain the facts giving rise to the loss or damage. The proof of loss or damage shall describe the defect in, or lien or encumbrance on the title, or other matter insured against by this policy which constitutes the basis of loss or damage and shall state, to the extent possible, the basis of calculating the amount of the loss or damage. If the Company is prejudiced by the failure of the insured claimant to provide the required proof of loss or damage, the Company's obligations to the insured under the policy shall terminate, including any liability or obligation to defend, prosecute, or continue any litigation, with regard to the matter or matters requiring such proof of loss or damage. …" A proof of loss is not synonymous with the "proof of claim" that an insured is to submit under California regulations. A "proof of claim" is defined as "written proof, such as claims forms, medical bills, or other reasonable evidence of the claim and any material and relevant documentation in the claimant's possession that supports the magnitude or the amount of the claimed loss, or the assertion of liability by a third party claimant if applicable." California Code of Regulations, Title 10, Chapter 5, Subchapter 7.5, § 2695.2(u).

[62] See, for example, Schultz Management v. The Title Guarantee Co./Ticor Title Ins. Co., 551 N.Y.S.2d 527 (A.D. 1990).

[63] The insured's failure to deliver a proof of loss (or notice of claim) for seventeen years after it had notice of the defect in title was found to bar recovery, in Security Union Title Ins. Co. v. RC Acres, Inc., 269 Ga.App. 359, 604 S.E.2d 547 (Ga.App. 2004), recons.den. (Aug 31, 2004), cert.den. (Nov 22, 2004). The policy at issue in RC Acres was a 1970 form, which stated very plainly that " [f]ailure to furnish such statement of loss or damage shall terminate any liability of the Company under this policy as to such loss or damage."

proof of loss or damage as a complete bar to recovery under the policy, however. Strictly technical defects in a proof of loss, such as the failure to have it sworn to, will not (without further defect) void coverage.[64] The requirement of a statement in writing may be satisfied by a letter rather than a form.[65] The State of Texas has promulgated a proof of loss form.

One extreme case found that sufficient "proof" of loss was provided by the allegations of a breach of contract complaint, even though the lawsuit against the insurer was the first notice of the claim.[66] The dissent correctly reasoned, however, that no cause of action for breach of the insurance contract may lie until the insurer has breached a duty. Unless the insurer is presented the claim and improperly rejects it, it has not breached a policy duty.

2.8 Insured's Cooperation And Examinations Under Oath

Once it has submitted a claim, the ALTA policy forms obligate the insured to give the insurer all reasonable aid in resolving the claim.[67] The claim administrator will sometimes interview the insured, take his or her written statement or conduct an examination under oath. The insurer has the right to demand the insured's records and files.[68] The insurer also has the right to conduct an [64] First Carolinas Joint Stock Land Bank v. New York Title & Mortgage Co., 172 S.C. 435, 174 S.E. 402 (1934). In Boel v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 137 Idaho 9, 43 P.3d 768 (Idaho 2002), the insureds submitted a proof of loss which claimed damages equal to their mortgage loan amount, in a claim based on an adverse claim of title to a portion of the property. The insurer argued that the insureds failed to submit an adequate proof of loss, because their measure of diminution was incorrect. The court ruled for the insureds, seizing on the phrase in Conditions & Stipulations 5 of the 1992 ALTA policy that says the proof of loss shall "state, to the extent possible, the basis of calculating the amount of the loss or damage: "[T]he Boels plainly provided Stewart Title with the basis for their claimed loss--the existence of the deed in favor of the federal government. Additionally, the letter provided, to the extent possible, the basis for calculating the amount of the claimed loss or damage--the Boels indicated a belief that the intrinsic value of the property to them, as well as their ability to sell the property, had been almost completely destroyed. ... This information was sufficient to give Stewart Title "an opportunity to investigate and determine its liability" relative to the Boels' claimed damages. ... Consequently, the Boels' letter provided the basis for calculating the amount of the claimed damages, and it was an adequate proof of loss under the policy." Similarly, in Universal Holdings II Ltd. Partnership v. Overlake Christian Church, 60 P.3d 1254, 115 Wash.App. 59 (Wash.App. Div. 1 2003), the insured's failure to send a proof of loss before suing the insurer on the policy did not make the lawsuit premature, according to a Washington court. The court excused the insured from providing a proof of loss for several reasons: the insured submitted a notice of claim, there was "no doubt whatsoever" that a loss in some amount existed, the policy was issued after the lawsuit was filed so that the insured was unable to review the policy's terms, and the court found no prejudice to the insurer by the failure to submit a proof of loss.

[68] An insured lender will often respond that it is prohibited from revealing its loan file or account records by the Bank Secrecy Act, the Annuzio-Wylie Anti-Money Laundering Act or some similar law. Except in the rarest of cases, such is not the case. A national bank is required to file a SAR when it detects certain kinds of suspicious activity. 31 U.S.C. § 5318(g)(1). The regulations say a bank is prohibited from disclosing a SAR, or "any information that would reveal the existence of a SAR," and that the bank should refuse a subpoena for such information. 12 C.F.R. § 21.11(k)(1)(i). The privilege is unqualified and cannot be waived. Gregory v. Bank One, Ind., N.A., 200 F.Supp.2d 1000, 1002 (S.D.Ind. 2002). However, this prohibition does not include "[t]he underlying facts, transactions, and documents upon which a examination under oath of the insured or its representatives.[69] An insured's refusal to aid the insurer's claim investigation, which includes agreeing to submit to examinations under oath, terminates policy liability.[70] An insured has a duty to both the insurer and the court to participate in good faith in a court-ordered mediation in a coverage lawsuit.[71]

The insured's duty to cooperate in the clearing of title is discussed at §3.4.1.2. The insured's duty to give reasonable aid in a lawsuit against the insured is addressed at §4.10.

Westbury Bank*, 2014 WL 4267450 (E.D.Wis. 2014) (unpublished), the insurer sued a bank that stood by idly as evidence mounted that a title company was stealing from its escrow account. The bank refused to turn over its account records and the bank's internal fraud investigation files, based on the above laws, because it had filed a suspicious activity report with the FBI about the transaction. First American made a discovery demand for documents about the fraud investigation, including documents on which the SAR was based, but not the SAR itself. The court granted a motion to compel. It said that the privileged documents are only the SAR itself and those that, on review, would cause the reader "to discern with effective certainty the existence of a SAR." The decision provides an excellent summary of the cases on this issue.

[69] Condition 6(b) of the 2006 ALTA Owner's policy states: "The Company may reasonably require the Insured Claimant to submit to examination under oath by any authorized representative of the Company and to produce for examination, inspection, and copying, at such reasonable times and places as may be designated by the authorized representative of the Company, all records, in whatever medium maintained, including books, ledgers, checks, memoranda, correspondence, reports, e-mails, disks, tapes, and videos whether bearing a date before or after Date of Policy, that reasonably pertain to the loss or damage. Further, if requested by any authorized representative of the Company, the Insured Claimant shall grant its permission, in writing, for any authorized representative of the Company to examine, inspect, and copy all of these records in the custody or control of a third party that reasonably pertain to the loss or damage. All information designated as confidential by the Insured Claimant provided to the Company pursuant to this Section shall not be disclosed to others unless, in the reasonable judgment of the Company, it is necessary in the administration of the claim. Failure of the Insured Claimant to submit for examination under oath, produce any reasonably requested information, or grant permission to secure reasonably necessary information from third parties as required in this subsection, unless prohibited by law or governmental regulation, shall terminate any liability of the Company under this policy as to that claim."

June 20, 2013), the court ruled that an insured lost its policy coverage for a real estate tax issue by paying the taxes after submitting a claim but without the insurer's written consent, and then refusing to turn over requested documents about that decision and refusing for seven months to allow its representatives to sit for examinations under oath. The court found that the insurer was within its rights to examine the insured's representatives about possible policy defenses, not just its claimed losses, and that the insured delaying the insurer in forming a conclusion as to coverage and adjusting the claim if covered. However, a Florida court refused to find that the failure to deliver documents negated coverage, based on an earlier decision in Bristol Heights that was reversed by the above decision. *Regions Bank v. The insured failed to send a company representative to the mediation and made no effort to resolve the case at mediation.

2.9 Payment Of Loss

FORM 11, Appendix A
Payment of loss as determined by insurer

When the insurer has completed its investigation, it will issue a coverage determination letter, as described at §2.13. When the insurer has determined that a claim is covered and that loss is payable, the insurer will typically state in the coverage determination the amount that it is paying the insured or that it is willing to pay. Loss payment may be based on a proof of loss or damage submitted by the insured that the insurer considers to be accurate.[72] The loss payment amount may also be in an amount established by the insurer, based on an appraisal it obtains or other calculations made by the insurer.[73] The payment may also be in an amount reached by negotiation between the insurer and insured.[74] The loss amount may also be set by a court order or judgment in a coverage lawsuit or declaratory judgment action.[75]

The insurer pays the loss within the time allotted by the policy's terms and applicable state law.[76] The policy states that, "[w]hen liability and the extent of loss or damage have been definitely [72] See §2.7 for a discussion of the proof of loss.

[73] See §3.2.3.6 for a description of how to value the loss of a small portion of the insured parcel. See §§3.2.3.7 and 3.2.3.8 concerning the method used by an appraiser to set the diminution in the value in the property caused by the covered matter. Section 3.2.3.1 and its subsections discuss loss caused by various types of title issues.

[74] See Triangle Holdings, II, LLC v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 266 Or.App. 531, 337 P.3d 1013 (Or.App. 2014), in which the insurer paid the insured for liens on the property after the court ruled that the insured had coverage for the liens. The insured then sought payment of its attorneys' fees, under a statute permitting a fee award when the plaintiff recovers more than the amount offered by the defendant in settlement. The court said the statute applies only when a judgment is entered against the defendant, not when it settles or pays before judgment is entered. An insurer typically has a rational basis for its offer of settlement. California regulation sets forth seven factors to be considered by the Commissioner of Insurance in evaluating whether or not a settlement offer "is unreasonably low." They are: "(1) the extent to which the insurer considered evidence submitted by the claimant to support the value of the claim; (2) the extent to which the insurer considered evidence otherwise made known to it and reasonably available; (3) the extent to which the insurer considered the advice of its claims adjustor as to the amount of damages; (4) the extent to which the insurer considered the advice of its counsel that there was a substantial likelihood of recovery in excess of policy limits; (5) the procedures used by the insurer in determining the dollar amount of property damage; (6) the extent to which the insurer considered the probable liability of the insured and the likely jury verdict; (7) any other credible evidence presented to the Commissioner that demonstrates that the final amount offered in settlement of the claim by the insurer is below the amount that a reasonable person with knowledge of the facts and circumstances would have offered in settlement of the claim." California Code of Regulations, Title 10, Chapter 5, Subchapter 7.5, §2695.7(g).

[75] See §4.14 for a discussion of coverage declaratory judgment actions.

[76] Condition 12 of the 2006 ALTA policies says: "When liability and the extent of loss or damage have been definitely fixed in accordance with these Conditions, the payment shall be made within 30 days." The 1992 ALTA policies contained a nearly identical provision. California Code of Regulations, Title 10, Chapter 5, Subchapter 7.5, §2695.2(u) provides: "Every insurer shall tender payment immediately upon, but in no event more than thirty (30) calendar days after, the insurer's affirmation of coverage with respect to first party claimants and the insurer's affirmation of coverage and liability with respect to third party claimants, of the amount of the claim which has been determined and is not in dispute, and when necessary, the claimant has provided a property executed release. If settlement of the claim is fixed in accordance with these Conditions, the payment shall be made within 30 days."[77] The "definitely fixed" phrase meshes with other policy provisions, including the final determination provision; therefore, it is too simplistic to assert that the 30 days begins running when the claim notice is delivered.[78] Once a loss is deemed to be in a "liquidated" or fixed amount, the insured may be entitled to recover interest on that amount from the date the loss became fixed.[79]

Sometimes, the parties agree that a loss is payable, but they cannot agree as to the amount. In other situations, the insured does not wish to resolve the claim by receiving a loss payment.

negotiated, then the insurer shall tender payment of the negotiated amount immediately upon, but in no event more than thirty (30) calendar days after, receipt by the insurer of a properly executed release. In claims where multiple coverage is involved, payments which are not in dispute and where the payee is known shall be tendered immediately, but in no event in more than thirty (30) calendar days, if payment would terminate the insurer's known liability under that individual coverage, unless impairment of the insured's interest would result. This subsection shall not apply where the policy provides for a waiting period after affirmation of liability and coverage and before payment of benefits is to be made. Any insurer… (4) Issuing a title insurance policy shall either tender payment in accordance with the time limitations set forth in subsection 2695.7(h) or take actions to resolve the problem which gave rise to the claim immediately upon but in no event more than thirty days after its affirmation of coverage or liability." Chapter 542 of the Texas Insurance Code is that state's prompt claim payment statute. That law that sets deadlines for claim actions, such as acknowledgment of a claim within 30 days, issuance of a coverage determination "not later than the 15th business day after the date the insurer receives all items, statements, and forms required by the insurer to secure final proof of loss," and payment of a claim "not later than the fifth business day after" the insurer gives notice that it will pay the claim. In Hall CA-NV, LLC v. Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 2018 WL 2984867 (N.D.Tex. 2018) (unpublished), the court held that the law exempts title insurers from these deadlines, under § 542.053(a)(3).

[77] Condition 12 of the 2006 ALTA policies. A corresponding provision is found at Conditions & Stipulations 12(b) of the 1992 ALTA Owner's policy. In Marcantel v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2017 WL 5991734 (D. Utah 2017) (unpublished), the court noted that Condition 12 says that loss is owed when the "extent of loss" is "definitely fixed." It said this provision made it clear "that liability and the amount of loss or damage must be clearly determined before the thirty-day period begins."

[78] In Marcantel v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2017 WL 5991734 (D. Utah 2017) (unpublished), the court noted that Condition 12 says that loss is owed when the "extent of loss" is "definitely fixed." It said this provision made it clear "that liability and the amount of loss or damage must be clearly determined before the thirty-day period begins." The court said that neither a difference value appraisal nor the insured's claim notice had "fixed" the loss amount and caused the 30 days to begin running. The court also observed that the policy gives the insurer several means of resolving the claim other than by making a payment to the insured, and the final determination provision states that no loss is payable until there is a final resolution of a title clearance action.

[79] See Gaviota Holdings, LLC v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 7334429 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), in which the court agreed with Chicago Title that ten percent interest under California Civil Code section 3287 could run only from the date on which suit was filed, because a claim for diminution in value is unliquidated. The court quoted from Overholtzer v. Northern Counties Title Ins. Co., 116 Cal.App.2d 113, 253 P.2d 116 (Cal.App. 1 Dist. 1953) which held that "diminution of market value caused by the easement is not a fixed nor computable sum. The evidence in the instant case demonstrates how difficult the ascertainment of that item may be. For the reasons stated the demand is unliquidated within the meaning of the section [Civil Code section 3287]... ." In Marcantel v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2017 WL 5991734 (D. Utah 2017) (unpublished), the court found that the amount of the loss had not become fixed by the insurer's payment of a difference value based on an appraisal it had obtained. However, the court also rejected the insured's assertion that his loss amount had become fixed and payable within 30 days merely by delivery of his claim notice and a demand in an amount not supported by facts or analysis.

Nonetheless, the policy states that the insurer may resolve a claim by a loss payment. The insurer will typically pay the insured the amount that the insurer believes is owed.[80] The insurer may obtain an appraisal to set the difference value payable to the insured.[81] See §3.2.3.7 for a discussion of such appraisals. The insurer may invite the insured to accept the payment without a release, putting the burden on the insured to prove a loss in any amount greater than the payment made.[82]

The insurer may condition its payment on the insured's agreement to release the insurer. Releases are discussed at §2.11.

An insurer is entitled to make a loss payment to the appointed counsel for the insured, in which case the insured and not the insurer bears the risk of the attorney's embezzlement of the money.[83]

2.10 Arbitration

Under most title insurance policies, disputes may be arbitrated in lieu of litigation. The right to arbitrate is determined by the policy's terms and applicable law, either state or federal. In the arbitration, the law of the state that is the situs of the insured property applies to all substantive issues.[84]

When the parties elect to arbitrate the claim dispute, the authority of the courts to review the arbitration is limited. State law controls on questions about the authority of a court to review an [80] See Ruger v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 1996 WL 769793 (Del.Super.) (unpublished), in which the insurer tendered policy limits with no strings attached, after the insured refused to give a full release as a condition to receipt of the money.

[81] See Marcantel v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2017 WL 5991734 (D. Utah 2017) (unpublished), in which the insurer made a payment of a difference value based on an appraisal it had obtained.

[82] In Millies v. LandAmerica Transnation Title Ins. Co., 185 Wash.2d 302, 372 P.3d 111 (Wash. 2016), the insurer issued a check to the insured based on the diminution in value ascribed by an appraisal report, and did not demand a release in exchange for the payment. Nonetheless, the insured rejected the payment as inadequate, and returned the check. There was a jury trial. The jury heard testimony that the insurer had delivered payment. Because of the way in which the special verdict was formulated, the jury was precluded from finding a loss equal to the amount tendered but rejected. The result was that the insurer obtained a judgment of zero liability despite its offer to pay diminution. Millies illustrates the risks that an insured incurs by rejecting a payment that it considers to be insufficient, when acceptance of the payment would not waive the insured's right to claim additional loss.

[83] See GMAC Mortgage Corp. of Pa. v. Weisman, 1998 WL 132791 (S.D.N.Y.) (unpublished), in which the title insurer issued a policy at the "New York style" table closing. However, the purchaser presented NSF checks at closing, including the funds to be used to pay the title insurance premium. The entire transaction was unwound for failure of consideration. The lender's counsel then stole his client's loan proceeds when returned to him by the title insurer. The court found that the attorney had actual authority to receive the funds on his client's behalf, having represented the lender in court as the transaction was unwound. Therefore, the lender bore the risk of its attorney-agent's theft. Although the GMAC case involves return of proceeds from a sale, rather than direct payment of a policy claim, the same root principles of agency law apply to either situation.

arbitration award or to overturn the findings of the arbitrator.[85]

2.10.1 Policy Terms

The 2006 and 1992 ALTA policies permit either party to elect to seek to resolve a claim or dispute by arbitration.[86] The parties may arbitrate the issue of coverage, or of damages, or both. Insurer and insured each have the right to seek arbitration. Arbitration is mandatory if demanded by either party, on policies having a face amount of $1 million or less. On policies in excess of that amount, both parties must agree to arbitration. The 2006 ALTA policies increase the mandatory arbitration cap to $2 million. The ALTA Residential owner's policy also contains an arbitration provision at Condition 8. The 2010 ALTA Homeowner's policy has a similar arbitration provision at Condition 11. The Texas promulgated form of commitment to insure contains a rider entitling the proposed insured to request the deletion of the arbitration provision. The Texas form of residential owner policy does not include an arbitration provision.

The 1992 and earlier ALTA policy forms stated that arbitrations were to be conducted through the American Arbitration Association, according to its Title Insurance Arbitration Rules.[87] The 2006 policy removes the reference to the American Arbitration Association. In 2006, ALTA replaced the AAA with the National Arbitration Forum as administrator.[88] The new policies do not [85] The Federal Arbitration Act says that a court can overturn an arbitration award obtained by fraud, corruption, partiality of the arbitrator, or similar nefarious conduct, or is in "manifest disregard of the law." In Conestoga Title Ins. Co. v. Acoustic Home Loans, LLC, 2007 WL 1058228 (S.D.Ind.) (unpublished), the court felt constrained to let stand an arbitrator's decision to conduct the hearing in Los Angeles, where the insured was located, although the property was located in Indiana and the arbitration provision calls for arbitrations to be conducted where the property lies. The court emphasized that it has very limited powers concerning arbitration disputes. The California Code of Civil Procedure section 1286.2(a)(3) and (a)(5) states: "(a) Subject to Section 1286.4, the court shall vacate the award if the court determines any of the following: ... (3) The rights of the party were substantially prejudiced by misconduct of a neutral arbitrator. ... (5) The rights of the party were substantially prejudiced by the refusal of the arbitrators to postpone the hearing upon sufficient cause being shown therefor or by the refusal of the arbitrators to hear evidence material to the controversy or by other conduct of the arbitrators contrary to the provisions of this title." This section was interpreted as "a safety valve in private arbitration that permits a court to intercede when an arbitrator has prevented a party from fairly presenting its case," in Burlage v. Superior Court, 178 Cal.App.4th 524, 100 Cal.Rptr.3d 531 (Cal.App. 2 Dist. 2009). However, the courts rarely exercise the right to overturn an award. See Shirk v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2010 WL 5300799 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished) (arbitrator's award not overturned because no evidence of fraud by arbitrator); First American Title Ins. Co. v. Ordin, 2011 WL 4062208 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished) (refusal to overturn arbitrator's ruling that policy was not terminated, despite its plain language).

Arbitrators are chosen from a panel of people who have agreed to so serve with the administrator. In some locales, there is a dearth of panel members with any significant knowledge of title insurance or real estate issues.

2.10.2 Effect Of Federal And State Law

A key question as to the enforcement of the arbitration provision is the applicable arbitration law. Some state laws prohibit the use of arbitration clauses in insurance contracts; others regulate the form of arbitration clauses that may be used.[89] The 1992 policy arbitration clause states that it applies "[u]nless prohibited by applicable law... ." As to transactions in states whose laws prohibit or limit arbitration clauses in insurance contracts, this phrase has been read as an acknowledgment that state law may negate the arbitration provision.[90] For example, in Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. Mack,[91] a Texas court held that state law controlled because the transaction did not cross state lines. Texas law prohibits enforcement of arbitration clauses on contracts for which the total "consideration" paid is $50,000 or less.[92] The court found that "consideration" refers to the premium paid, not the amount of insurance or value of the property. It declared that the phrase "unless prohibited by applicable law" in the arbitration provision is an acknowledgment that state laws prohibiting arbitration may cancel the arbitration provision as to intrastate transactions.

The Federal Arbitration Act (the FAA)[93] contains an explicit preemption of state arbitration law as to transactions involving interstate commerce. The Act permits a party to compel arbitration. In transactions involving interstate commerce, these preemption provisions permit either the insurer or insured to compel arbitration.[94] Federal courts have embraced arbitration as a desired means of [89] For example, arbitration clauses in insurance contracts are prohibited or restricted per Ark.Stat.Ann. § 34-511; Ga.Code Ann. § 9-9-2(c); Kan.Stat.Ann. § 5,401; Mo.Rev. Stat. § 535.350; § 27-5-114 (2)(c) MCA (Montana); Okla.Stat.Ann. Title 15, § 802A; and Tex.Civ.Prac. & Rem. Code Ann. § 171.001 (Vernon Supp. 1996). In Young v. Security Union Title Ins. Co., 1998 MT 335, 292 Mont. 310, 971 P.2d 1233 (1998), the insurer argued that title insurance is not included in this statute because title insurance is excluded in various other statutes pertaining to insurance. The court disagreed, since no such exemption appears in the arbitration statute. It held that the law "pertains to title insurance policies, as well as other types of insurance coverage." Therefore, it denied the insurer's arbitration demand.

resolving disputes.[95]

The United States Supreme Court struck down California decisions barring the use of arbitration provisions in consumer contracts, holding that such state rules are preempted by the FAA.[96] That ruling likely overturns all prior rulings by state courts that would bar the enforcement of the arbitration provision in the ALTA policy forms.[97] Georgia had rejected the FAA preemption, on the grounds that the McCarran-Ferguson Act leaves the regulation of insurance to the states and Georgia law prohibits enforcement of arbitration provisions in insurance policies.[98] Also, a Montana court had quashed the insurer's demand for arbitration based on state law without even addressing the federal preemption argument.[99] Both rulings are likely overturned by the United States Supreme Court decision.

Other courts had already ruled that the title insurance arbitration provision was enforceable, based on FAA preemption.[100] Alabama, for example, eventually concluded that the FAA preempts [95] The mechanics of enforcing arbitration provisions, particularly under the Federal Arbitration Act, are thoroughly reviewed in Kravitz and Dunham, Compelling Arbitration, ABA Litigation, Vol. 23, No. 1 (Fall 1996).

[98] In McKnight v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., Inc., 358 F.3d 854 (11th Cir. (Ga.) 2004), the federal court noted that prior Georgia state court decisions have construed state law as prohibiting the enforcement of arbitration provisions in insurance contracts. The court found that the FAA both validated arbitration provisions and asserted preemption over state law. However, the McCarran-Ferguson Act leaves the regulation of insurance to the states. That law says: "No Act of Congress shall be construed to invalidate, impair, or supersede any law enacted by any State for the purpose of regulating the business of insurance, ... unless such Act specifically relates to the business of insurance ..." The court said that the tension between the two laws is reconciled as follows: "If the state has an anti-arbitration law enacted for the purpose of regulating the business of insurance, and if enforcing, pursuant to the Federal Arbitration Act, an arbitration clause would invalidate, impair, or supersede that state law, a court should refuse to enforce the arbitration clause." Chicago Title had already admitted that the Federal Arbitration Act's preemption of the Georgia law would "invalidate, impair, or supersede" it. Therefore, the court said, the only question was whether the Georgia Arbitration Code was "a law enacted" by Georgia "for the purpose of regulating the business of insurance." The court ruled it was, observing that a prohibition on arbitration has a significant effect on the insurance contract: "Based on these definitions of laws regulating the business of insurance, we conclude, like the only other two federal courts of appeals to address this question have concluded, that a provision in a state's arbitration code excepting insurance contracts is a law regulating the business of insurance."

A Mississippi court also relied on FAA preemption to enforce the arbitration provision, in Mississippi Valley Title Ins. Co. v. Lewis, 2006 WL 3694603 (S.D.Miss.) (unpublished). That court rejected the argument that a state insurance department policy statement frowning on arbitration provisions was a legislative act which would counter the FAA preemption. It also held that the insured's acceptance of the policy without complaint estopped the insured from later seeking to be relieved of this term of the contract. In Perdue Properties, LLC v. United States, 2016 WL 2858889 (S.D.Miss. 2016) (unpublished), the court held that a title insurer was entitled to compel the insured to arbitrate a dispute over policy coverage involving property in Mississippi in which the policy amount was less than $2 million. The federal district court also said that it was obligated to follow the Federal Arbitration Act if the case involved interstate commerce, which it so found. The court further noted that both the United States Supreme Court and Fifth Circuit Court state law, and makes the title insurance policy arbitration provision enforceable in that state. In 1997, the Alabama Supreme Court issued an opinion denying federal preemption, in Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. Jericho Management, Inc.[101] In January, 1998, the same court affirmed a trial court decision denying arbitration of claims against a title agent, without comment on the preemption issue.[102] Then, in April of 1998, the Alabama court withdrew its earlier opinion in Jericho Management and issued a new one.[103] In the later opinion, the court found the federal act preemption valid. In its first opinion in Jericho, the Alabama court had declared that, by the phrase "[u]nless prohibited by applicable law," the policy "incorporates laws that prohibit arbitration agreements but that might otherwise be preempted by the FAA." Thus, because Alabama law would preclude compulsory arbitration, the court held that the arbitration clause could not be enforced in Alabama even as to interstate transactions. In its April opinion, however, the Alabama court found that the phrase applied only to intrastate transactions. The court then held that the policy, issued by a Tennessee insurer and protecting an Alabama corporation's mortgage, "sufficiently affects interstate commerce to invoke the FAA."

2.10.3 Advance Notice Of Arbitration Provision

An insured may assert that the arbitration provision is not binding because the insured did not receive advance notice that the policy would contain such a provision. The argument was rejected in Imperial Savings Ass'n v. Lewis,[104] because the insured lender was shown to have accepted other policies that contained the arbitration provision prior to the transaction at issue. Further, the insured did not object to the clause until about a year after receiving the policy. The court held that Utah follows the principle that:

> ... receipt and retention of the policy without objection, by one who has had an opportunity to examine it for a reasonable time, is regarded as an acceptance of its terms.[105]

The court also considered whether or not the policy violated a Utah administrative rule promulgating arbitration clause disclosure language to be used in a commitment to insure. The rule had been promulgated after the policy was issued, and was thus inapplicable. Finally, the court found that the

of Appeals "have instructed the District Courts to find in favor of arbitration if there are any doubts concerning any issues of whether or not a claim is arbitrable," and that "Mississippi law is consistent with the federal standard."

clause was enforceable under the Utah regulations even though it makes arbitration compulsory under some policies. Mississippi adopted the same principle, citing Lewis with favor.[106] Another Mississippi court also held that the insured became bound by the arbitration provision by accepting the policy without objection.[107]

Similarly, Alabama has held that the arbitration clause is enforceable even though the commitment does not specifically give notice that the policy will contain such a provision. The court noted that the commitment incorporates all of the terms of the policy by reference.

> The arbitration provision in the Silvernells' policy appears to be standard in form. The commitment issued during the closing clearly apprised the Silvernells that the commitment was subject to the conditions and stipulations in the policy that would later be issued and that once that policy was issued it would then govern the rights and liabilities of the parties. Contrary to the Silvernells' contentions, First American did not materially alter its insuring agreement by issuing a title policy. [FN3] The commitment required First American to issue the policy, provided certain conditions were met. Because the conditions and stipulations set out in the policy, which included the arbitration provision, were expressly incorporated by reference into the commitment, the Silvernells' obligation to arbitrate was a part of the insuring agreement from the effective date of the commitment.
> > FN3. The Silvernells do not argue that all of the terms in the title policy that are not also specifically referenced in the commitment are unenforceable; they argue only that the arbitration provision is unenforceable. However, the Silvernells cannot single out the arbitration provision for a challenge of this kind. Doctor's Associates, Inc. v. Casarotto, supra. To be consistent, they must take the position that all of the terms in the title policy that were not specifically referenced in the commitment are outside the scope of the insuring agreement.[108]

In California, the insurer has a duty under the Insurance Department regulations to disclose to the insured "all benefits, coverages, time limits or other provisions of any insurance policy ... that may apply to the claim presented ... ."[109] In Wolschlager v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co.,[110] a California court ruled that an insurer was not precluded from enforcing the arbitration clause because it was not recited in the preliminary report of title, because of incorporation by reference language:

> [T]he Preliminary Report specifically identifies the document incorporated as the policy, lists the form which is contemplated and tells the recipient where they can find the policy. This incorporation was both clear and unequivocal. ... There is no authority requiring the defendant to specify that the incorporated document contains an arbitration clause in order to make the incorporation valid. All that is required is that the incorporation be clear and unequivocal and that the plaintiff can easily locate it.

Similarly, in a Connecticut case, an insured was not entitled to prevent arbitration on the argument that the insurer failed to warn of that clause in advance, when the insured held the policy for a decade and received its benefits while the insurer defended protracted litigation with a third party.[111] A Montana law requiring arbitration provisions to be found on the first page of a contract was struck down by the United States Supreme Court (in a case not involving title insurance).[112]

Other states, however, take the view that an arbitration clause is not enforceable unless the insured is advised in advance of closing that such a provision will be part of the policy. In Kleveland v. Chicago Title Ins. Co.,[113] a California court found that, notwithstanding the Wolschlager decision discussed above, a statement in the preliminary title report advising the insured that he or she could review the terms of the policy at the insurer's office, without any mention of the arbitration provision, was not enough notice that the policy would contain an arbitration clause. In Kleveland, the policy issued to the insured was not the same form as the one referenced in the preliminary report.[114] A North Carolina court also found that the arbitration provision was not enforceable because no title insurance commitment was issued in advance, and thus the insured obtained no warning, rendering the provision unenforceable under then-existing state arbitration law.[115]

[113] 141 Cal.App.4th 761, 46 Cal.Rptr.3d 314 (Cal.App. 2 Dist. 2006).

[114] In Kleveland, the preliminary title report said that a Homeowner's policy would be issued, but the company issued a CLTA policy instead. The court stated: "Chicago Title argues that the preliminary report incorporated the ALTA policy and its arbitration clause by reference because it mentioned that policy by name. But the ALTA policy never went into effect. The only arbitration clause that could conceivably be enforced in this case is the one that is a part of the CLTA policy that was actually issued, a policy that was not clearly and unequivocally referred to in the contract. This case is thus distinguishable from Wolschlager… ."

[115] King v. Owen, 601 S.E.2d 326 (N.C.App. 2004). The insurer urged the court to adopt the reasoning in McDougle that the title commitment incorporated the policy terms by reference, which the court refused to do because: "There was no commitment for title insurance issued in this case prior to or at closing. The first time an arbitration clause appeared was in the final title policy which was issued over three months after closing." The King decision may not be applicable to later disputes, however. The court stated: "This case is governed by the now repealed Uniform Arbitration Act, N.C. Gen.Stat. Chapter 1, Article 45A." The law was repealed by Session Laws 2003-345, s. 1, effective January 1, 2004, which is "applicable to agreements to arbitrate made on or after that date." N.C. Gen.Stat. Chapter 1, Article 45A (2004).

Similarly, the Ohio Supreme Court found that the failure to deliver the policy before closing, including its arbitration clause, precluded the insurer from enforcing the provision.[116] The court also rejected the incorporation by reference argument, because the 1970 ALTA policy is still used on demand in Ohio and thus not every policy form contains an arbitration provision. Also, in a Montana decision, the insurer argued that the insured accepted the arbitration provision by failing to object to that clause when the policy was received. The insured countered that the insurer failed to give notice of the provision because it was not referred to on the first page of the contract. The court did not reach the incorporation by reference argument, deciding the case solely on Montana's statute which prohibits insurance contracts from requiring arbitration.[117]

The advance notice argument is mooted by the use of the 2006 ALTA form of title insurance commitment, which contains both a notice and a reference to the location of the arbitration rules on ALTA's website:

> 5. The policy to be issued contains an arbitration clause. All arbitrable matters when the Amount of Insurance is $2,000,000 or less shall be arbitrated at the option of either the Company or the Insured as the exclusive remedy of the parties. You may review a copy of the arbitration rules at http://www.alta.org/.

2.10.4 Timely Demand For Arbitration

Most states follow the rule that a party loses the right to compel arbitration by bringing suit or becoming fully engaged in the litigation process before making the arbitration demand.[118] Colorado provides one set of factors considered in determining whether or not a party has waived the arbitration right:

> (1) whether the party has actually participated in the lawsuit or has taken other action inconsistent with his rights; (2) whether litigation has substantially progressed by the time the intention to arbitrate was communicated by the party moving to dismiss; (3) whether there has been a long delay in seeking a stay and whether the defendant filed counterclaims without asking for a stay; (4) whether a request to compel arbitration was initiated close to trial; (5) whether the party seeking arbitration has taken unfair

The Ohio Supreme Court the Ohio Supreme Court held that the arbitration provision is not enforceable, because the commitment does not warn of this term. Also, because not all available policy forms contain arbitration clauses, the insurer did not prove that the "usual and customary" policy contains such a provision. The earlier appeals court decision in Henderson which was affirmed by the Supreme Court provided at least some of the impetus for the ALTA's modification of the 2006 title insurance commitment form to provide explicit warning that the policy will contain an arbitration provision.

> advantage of discovery proceedings which would not have been available in arbitration; and (6) whether the other party was affected, misled, or prejudiced by the delay.[119]

The insurer should provide prompt notice of a demand for arbitration in order to avoid a finding that the insured would be prejudiced by that demand.

The subjectivity of the waiver standard is evident in the inconsistent results in the reported decisions. In Imperial Savings Ass'n v. Lewis,[120] the court found that the insurer had not waived its rights, noting that it reserved the coverage issue within six months of accepting the defense, and demanded arbitration two months after making the reservation of rights. An Alabama court found that an insurer was found not to have waived arbitration by the following actions taken over a seven-month period: filing an answer, responding to several motions and discovery requests by the insured plaintiff, making its own discovery requests and filing a summary judgment motion.[121] In Waldman v. Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co.,[122] by contrast, the insurer was found to have waived the right to arbitrate by waiting six months after suit was brought, and by engaging in discovery.

[121] In *Jericho Management, Inc. v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. [122] 2000 WL 328780 (Colo.App.) (unpublished).

2.10.5 Scope Of Arbitrable Matters

The scope of the arbitration provision is not limited to policy claim disputes. Rather, the policy states that arbitrable matters include "any controversy or claim between the Company and the Insured arising out of or relating to this policy, any service in connection with its issuance or the breach of a policy provision, or to any other controversy or claim arising out of the transaction giving rise to this policy."[123] The reference to "any service" in connection with issuance of the policy is broad enough to encompass escrow, recording and other services by the insurer that are incident to the insured transaction, as well as disputes about the charges made by the title insurer for such services.[124]

Accordingly, the arbitration clause has been held to include a dispute regarding a closing protection letter issued in connection with the policy.[125] See §14.5 regarding this subject. Also, a claim of estoppel to deny coverage, based on a claimed breach of the duty to defend, was found to be arbitrable in Imperial Savings Ass'n v. Lewis.[126] Alabama allowed a title insurance agent to invoke the clause when both it and the underwriter were sued for a title defect.[127] However, an earlier Alabama decision denied arbitration to an agent without opinion, when the agent alone was sued for its role in producing an inaccurate commitment to insure.[128] Claims by sellers that they should have received premium discounts on policies that they purchased for their buyers were found not to be within the scope of the arbitration provision, because the plaintiff sellers were not the insureds under the policies.[129] Although the insurer and insured agreed at an arbitration hearing that the arbitrator would decide only the duty to defend, their earlier agreement to arbitrate "the matters at issue in this lawsuit" was deemed broad enough to support the arbitrator's assertion that he would conduct a second arbitration on the duty to indemnify after ruling for the insureds on defense.[130]

[124] In Chassen v. Fidelity Nat'l Financial, Inc., 836 F.3d 291 (3rd Cir. (N.J.) 2016), the Third Circuit Court of Appeals ruled that a title insurer was entitled to demand separate arbitration of the claims brought by class plaintiffs asserting that the insurer marked up recording fees, effectively killing the class action suit. The court upheld this right based on the United States Supreme Court decision of AT & T Mobility LLC v. Concepcion, 563 U.S. 333, 131 S.Ct. 1740, 179 L.Ed.2d 742 (2011). The appeals court said further that the insurer had not waived the right to arbitrate by not asserting it sooner, since no such right existed until the Supreme Court decision was issued. The Chassen court also held that the arbitration provision of the policy was broad enough to encompass the plaintiffs' claims based on the New Jersey Consumer Fraud Act.

The broad "any controversy or claim" scope of the provision is not always sufficient to force arbitration of all claims in a lawsuit that involves parties other than the insurer and insured, however.[131] Arbitration of all claims may result in judicial economy, and is appropriate when the claims are closely related. However, one court denied a real estate broker's request to join the arbitration. The court said the issues regarding joinder are "the extent to which the claims against the signatories [to the arbitrable contract] and the nonsignatories are intertwined and ... the nature of the relationship between the parties."[132] Concomitantly, an insured may oppose arbitration due to the concern that inconsistent rulings by the arbitrator and judge could leave the insured with no coverage and also no remedy against the other party. This argument was accepted by a California court as a valid basis for denying the insurer's arbitration demand.[133]

2.11 Releases In Claim Settlements

FORM 59, Appendix A
Release of insurer
FORM 60, Appendix A
Release of insurer with express subrogation rights

A well-drafted release executed by the insured causes the insured to give up all of his or her claims and rights in relation to the subject matter of the release, including the right to be defended in litigation filed later on the subject of the claim and release.[134] In most jurisdictions, it is common [130] Shirk v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2010 WL 5300799 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished).

[131] For example, in Hamilton v. Mortgage Information Services, Inc., 2012 WL 6590718 (N.C.App.) (unpublished), the court found that claims by a borrower that a title insurer and its agent overcharged for closing services and did not grant a reissue credit on a loan policy were not subject to the policy's arbitration provision, because the borrower's claims were not based on, nor did she get a "direct benefit" from, the policy, which is a requirement in North Carolina for enforcement of an arbitration clause against a person who is not a party to the contract.

[133] MRA Funding Corp. v. United Title Ins. Co., 2002 WL 31045492 (Cal.App. 4 Dist.) (unpublished).

[134] In HSBC Bank USA, Nat'l Ass'n v. Resh, 2013 WL 6230670 (S.D.W.Va.) (unpublished), the court said it would require testimony about whether or not a release given by an insured in litigation in one state was intended to cover related claims by the same insured brought in a different state. See also Williams v. North American Title Ins. Co., 2012 WL 2705027 (Cal.App. 1 Dist.) (unpublished), which found that a release concerning a sewer pipe claim signed by the insured before he was sued by the pipe owner negated the insurer's duty to defend and barred the insured's claims for loss and bad faith, despite the insured's argument that the later dispute was not identical to the earlier, released claim. California Civil Code § 1542 says that a general release "does not extend to claims which the creditor does not know or suspect to exist" at the time he signs the release. The court found that the release signed by the insured was not a general release and was properly limited to the subject of the sewer pipe. It also rejected the insured's attempt to modify the release by parol evidence. In Chorches v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 48 F.Supp.3d 151 (D.Conn. 2014), the court held that a release was binding because it was precise, broad and not ambiguous; therefore, the insured's testimony that he did not understand the release when he signed it was not compelling.

practice for an insurer to obtain a release from the insured on payment of a claim of loss or when a claim is otherwise resolved. When an insurer conditions a claim payment on the insured's execution of a release, the insured's acceptance of the claim payment signifies his or her acceptance of the terms of the release, even when the insured refuses to sign and return the release.[135]

The insurer may also elect to make a "no-strings" loss payment, in which acceptance by the insured of the loss payment is expressly not conditioned on the execution of a release, as discussed at §2.9. However, even when an insurer might otherwise pay a claim of loss without a release, it will typically require a release when it is paying more than the amount of the policy benefit owed, or some portion of the payment is being made in exchange for a release of extra-contractual claims such as a claim of bad faith or violation of an unfair claim practices act.

The insurer should consider several factors as to the scope of the release. The following checklist should help the claims handler review or draft a release:

RELEASE CHECKLIST

1. Scope of Release
   Disputed matter fully described in clear language
   All claim issues covered by release
   If attorney retained for insured, duty to pay attorneys' fees terminated

2. Parties to be Released
   Insurer
   Insurer's officers, directors and employees
   Agent or approved attorney, and that party's agents, officers, directors and employees[136]
   Other parties in the chain of title or escrow production: abstractor, escrow agent
   Coinsurers and reinsurers

[135] In Higbie v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2015 WL 7270751 (Conn.Super.) (unpublished), an insurer delivered a settlement check to its insureds, to be deposited by them only when they had signed and delivered the settlement agreement and release prepared by the insurer. The insureds wanted to amend the release to limit its scope, but deposited the money before the insurer agreed to change the agreement. The court found that the insureds lost the right to modify the settlement terms by depositing the check and refusing to return the money to the insurer. The court dismissed the insureds' suit for breach of policy. In Camp Horne Self Storage LLC v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 2016 PA Super 252, 150 A.3d 999 (Penn.Super. 2016), the court held that the insured deprived the court of jurisdiction to rule on a motion to enforce a settlement agreement with the title insurer by its dismissal of the action before the settlement was consummated.

[136] This provision should prevent a subsequent action for abstractor or escrow negligence based on the same operative facts.

3. Parties to Give Release
Insured(s)
Party injured by insured[137]
Plaintiff in suit against insured

4. Rights or Duties That Survive Release
Assignment of causes of action, subrogation rights, rights in collateral
Duty to cooperate in ongoing or contemplated subrogation or other recoupment efforts

The insured should not release third parties without the insurer's consent, in order not to prejudice the insurer's rights of subrogation. See §2.3.3 regarding prejudice caused by the waiver or release of rights which the insurer would take by subrogation. When the insured lender released a borrower from liability for "[l]oans and the foreclosures thereof," but not specifically the note, the insurer was permitted to pursue the borrower on the note.[138] For its part, the insurer should carefully consider the effect of obtaining releases, if it intends to seek reimbursement by subrogation. The insurer may lose its right of subrogation by taking away subrogation rights of others in a release.[139]

2.12 Surrender Of Policy Or Endorsement Thereto

When the insurer pays policy limits to the insured, and in certain other circumstances in which policy cancellation is appropriate, the insurer is entitled to require the insured to surrender the policy for cancellation in exchange for payment.[140] The insurer typically marks the original policy "cancelled" and keeps the original policy in the claim file.

When a claim is resolved by payment to the insured of less than policy limits, it is customary for the insurer is to deliver an endorsement to the insured reducing the amount of the policy by the claim payment amount and adding an exception to Schedule B of the policy for a recorded instrument if such was the source of the claim.[141] If the title insurer does not issue such an

[137] For example, if the state permits direct action against insurers by injured parties, the insurer may wish to get a release from a third party who could claim to have been injured by the insured.

[138] The court held that the insurer's status as subrogee or assignee of the note was not determinative because, even standing the insured's own shoes, the insurer had a right to sue on the note. Belvedere Builders, Inc. v. First American Title Ins. Co., 164 Ga.App. 535, 296 S.E.2d 245 (1982).

[139] Chemical Bank of N.J. v. Bailey, 687 A.2d 316 (N.J.Super.A.D. 1997) (release of borrower canceled right of insurer to recoup from closing attorney who was negligent in paying off borrower's loan).

[140] See §3.5 regarding payment of policy limits to the insured.

[141] See Chorches v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 48 F.Supp.3d 151 (D.Conn. 2014) (when insured was paid for a loss, signed a release and consented to an endorsement adding an exception to his policy was foreclosed from suing insurer despite argument that he did not understand effect of claim settlement). Condition 10 of the 2006 ALTA policies provides: "All payments under this policy, except payments made for costs, attorneys' fees, and expenses, shall reduce the Amount of Insurance by the amount of the payment." The 1992 and earlier versions of the ALTA policies contain the same provision and, in addition, the following, at Conditions & Stipulations 12(a): "No payment shall be made without producing this policy for endorsement of the payment unless the policy has been lost or destroyed, in which case proof of loss or destruction shall be furnished to the satisfaction of the Company."

endorsement, the policy amount is nonetheless automatically reduced by the amount of the payment. Still, for the sake of good record keeping for both insured and insurer, many title insurers issue such endorsements, particularly because it is not extraordinary to pay more than one unrelated claim on a policy. When both loan and owner's policies have been issued, either simultaneously or at separate times, the insurer is well advised to endorse both policies to reflect the loss paid. See §3.2.2 concerning payment of loss when the insurer has issued both an owner's and a loan policy.

2.13 Coverage Determination And Claim Denial

FORM 17, Appendix A
Coverage determination

FORM 18, Appendix A
Follow-up after denial of claim of loss

When the insurer has completed its claim investigation, it issues a coverage determination. The coverage determination is typically communicated to the insured by letter. Some state insurance codes require that a coverage determination be delivered in writing.

There are a number of responses by the insurer that qualify as a coverage determination. The insurer may accept or reject a tender of defense, as discussed in Chapter 4. The insurer may accept a claim of loss by agreeing to take one of the seven options available under an owner's policy, or one of the nine options provided under a loan policy, as described in §3.0. The administrator may also determine that there is no coverage, in which case he or she will issue a denial letter or preliminary analysis of no coverage. See the discussion in this section of the difference between a denial and a preliminary analysis. In this book, the term denial shall apply to both types of responses.

Many states impose deadlines for the issuance of a coverage determination, whether an acceptance or denial, as is further discussed at §2.5.[142] All or most such statutes or regulations say that the time period for response begins when the insurer has completed its investigation.[143] However, the law or regulation may also require the insurer to notify the insured that it needs more than the statutorily-permitted time to issue the coverage determination.[144]

[142] The California regulations state that the insurer is to send a denial within 40 days of the insurer's receipt of the insured's proof of claim. California Code of Regulations, Title 10, Chapter 5, Subchapter 7.5, § 2695.7(b). A proof of claim is not a proof of loss as defined in the title insurance policy. Rather, it is any evidence or documentation in the possession of the insurer, whether submitted by the claimant or obtained by the insurer in the course of its investigation, showing any evidence of the claim and reasonably supporting the magnitude or amount of the claimed loss. Regs., § 2695.2, subd. (s). Similarly, the Texas Basic Manual of Title Insurance, at Section VII, Claims, Part III, states that the insurer must issue the coverage determination within 30 days following its receipt of information requested from the insured as part of the claim investigation. If the insurer is unable to issue the coverage determination within that time, it must notify the insured and explain the delay: "After the Insurer receives all of the requested information, the Insurer shall notify the Claimant of the acceptance, denial or conditional acceptance of the Claim. This notice shall be sent to the Claimant within 30 days of receipt of such information… ." Georgia's insurance law, OCGA § 33-4-6(a), provides that, if the insurer fails to make payment within 60 days of the demand and in bad faith, it is liable for an additional penalty of 50% of the claim amount plus reasonable attorney's fees in the action against the insurer. In addition, "[t]he action for bad faith shall not be abated by payment after the 60 day period...." and "[t]he amount of any reasonable attorney's fees shall be determined by the trial jury...." However, in Atlantic Title Ins. Co. v. Aegis Funding Corp., 287 Ga.App. 392, 651 S.E.2d 507 (Ga.App. 2007), the court held that the 60-day time period was not tolled while the insurer investigated whether or not to pursue the option of suing to clear title, and ultimately declined to do so. The court also affirmed a punitive damage award.

A claim denial should explain to the insured, with reasonable clarity, the terms of the policy that cause the claim not to be covered.[145] If the claim is for something beyond the scope of policy coverage, the denial typically explains why none of the Covered Risks are invoked by the claim. A denial may also be based on an exclusion or exception.[146] The denial may also be based on one or more of the policy's Conditions, such as the provision that explains that the policy terminates on the happening of an event. In the denial letter, the insurer seeks to explain how the policy terms apply to the facts of the claim. Thus, the insurer often recites the facts on which the denial is based.

The insurer may, and sometimes does, change its classification of the claim after having issued the coverage determination letter. The insurer may deny a claim that its first letter stated was covered, or accept a claim that it first denied.[147]

[143] See, for example, the Texas Basic Manual of Title Insurance, at Section VII, Claims, Part III, quoted above.

[144] The California code states that, if an insurer requires more than 40 days to make a claim determination, the insurer must provide the claimant with written notice that additional time is required to make a determination. The insurer's notice must specify what further information is required in order for the insurer to reach a decision and state the continuing reasons for the insurer's inability to make a determination. California Code of Regulations, Title 10, Chapter 5, Subchapter 7.5, § 2695.7(c)(1). If the insurer's inability to make a determination continues, the continuing reasons for the inability to resolve the claim must be communicated in writing to the claimant. This notice must be provided every 30 days thereafter until either a resolution is accomplished or notice of legal action is served. In the event a claims determination is contingent upon some future event, compliance is met by an insurer’s notice to the claimant of the existence of this fact as well as an estimate of when the matter will resolve. The insurer need not disclose information that would inform a claimant that his or her claim is being investigated for suspected fraud. § 2695.7(c)(2). Similarly, the Texas Basic Manual of Title Insurance, at Section VII, Claims, Part III, states that, "should the Insurer be unable to determine whether to accept or deny or conditionally accept the Claim within the time specified in this regulation [30 days from receipt of information requested from the insured], the Insurer may notify the Claimant of the Insurer's inability to accept, deny or conditionally accept the Claim. The notice shall provide the reason(s) for the inability to accept, deny or conditionally accept the Claim."

[145] For example, the Texas Basic Manual of Title Insurance states, at Section VII, Claims, Part II(C) Denial of Claims: "Any denial of the policy coverage of a Claim shall set forth in writing the reasons for such denial. The notice of denial of a Claim must fully inform the Claimant of his/her right to contest the denial by stating (1) any time deadlines to contest the denial of the Claim under the policy or applicable law, and (2) that the Claimant may litigate (or arbitrate to the extent provided in the policy) the Insurer's denial, if the Claimant elects."

[146] Although it is traditional in the title insurance business to refer to "exceptions" as shown on Schedule B of the policy, an exception is actually an exclusion. Further, a special exception is an exclusion for a matter that is specific to the parcel. It can be helpful to the insured in understanding this fact if a denial letter based on an exception explains that exceptions are general exclusions or parcel-specific exclusions.

[147] The Texas Basic Manual of Title Insurance states, at Section VII, Claims, Part III(E), Limitation of Claim Reclassification, states: "Any reclassification shall be made within 30 days of the Insurer's receipt of New Information supporting a change. The Insurer shall provide notice to the Claimant within 15 days of any reclassification. The notice must state the reasons for the reclassification. The notice must fully inform the Claimant of his/her right to contest the reclassification by stating (1) any time deadlines to contest the reclassification of the Claim under the policy or applicable law, and (2) that the claimant may litigate (or arbitrate to the extent provided in the policy) the Insurer's

The administrator may issue a supplemental denial letter explaining the further reason or reasons why there is no coverage for the claim.[148] The claim administrator may augment the coverage determination based on facts that he or she learned after the initial coverage analysis was issued that invoke other policy terms negating coverage. A supplemental coverage determination letter may also be based on further evaluation of the facts known at the time the denial letter was issued.

In all or most jurisdictions, however, an insurer's failure to raise every applicable policy exclusion or term in a coverage denial is not a waiver of the right to assert such other policy terms in policy litigation.[149] An insurer result should not be deemed to have waived the right to assert a policy provision simply because it did not base its claim denial on such provision. A finding of waiver would alter the policy's terms and provide the insured with better coverage than that for which it had bargained. Some title insurers include anti-waiver statements in their claim denials, to explicitly state their intention not to relinquish any available defense to policy liability.[150]

Further, all or most states apply the same principles of waiver and estoppel in finding that an insurer may change its coverage determination and accept a claim after having denied it, or deny a claim after having stated that the claim is covered.[151] reclassification, if the Claimant elects." In RP Family, Inc. v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 1330932 (E.D.N.Y. 2014) (unpublished), the court found that an insurer was not barred from denying a claim after having stated in its coverage determination letter that it considered the matter to be covered by the policy. The insured had argued that the insurer was so barred by the doctrine of equitable estoppel.

[148] See Pasha v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 5510931 (Ky.App.) (unpublished), which affirmed a judgment declaring that the policy did not cover the claim based on an exception that the insurer first asserted after the insured sued the insurer, because the insurer had reserved the right to supplement the bases for its coverage denial.

[149] See Allan D. Windt, Insurance Claims & Disputes: Representation of Insurance Companies and Insureds, Sixth Edition, §§ 6:33 and 6:34 (claims of coverage by estoppel) and §6:35 (claims of coverage by waiver), Thomson Reuters.

[150] In Pasha v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 5510931 (Ky.App.) (unpublished), the denial letter stated: "[p]lease note that, although the provisions of the Policy cited herein provide a sufficient basis for [Commonwealth] to deny coverage for this claim, additional terms and conditions of the Policy may be applicable based upon the facts as presented. Reference to any particular provision of the Policy in this letter, therefore, shall not be construed as a waiver of any other term or provision...." The insured later argued that the insurer had waived the right to assert an exception as a coverage defense because it based its denial solely on an exclusion. The court observed that waiver is established by a course of conduct in which a party voluntarily and intentionally surrenders or relinquishes a known right, and the no-waiver statements in the claim denials "indicate Commonwealth had no intention to relinquish any of its rights at any time… ." Similarly, in Geo Finance, LLC v. University Square 2751, LLC, 2014 WL 7369940 (E.D.Mich. 2014) (unpublished), recons.den. 2015 WL 403620 (Jan. 22, 2015), the court rejected the insured's argument that the insurer had waived an exception by failing to rely on it as a basis for denial in the initial coverage determination letter. The court noted that Michigan follows the majority rule that, if an insurer fails to raise a policy term as a basis for a denial, "waiver and estoppel are unavailable to broaden coverage of a policy to protect the insured against risks that were not included in the policy or that were expressly excluded." Further, it said that First American's intent not to waive coverage defenses was established by the statement in its letter that the company "expressly 'reserves the right to establish additional grounds for denial should a further review of the file becomes necessary.'"

[151] In RP Family, Inc. v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 1330932 (E.D.N.Y. 2014) (unpublished), the court held that a title insurer was not equitably estopped from denying coverage after initially stating that the claim was covered by the policy. The court emphasized the statement in the coverage determination letter that the insurer's

Some of the sample letters in Appendix A to this book offer a preliminary analysis of the claim, rather than a final denial. A preliminary analysis letter explains that the coverage determination is based on the facts known to the insurer, which typically are recited in some detail. If the insured disagrees with the basis for the coverage determination or the assumed facts recited by the insurer, he or she is invited to reply with new information or evidence for an interpretation of the policy's terms that would favor coverage. This approach seeks to avoid the possibility that the insurer will deny a claim based on incomplete information, when facts not known to the insurer might cause it to accept rather than deny the claim. One court viewed a preliminary analysis letter as a denial of coverage tempered by the expression of the insurer's "willingness ... to reevaluate the denial of coverage in the event the [insured] provide[s] additional information establishing coverage under the terms of the insurance contract."[152] When the insurer issues a preliminary analysis, the burden shifts to the insured to contest the insurer's coverage position and the facts on which it is based.

If the insured does not respond to a preliminary analysis, the insurer will normally assume that the insured does not disagree with the facts on which the denial was made. The insurer may then elect to issue a second letter formalizing the denial. See the Forms Appendix for a template preliminary analysis letter, various text inserts that may be used with the letter, and a sample final denial letter.

In most cases, the insurer may respond to a tender of defense in litigation either by accepting the tendered defense or by declining to defend the insured. One court found that, when the insurer declined to defend the insured but also said it was willing to discuss the basis for its decision, the letter should be interpreted as a denial.[153]

In at least some jurisdictions and under certain circumstances, an insurer's failure to assert a particular policy defense in a reservation of rights letter precludes the insurer from relying on additional policy defenses as the basis for a refusal to pay a judgment adverse to the insured that is rendered in the litigation in which the insurer provides the defense. See §4.9 on reservation of rights letters.

investigation was ongoing, and that it was not waiving policy terms even as it stated its opinion that the matter was covered. The letter said: "Commonwealth is currently investigating all available remedies under the policy, and Commonwealth will take appropriate action in accordance with and pursuant to the terms and conditions of the policy... . Please note that reference to any particular provision of the policy in this letter shall not be construed as a waiver of any other term or provision. Commonwealth retains the right to supplement this letter."

The letter in Karl concluded: "... if you have any other information or authority which you believe would establish the claim as a covered matter under the policy, please contact the undersigned as soon as possible so that this office may re-evaluate its position on coverage." The second letter similarly stated: "... if you still feel that you have additional information or authority which would establish this claim as a covered matter under the policy, you are still welcome to submit it to this office for review so that we may re-evaluate our position on coverage."

2.14 Voluntary Settlement By Insured

The ALTA title insurance policies state that no claim shall arise or be maintainable if the insured voluntarily settles the claim without the insurer's prior, written consent. Condition 9(c) of the 2006 ALTA policies states:

> The Company shall not be liable for loss or damage to the Insured for liability voluntarily assumed by the Insured in settling any claim or suit without the prior written consent of the Company.

The language of Conditions & Stipulations 9(c) of the 1992 ALTA policies is identical.

When an insured settles a claim before giving notice to the insurer, or after notice but without the insurer's consent, the insurer may be absolved of any obligation to reimburse the insured for the amount that it voluntarily paid in the settlement.[154]

The policy has been interpreted to implicitly state that the insurer may not withhold consent to a settlement arbitrarily or unreasonably.[155] The voluntary settlement provision may be deemed waived if the insured settles after the insurer denies the claim or if the insured notifies the insurer of its intent to settle and the insurer does not adequately respond.[156] The insurer may properly withhold [154] In Wedgewood Square Center Ltd. Ptnshp. v. Lincoln Land Title Co., Inc., 347 S.W.3d 582 (Mo.App.S.D. 2011), the insured lender settled with the borrower on the debt and released its deed of trust without the insurer's consent, and was found to have terminated the policy and its claim for an undisclosed prior lien. In Republic First Bank v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2010 WL 5315979 (D.N.J.) (unpublished), the court found that a lender negated its policy coverage by taking a new mortgage to solve the possible infirmity of the insured mortgage a week after submitting a claim notice, then settling with the bankruptcy trustee who attacked the later mortgage as a preference, all without the written consent of the title insurer and without waiting for it to solve the title defect. In Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. Bristol Heights Associates, LLC, 142 Conn.App. 390, 70 A.3d 74 (Conn.App. 2013), cert.den. 309 Conn. 909, 68 A.3d 662 (Conn. June 20, 2013), the insured's payment of real estate taxes that were debatable as to both validity and amount, without notice to the insurer, voided policy coverage. In Wilmington Savings Fund Society, FSB v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2012 WL 5450830 (Del.Super.) (unpublished), the title insurer was found not to be obligated to reimburse an insured lender that elected to buy a competing lien without the insurer's consent while the insurer was defending the insured's lien priority. In Umpqua Bank v. First American Title Ins. Co., 542 Fed.Appx. 635, 2013 WL 5665013 (9th Cir. (Cal.)) (unpublished), an insured that defended itself in litigation for 14 months before tendering to its insurer, and then settled the case two weeks after tender, voided its policy coverage. In Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. Centerpoint Mechanic Lien Claims, LLC, 238 Ariz. 135, 357 P.3d 170, 720 Ariz. Adv. Rep. 7 (Ariz.App. 1 Div. 2015), the insureds formed an entity to purchase the mechanics' lien claims that were the subject of the claim. They then demanded that the insurer pay more to release the liens than the insureds had paid to buy them. The court held that the insureds vitiated policy coverage by making the settlements, and that the arrangement was a collusive settlement that did not fit within an Arizona rule that allows an insured to settle a lawsuit without the insurer's consent when it is being defended under a reservation of rights.

[155] Franklin v. Oklahoma City Abst. & Title Co., 584 F.2d 964 (Okla. 1978).

[156] In Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. Arkansas Riverview Development, LLC, 2009 WL 1258274 (E.D.Ark.) (unpublished), the insurer had denied the claim before a mediation, but the insured advised the insurer of every settlement offer made at mediation, and the insured settled the case. The court ruled that the insurer had waived the voluntary settlement defense for two reasons: by failing to invoke the defense at the time the insured was communicating with the company about the possible settlement, and also by its denial of what the court later determined to be a covered matter. In Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co. v. OMG Americas, Inc., 2012 WL 4856391 (D.Utah) (unpublished), the court found that the insurer consent to a settlement when the insurer is taking action to clear title, which is its right.[157]

The voluntary settlement provision is often construed as if it contains a condition that the insurer be prejudiced by the terms of the settlement.[158] Two primary factors considered by those courts are whether or not substantial rights have been irretrievably lost, and the likelihood of success if the insurer had been given the ability to defend the lawsuit. In New Jersey Dep't of Environmental Protection v. DiFlorio,[159] the insured tendered its defense after having settled the lawsuit. The court found it "significant" that the insured, Thompson, failed to notify the insurer, First American, of its intention to settle the case, and recognized that the policy includes the voluntary settlement provision. Thus, it said, "Thompson did not comply with the policy requirement that it notify the insurance carrier before it agreed to a settlement." However, the court went on to say that New Jersey case law adds the judicial gloss to all insurance policies that, to avoid payment based on the breach of a notice provision, the insurer must prove that it has suffered "appreciable prejudice" as a result. The court did not find "appreciable prejudice" in the terms of the settlement reached by the insured.

A collusive settlement by the insured is a bad faith act and negates liability.[160] See §16.1.7

had waived the voluntary settlement defense when, after receiving notice from the insured that it intended to make a settlement, it wrote back that "[w]e understand generally that the insured expects to dismiss the appeal at the end of the year, that it has made a decision to vacate the subject premises and is in the process of negotiating remediation or contamination agreements with the Tribe." The court also said Commonwealth was estopped from asserting the voluntary settlement provision by its failure to object to the settlement plan, and that it was not harmed by the settlement. However, the court rejected the insured's argument that the settlement was not voluntary but forced, because it was being strong armed by the Bureau of Indian Affairs, which had signed a lease and then reneged on it at the request of the tribe. In Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2016 WL 4455070 (D.S.C. 2016) (unpublished), the insured lender settled with its borrower by accepting less than the full debt amount after the insurer denied the claim as being premature. The court denied the insurer's motion to dismiss the policy breach lawsuit based on the voluntary settlement provision, finding that the settlement was less than voluntary following the denial of the claim.

[157] Diversified Mortgage Investors v. U.S. Life Title Ins. Co., 544 F.2d 571 (2d Cir. 1976) (insured not entitled to order commanding insurer to pay off lien when insurer had already elected to clear title instead); Wilmington Savings Fund Society, FSB v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2012 WL 5450830 (Del.Super.) (unpublished) (title insurer not required to reimburse lender that elected to buy competing lien without insurer's consent while insurer was defending the insured's lien priority).

[158] Prejudice caused by tardy notice of claim is discussed at §2.3.3. In Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co. v. OMG Americas, Inc., 2012 WL 4856391 (D.Utah) (unpublished), the insurer argued that it was prejudiced by the insured's settlement because that deprived the insurer of the right to pursue the pending action against the BIA to a final determination. The court said that the insurer did not have an unfettered right "to have the dispute fully litigated," and "the strength of the BIA's litigation stance suggests that pursuing the appeal to a final conclusion would have been futile." In Millennium Bcpbank, N.A. v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2011 WL 6412128 (N.J.Super.A.D.) (unpublished), a lender made title claims asserting that two mortgages from the same borrowers were defective, but settled with the borrowers by taking a money judgment against them. The court said that the insurer was required to show prejudice in order to assert the voluntary settlement defense, and a prime question about prejudice was whether or not the borrowers were collectible.

[159] 2007 WL 4553046 (N.J.Super.A.D.) (unpublished).

[160] In Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. Centerpoint Mechanic Lien Claims, LLC, 238 Ariz. 135, 357 P.3d 170, 720 Ariz. Adv. Rep. 7 (Ariz.App. 1 Div. 2015), the insureds formed an entity to purchase the mechanics' lien claims that were the

for a discussion of collusive settlements and the defense of comparative bad faith.

2.14.1 Consent By Implication, Waiver Or Estoppel

A court may find that the insurer has consented to a settlement if its employee gives assent by some communication less than in writing.[161] The insurer's consent may be implied or imputed based on the actions of the attorney hired by the insurer to represent the insured or to investigate the claim.[162] The insurer's offer to contribute to a settlement may be found to be a waiver of the consent clause.[163]

2.14.2 Voluntary Payment Of Lien

The voluntary payment of a lien that is subject to a valid defense, without the insurer's written consent, prejudices the insurer and negates coverage.[164] However, the voluntary consent provision is sometimes not enforced, most often when the court determines that there is no evidence that the lien was subject to valid defenses.[165] subject of the claim. They then demanded that the insurer pay more to release the liens than the insureds had paid to buy them. The court held that the insureds vitiated policy coverage by making the settlements, and that the arrangement was a collusive settlement that did not fit within an Arizona rule that allows an insured to settle a lawsuit without the insurer's consent when it is being defended under a reservation of rights.

[161] Oral consent to a settlement provided by an employee of the insurer was found to be adequate in Black v. Pioneer Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 138 Ga.App. 138, 225 S.E.2d 689 (1976).

[162] In Arizona Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Pace, 8 Ariz.App. 269, 445 P.2d 471 (1968), the insurer was not notified and gave no consent. Nonetheless, the court imputed knowledge and consent from the fact that the lawyer who advised the insured to settle had been hired by the insurer. In Security Title & Guar. Co. v. MGIC Mortgage Corp., 160 Ga.App. 421, 287 S.E.2d 352 (Ga.App. 1981), the court found that the insurer had waived its right to advance written consent because the counsel it retained to investigate the claim settled the title dispute.

[163] In Clinton David, Inc. v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 1999 WL 125721 (4th Cir. (S.C.)) (unpublished), the insurer's agreement to pay part of the cost of settling the lawsuit was found to be either consent or estoppel to raise the voluntary settlement defense, particularly because the insurer's attorney also commented that he believed the matter should be "terminated" (which the court read to mean "settled").

[164] The insured's failure to obtain the insurer's consent to the payoff of liens was found to extinguish the insured's claim in Blessing v. American Title & Ins. Co., 121 So.2d 455 (Fla.App. 1960). The insured's failure to obtain the insurer's written consent before payment of a lien was also found to preclude recovery by the insured in Mary Ellen Sandlie Trust v. Pioneer Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 648 S.W.2d 761 (Tex.App. 1983). In Columbia Community Credit Union v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2010 WL 546923 (W.D.Wash.) (unpublished), voluntary dismissal denied, 2010 WL 1992225, an insured lender was denied summary judgment in its claim that the insurer was obligated to reimburse it for large construction liens paid by the lender, to allow the insurer to prove that it was prejudiced by the lender's failure to assert priority based on equitable subrogation. The court remanded for a determination as to whether or not the lien was valid, as a predicate to a finding on the settlement defense, in Bluff Ventures Limited Partnership v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 950 F.2d 139 (4th Cir. 1991).

[165] Blessing was distinguished in Endruschat v. American Title Ins. Co., 377 So.2d 738 (1979), which involved a restriction rather than a lien, and in which the court did not enforce the voluntary consent provision. See also, Shada v. Title & Trust Co. of Fla., 457 So.2d 553 (Fla.App. 1984); and Holinda v. Title & Trust Co. of Florida, 438 So.2d 56 (Fla.App. 5 Dist. 1983), pet.rev.den., 449 So.2d 265. The Holinda court stated the rule thus: "the satisfaction of an

A voluntary payment to the lien holder prevents the insurer from seeking to clear title and obtaining a final determination that the lien is not valid or prior, at which point the insurer has no further duty to the insured, as further discussed at §3.4 and particularly §3.4.5 on the final determination clause. Thus, courts have found it particularly appropriate to find that the insured has negated policy coverage by settling a lawsuit with a lien claimant when the last order in the action was in the insured's favor.[166]

Unlike an owner, a lender must show more than just that a lien was valid in order to have the settlement defense waived. For a lender, the mere existence of a superior lien does not result in "actual loss." A lender voids policy coverage by paying a lien when it is unable to prove that the lien had impaired its security or threatened the insured lien.[167]

When the policy contains an affirmative indemnification against a final judgment or order enforcing the covered matter, coverage is not triggered until there is such a final determination or order. This precludes the insured from settling the matter and then seeking to be indemnified. In BancOhio Nat'l Bank, N.A. v. Security Union Title Ins. Co.,[168] the policy excepted an existing lawsuit affecting the property, but contained an affirmative assurance against a "final order of a court of competent jurisdiction" in the lawsuit. The court found that the insurer had a duty to defend. However, the insurer was not responsible for reimbursing the insured for its voluntary settlement of the case while on appeal from a summary judgment in the insured's favor.

> BancOhio did not resolve the claims in Katz by reason of a "final order of a court of competent jurisdiction." In fact, all final court orders rendered to that point were in BancOhio's favor. Upon appeal to the Ohio Supreme Court, BancOhio voluntarily settled the case rather than continue the prolonged and ongoing litigation. BancOhio made this decision with full knowledge of the terms and coverage provided by the title insurance policy. Nonetheless, it chose to settle rather than proceed to final judgment. As such, the settlement amount paid by BancOhio falls outside the scope of the policy's coverage... .[169] outstanding judgment which is a valid, enforceable lien on the real property does not constitute a 'voluntary satisfaction.'" To the same effect is Atlanta Title & Trust Co. v. Allied Mortgage Co., 60 Ga.App. 114, 3 S.E.2d 127 (1939), aff'd 64 Ga.App. 38, 12 S.E.2d 147 (1940).

2.14.3 "Emergency" Settlements

Several older decisions found that the insureds were excused from obtaining the insurer's prior written consent to the settlement of liens when the insured had to act immediately in order to close on the sale of the property.[170] The usual argument is that the settlement of a title problem that permits a sale of the property to close is a mitigation of the insured's damages for which the insured should not be penalized. However, if a claim has already been submitted to the insurer about the matter, the insured is well aware that it needs guidance and consent from the insurer in order to sell the property and resolve the purchaser's concerns about the ongoing title issue. The insurer has the right to offer to insure over the lien for a purchaser, to give a letter of indemnity to another insurer, or take other mitigating action, as further discussed at §3.4.4.

2.14.4 Settlement After Wrongful Denial Or Rejection Of Defense

The insured is not required to obtain the insurer's consent to a settlement of the claim matter after the insurer has wrongly denied the claim or a tendered defense.[171] This rule comes from the general insurance principle that the insured's duties under the policy cease when the insurer materially breaches its duty.[172] The court will presume that the insured settled the lawsuit because

The court ruled that the insurer had waived the voluntary settlement defense for two reasons: by failing to invoke the defense at the time the insured was communicating with the company about the possible settlement, and also by its rejection of the insured's defense in the litigation and denial of what the court later determined to be a covered matter. In Ticor Title Ins. Co. v. University Creek, Inc., 767 F.Supp. 1127 (Fla. 1991), the court found that the insurer had denied the claim by failing to promptly clear title. The insured eventually settled the case. The court found that the insurer, by its inaction, had lost the right to raise the voluntary settlement defense.

In Premier Homes, Inc. v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 76 F.Supp.2d 110 (D.Mass. 1999), the insurer accepted defense with a reservation, then retendered. The insured settled the lawsuit after retender. The court called the insurer's retender letter a rejection of the defense, even though it is "cloaked in the language of a query and purports to seek a response." The court then ruled the rejection wrongful. As a result, the insured did not violate the voluntary settlement provision of the policy. The court said: "Under the circumstances, ...Premier was entitled to settle the claim on its own and to obtain reasonable indemnity. 'An insurer who unjustifiably refuses or fails to defend its insured, even in good faith, assumes the consequential risks of that breach of its insurance contract, including liability for the expense of a reasonable settlement of the underlying claim as well as the cost of the defense to that time.'" In Banner Bank v. First American Title Ins. Co., 916 F.3d 1323 (10th Cir.

the insurer refused to pay for the defense. In some states, once the insurer has wrongly rejected a defense, it may not deny liability based on the voluntary settlement provision, because the insured has no further duty to give notices to an insurer that has already breached its duties.[173] Also, the insurer may not insist on apportionment of the settlement amount between covered and non-covered causes after it wrongfully rejects the insured's defense.[174]

2.15 Statute Of Limitations For Suit On Policy

States vary widely as to the applicable limitations period for the filing of an action for breach of a title insurance contract, and as to the event that causes that time period to begin running. The limitations period may begin to run on the policy date, if the claim was discoverable at that time.[175] The time period may begin to run on the date on which the insured discovered or should have discovered the covered issue.[176] The limitations period may also begin to run on the date on which

In Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co. v. OMG Americas, Inc., 2012 WL 4856391 (D.Utah) (unpublished), the court rejected the insurer's argument that the policy claim was barred by Utah's insurance contract statute of limitations, which says that an action must be brought within three years "after the inception of the loss." Utah Code Ann. § 31 A-21-313 (1). Commonwealth argued that the date the BIA declared the insured lease void was the inception of loss date. The court said the loss did not occur until Commonwealth filed a declaratory judgment action, on the premise that the insurer "was still considering whether it had the obligation to indemnify" until it filed suit. In Spalding v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 463 S.W.3d 770 (Mo. 2015), the court held that the statute began to run on the date the insurer offered payment to the insured, which the court deemed to be a breach because the amount offered was too low.

[179] In U.S. Bank, N.A. v. First American Title Ins. Co., 570 Fed.Appx. 209 (3rd Cir.) (unpublished), affirming 944 F.Supp.2d 386 (E.D.Pa. 2013), the court held that the statute of limitations began running on the discovery of the title defect, the date on which the insured submitted the claim or on the date on which the insured mortgage was wiped out by the foreclosure of a senior lien. It did not decide the question of which date was controlling, because the lender did not bring suit against the insurer even by the last of the three possible dates. The court said that the running of the statute was not suspended until the insurer breached the policy. The insured had argued that the insurer did not breach the policy although it did not protect the insured lien. In Park v. First American Title Ins. Co., 743 Fed.Appx. 902 (10th Cir. (Utah) 2018) (unpublished), the Tenth Circuit construed Utah Code §31A-21-313(1)(a), which says that a lawsuit against an insurer about an insurance policy must be brought within three years after the "inception of the loss." The court held that the "inception" was the date on which judgment was entered in a quiet title action, extinguishing the insured's rights. The court said this was "consistent with" the policy's final determination clause. It reversed the trial court's ruling that the limitations period began when the suit was filed, because the insured was not seeking the cost of defending that action.

limitations from three years to twenty.[180] When the policy states the time limit within which the insured must bring suit to enforce the contract, the policy provision controls.[181]

Some circumstances may toll the running of the applicable statute of limitations. The statute may be equitably tolled while the insurer is investigating the claim. In Forman v. Chicago Title Ins. Co.,[182] the insured submitted the claim to the insurer within the limitations period. The insurer spent 16 months investigating, eventually rejecting the claim. The insured filed suit, but after the two-year limitations period had expired. The appellate court remanded for a determination as to whether or not the statute of limitations should be considered equitably tolled by the insurer's investigation, saying:

> Under the terms of the insurance company's own contract, Forman was required to submit his claim against the title company to a lengthy evaluation process. ... Under respondent's view, Forman had only an eight-month window in which he could file a lawsuit against Chicago Title. ... In our view, the law does not allow insurers to so foreshorten the insured's statutory period for deciding whether to file suit.[183]

When the insured sues for breach of a duty to defend, the limitations period may begin on the date on which the insurer declined to defend the insured, although the time period may also be tolled until the underlying action is concluded.[184] When the insurer takes action to clear title and is unsuccessful, the statute begins to run when the action is concluded.[185] However, the limitations period is not tolled during the time in which the insured seeks to clear title without giving notice of the claim to the insurer.[186]

[184] In *Lambert v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. The court rested this holding on the theory that a lawsuit can take two years to complete, and it would be "untenable" to "allow expiration of the statute of limitations on a lawsuit to vindicate the duty to defend even before the duty itself expires." In Feduniak v. Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 2015 WL 632324 (N.D.Cal.) (unpublished), the court relied on Lambert in finding that the statute of limitations period began running when the lawsuit was over, not when the insured tendered its defense.

[186] In Hopmeier v. First American Title Ins. Co., 856 S.W.2d 387 (Mo.App. 1993), the insured spent more than five years attempting to cure his own title, and submitted the claim only after his efforts failed. The court found that the statute had already run, and rejected the insured's argument that no claim existed until he had exhausted his unsuccessful attempt to clear title.

The insurer and insured may enter into a tolling agreement by which the insurer waives the defense of a statute of limitations that expires during an agreed-on time period. In Stuckey v. McCalla, Raymer, Padrick, Cobb & Nichols,[187] involving an escrow, the agreement created a tolling "window." The insurer waived the right to assert the statute of limitations as to contract claims which expired during a certain 15-month period. The escrow principal eventually sued the insurer on a claim of breach of fiduciary duty. He claimed a ten-year statute of limitations. Because he missed even the ten-year limit, he argued that the tolling agreement added 15 months to that time period. The court rejected the argument, holding that the agreement applied only to contract claims that expired during the tolling window, and was not a general extension of all statutes of limitation.

California has a specific title insurance limitations period of two years, which begins to run from the insured's discovery of the title issue.[188] This statute has spawned a number of decisions interpreting the law. "Discovery" of the loss typically occurs when the insured learns that title is defective.[189] However, the California statute has been held to begin running when the insurer denies the claim.[190] When the insured discovered a title defect even before the title insurance policy was issued, the limitations period was found to begin on the date on which the policy was received by the insured.[191] The time period is tolled while the insurer is pursuing litigation to clear or establish Code of Civil Procedure § 339(1). In Faghi v. National Title Ins. of New York, Inc., 2019 WL 4182632 (Cal.App. 3 Dist.) (unpublished), the title insurer was dismissed from the coverage suit filed by its insured because the insurer was not served with the complaint until three years after the suit was filed. The insured sued the insurer using the wrong name and attempted service of the complaint on the wrong parties.

[190] In Park v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2011 WL 1991651 (Cal.App. 4 Dist.) (unpublished), the court ruled that the statute began running when the insurer denied the claim, not when the insured discovered the defect in the insured deed of trust that led to the claim. It cited Forman v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 32 Cal.App.4th 998, 38 Cal.Rptr.2d 790 (Cal.App. 2 Dist. 1995), discussed this section, which found that the statute was tolled while the insurer evaluated the claim, and a treatise that says: "The statute of limitations on a breach of contract action begins to run when the breach occurs. In an action to recover policy benefits, the statute starts to run upon the insurer's unconditional denial of the insured's claim."

[191] In San Jancinto Z, L.L.C. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2014 WL 1317696 (Cal.App. 4 Dist.) (unpublished), modified on denial of rehearing (April 24, 2014), rev.den. June 18, 2014, a lawsuit was pending on the policy date that contained a claim for which the court found a duty to defend. The covered claim was excised from the amended complaint filed after the policy date. The court held that the limitations period began to run on the policy date, since it could not begin running until the policy was issued and could not start on the filing of the amended complaint that withdrew the covered claim. In Smeaton v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 72 Cal.App.4th 1000, 85 Cal.Rptr.2d 591 title.[192] However, when the insurer takes action to clear title and is unsuccessful, the statute begins to run when the action is concluded.[193] The California statute is not equitably tolled while an insured attempts to negotiate a resolution of the title issue, because if there was tolling the insured could extend the limitations period by dragging out the negotiations.[194] The California statutory time period also is not tolled during the time in which the insured has potential warranty liability, but without any demand having been made on those title warranties.[195] However, when the policy states the time limit within which the insured must bring suit to enforce the contract, the policy provision controls.[196] The insurance regulations adopted by California in 1992 state that the insurer must notify the insured at least 60 days before the statute of limitations for suit on the policy expires. This provision does not apply to an insured represented by counsel on the claim matter.[197]

The Federal Deposit Insurance Company asserts that the federal Financial Institutions Reform, Recovery, and Enforcement Act permits it to bring a contract lawsuit within the later of six years from the date the claim accrued or the state limitations period, and that negligence claims

(Cal.App. 3 Dist. 1999), the court focused on the language in the statute that the action is "founded on" the title policy, and held as follows: "A claim 'founded upon' a title policy is one which relies upon the language within a written instrument or contract. Accordingly, a claim founded upon a title policy does not accrue until the title policy is issued. Fidelity protests that because the policy provided coverage effective as of the date of recording, any delay in typing and delivering the policy is immaterial. Fidelity also notes it cannot issue the title policy until after the deed is recorded, and asserts delays in issuing such policies is customary. We find Fidelity's protestations unpersuasive. The statutory language requires issuance of the policy as a prerequisite to the action. Any delay in typing and delivering a policy is attributable solely to, and within the control solely of, the insurer. It seems likely that most discoveries of loss or damage occur after issuance of the policy. In circumstances such as those presented here, where the discovery occurred before issuance of the policy, we find no persuasive reason to grant the benefit of the additional time to the insurer, who had exclusive control over the delay in typing and delivering the policy. Moreover, because a claim founded upon a title policy relies upon the policy's language, an insured could not institute a lawsuit prior to reviewing the policy. Although the insured may have discovered facts leading the insured to believe a claim existed, the insured could not be certain of the viability of the claim before reviewing the actual language contained in the policy."

[192] In Grill v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 2017 WL 344326 (Cal.App. 3 Dist.) (unpublished), the court held that the time limit for suit on the policy was tolled during the years in which the insurer was seeking to establish access for the insured, and began running on the day the insurer announced that it had completed the title clearance action. The insured said that the access obtained was not as insured. The insured's suit was barred because it was filed more than two years after the announcement date.

[193] In Grill v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 2017 WL 344326 (Cal.App. 3 Dist.) (unpublished), the court held that the time limit for suit on the policy began on the day the insurer announced that it had completed the title clearance action, which the insured said had not delivered title as insured. The insured's suit was barred because it was filed more than two years after the announcement date.

brought by the FDIC get a similar extended limitations period.[198]

The insured may also lose the right to sue the insurer based on doctrines intended to bring finality to litigation.[199] The insurer's right to bring a declaratory judgment action as to policy coverage, and the numerous bases for such an action, are discussed at §4.14.

[198] See Federal Deposit Ins. Corp. v. St. Louis Title, LLC, 2014 WL 200368 (E.D.Mo.) (unpublished), which held that, under FIRREA, contract claims may be brought by the FDIC by the later of six years after the claim accrued or the last date provided by state law (12 U.S.C. § 1821(d)(14)(A)(i)) and negligence actions within the later of three years after the date the claim accrued or the applicable state law deadline. 12 U.S .C. § 1821(d)(14)(A)(ii). The court said that the FDIC's claims "accrued" on the day on which it became the receiver for the failed institution.

[199] For example, in Mocco v. Frumento, 710 Fed.Appx. 535, 2017 WL 4231556 (3rd Cir. (N.J.)) (unpublished), the court employed the "entire controversy" doctrine to bar the insured from adding the title insurer to longstanding litigation over title on the eve of trial. New Jersey's entire controversy doctrine dictates that "a party cannot withhold part of a controversy for separate later litigation even when the withheld component is a separate and independently cognizable cause of action." The doctrine "applies in federal courts when there was a previous state-court action involving the same transaction." The purposes of the rule are to avoid piecemeal decisions about the same controversy, to promote fairness to all parties in the dispute and to avoid waste and delay. The court noted that the insurer had been harmed by being named years into the litigation in part because all claims that it might have brought against others were already time-barred.

3 Resolving Covered Claims

3.0 Insurer's Options In Resolving A Covered Claim

This chapter addresses the issues raised in the handling of covered claims. To determine whether or not a claim is covered, use the decision trees in Chapter 1 as a framework for analyzing the covered risks, exclusions, exceptions and other applicable policy terms.

Each parcel of real estate is unique. Thus, unlike other lines of insurance, in which losses are paid based on the cost of replacing the insured property or reconstructing it, the title insurer cannot replace the insured land with duplicate property. However, sometimes the insurer is able to remove the title defect by litigation or negotiation with a third party, or cure the title to the property.

The title insurance policy is written to give the insurer the necessary flexibility in resolving each covered claim in the most effective manner. The most commonly used forms of owner's policies give the insurer at least the following seven options for resolving a covered claim.[1] The insurer may:

1. Pay the insured his or her actual loss [Conditions 7(b)(ii) of the 2006 ALTA Owner's policy]. See §3.2 regarding payment of loss to the insured owner.

2. Defend an insured who has been sued [Conditions 5(a), 2006 ALTA Owner's policy].

[1] The ALTA Residential policy sets out six options in one list:

"4. OUR CHOICES WHEN YOU NOTIFY US OF A CLAIM

After we receive your claim notice or in any other way learn of a matter for which we are liable, we can do one or more of the following:

a. Pay the claim against your title.
b. Negotiate a settlement.
c. Prosecute or defend a court case related to the claim.
d. Pay you the amount required by this Policy.
e. Take other action which will protect you.
f. Cancel this policy by paying the Policy Amount, then in force, and only those costs, attorneys' fees and expenses incurred up to that time which we are obligated to pay."

See §3.3 and Chapter 4 regarding defense of an insured in litigation.

3. Prosecute an action on behalf of the insured to establish or clear title [Conditions 5(b) and 9(a), 2006 ALTA Owner's policy]. See §3.4 regarding clearing of title.

4. Pay the insured policy limits [Conditions 7(a), 2006 ALTA Owner's policy]. See §3.5 regarding payment of policy limits.

5. Pay the party adverse to the insured to remove the title defect [Conditions 5(b) and 7(b)(i), 2006 ALTA Owner's policy]. See §3.6 regarding payments to third parties.

6. Cure the insured's title by obtaining a deed, easement, release or other instrument [Conditions 5(b) and 7(b)(i), 2006 ALTA Owner's policy]. See §3.7 regarding this option.

7. Conduct watchful waiting, also known as meaningful monitoring. See §3.1.

In handing a claim under a loan policy, the insurer has two additional options:

8. Tender title to the property to the insured lender. See §3.4.6.1.

9. Purchase the Indebtedness from the insured lender. See §3.8.

In handling most claims, the insurer will have one or several of these options, but rarely if ever will all apply. When there is more than one option, the insurer has the right to choose which one it will exercise. Further, once the insurer has elected to solve the title issue in a particular fashion and has so notified the insured, it is entitled to pursue that option until completed. See the discussion of the final determination provision at §3.4.5. For example, a lender may argue that the insurer should pay off the holder of a junior lien rather than litigate to establish that the lien is defective or junior to the insured mortgage, but the insurer is entitled to complete the title clearance action and to indemnify the insured or remove the lien only if unsuccessful. See §3.4.6 for a discussion of title clearance for a lender.

3.1 Watchful Waiting

FORM 63, Appendix A
No present challenge to title

In some cases, the title insurer has the right, at its option, to respond to a covered claim by what the industry has termed "watchful waiting" or "meaningful monitoring." This option is not directly described in most forms of title insurance policies, but is at least implicitly recognized in the ALTA Homeowner's Policy.[2] Watchful waiting is the appropriate response when there is the potential for a loss but the policy coverage does not require the insurer to act until the happening of some further event.

The insurer may take the posture of watchful waiting when the insured's title is not being attacked, or is without defect as a matter of law.[3] In such cases, the insurer is not obligated to take affirmative action to confirm the insured's title merely because the insured seeks reassurance about or confirmation of its rights.

The insurer will often adopt watchful waiting in response to a claim under a loan policy when the claim concerns a matter affecting title, and not the validity, priority or enforceability of the insured mortgage, and the lender insured has not yet taken title to the property. For example, the existence of an easement on the property that is not excepted in the policy does not cause the lender a loss payable under the policy unless and until the lender becomes the owner of the property. See §3.2.4 and later sections for a complete discussion of the events that must occur before an insurer will take action on a claim made under a loan policy. Also see §7.9, which discusses how the loan policy continues in effect if the lender takes title to the property.

It is common for a title insurer to invoke watchful waiting in regard to a lien that will expire, or a right that will be extinguished on the passage of sufficient time.[4] For example, if a judgment will cease to be a lien against the property in a matter of months or years unless the judgment creditor locates the insured parcel and executes on it, the title insurer will commonly inform the insured that the insurer will wait to see if the creditor takes any action, and that the insured should give prompt notice if the creditor does take action. A common objection to the watchful waiting approach in this type of case is that the insured wishes to sell or mortgage the property and wants the lien issue resolved. The insurer will often agree to insure the title or to issue a letter of indemnity to another title insurer to assist the insured in closing that transaction. See §3.4.4 for a complete discussion of that issue.

[2] Condition 4(a) of the ALTA Homeowner's Policy lists the insurer's eight options for resolving a covered claim. Option 8 is to "[t]ake other appropriate action," which should be deemed to include watchful waiting.

[3] In First Bank Texas, SSB v. W.D. Welch, P.C., 2017 WL 2443132 (Tex.App.-Dallas) (unpublished), the court held as a matter of law that the insured deed of trust had priority over an intervening state tax lien by equitable subrogation. It said the insured could suffer no loss payable under the policy, and the insurer was not required to reimburse the lender for money it paid to buy a confirming subordination of the lien. In Haines v. Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 2008 WY 31, 178 P.3d 1086 (Wyo. 2008), the Wyoming Supreme Court ruled that an insurer was not required to obtain a recorded easement for the insured to give her a better access right than the property had ever enjoyed. Access was via a long-established road and the insured had not been precluded from using the road to travel to her property. In Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co. v. Nelson, 889 S.W.2d 312 (Tex.App.-Houston 1994), the court held that the insurer owed no duty to act or to indemnify the insureds, because they held a valid first lien as insured. In Wei v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2018 WL 1870400 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), the court said the insurer had no duty to take affirmative action when a fence encroached into the insured parcel, because there was no evidence that the neighbor installed the fence or claimed ownership of any of the insured parcel based on the fence.

[4] For example, in Village Carver Phase I, LLC v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 128 So.3d 107 (Fla.App. 3 Dist. 2013), the insurer was found to have no duty to remove or indemnify against an easement that had become unenforceable by passage of time under the Florida Marketable Record Title to Real Property Act.

Another type of claim in which the insurer will commonly elect to conduct watchful waiting is a claimed defect in title that does not clearly benefit an identified party, or that will be cured by passage of time under a curative or marketable title law.[5] One court observed that, in its opinion, a title insurer may resolve a covered claim in one of three ways: by paying loss to the insured, clearing title, or by "show[ing] that the alleged unmarketability or other title problems do not really exist, and thus there is no way in which the insured could sustain any loss."[6] Members of the land title industry have worked hard for decades to have marketable title laws adopted in order to free title of ancient defects. Some laws bar claims in the manner of statutes of limitation. Other statutes are framed as marketable title laws, which protect a marketable title from adverse claims, even legitimate property rights, after an unbroken chain of a certain duration. A common example of this type of title defect is a deficiency in the conveyance to the insured, such as a defective or incomplete acknowledgment.[7] The insurer will typically write to the insured to explain why the claimed defect in title is not a true title defect, or why it has been or will be erased by a curative or marketable title law. When the claimed title defect has already been cured by law, or is not a legitimate defect, the insurer should refrain from issuing a letter of indemnity to another title insurer to "paper over" the issue, since the other insurer does not need an indemnity in order to make the decision not to raise the defect.

Another common situation in which title insurers employ watchful waiting is when the passage of time will cause the insured's rights to ripen into a valid and defensible interest in land, such as adverse possession or a prescriptive easement. In such cases, the assertion of a right before it has ripened will typically be self-defeating, or cause the right not to ripen. For example, an insured may be concerned that a recent survey has disclosed that the insured's house encroaches onto the neighboring parcel. If that issue is covered by the policy, the insurer might inform the insured that it will not take action at present because the insured will likely establish adverse possession if the encroachment continues for some further period of time.

Watchful waiting is often appropriate when the coverage invoked by the claim indemnifies against the forced removal of a structure. The insurer is entitled to respond to the claim by informing

[5] In Osprey Landing, LLC v. First American Title Ins. Co., 157 A.3d 247, 2017 ME 46 (Maine 2017), the court held that a title insurer was not required to take action to protect its insured from an affidavit by a former owner of the property, recorded after the policy date, that asserted that members of the public might have a prescriptive easement over the property based on their historical use of a path. The insurer correctly responded to the claim by watchful waiting. The court said that the insured did not identify a person or group who could assert the prescriptive easement threatened by the affidavit, rendering the title issue "merely hypothetical, as is any loss or damage due to the hypothetical encumbrance." 157 A.3d at 251. In Chesapeake Land Development Company LLC v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2017 WL 5930295 (W.D.Okla.) (unpublished), the court held that, if the insurer could prove that a use restriction had outlawed under the marketable record title act, it would not be an encumbrance on title that invoked policy coverage. In a later decision, the same court held that the use restriction had not lapsed under the Oklahoma Marketable Record Title Act. Chesapeake Land Development Company LLC v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2018 WL 2269939 (W.D.Okla. 2018) (unpublished).

See Basye, Clearing Land Titles, 3rd Edition, West Publishing Company, for a detailed analysis of title curative laws in all 50 states.

the insured that it will conduct watchful waiting until the other party takes action to force the removal of the structure.[8] In the seminal decision, Manneck v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp.,[9] the policy protected against a final judgment enforcing removal of "structures" located on the property. No such order had been entered when the insured submitted a claim notice to the insurer. The court held that the insurer was not obligated to take affirmative action to clear or defend title but was, rather, entitled to wait to indemnify the insured only if and when an order was entered forcing the removal of the structures.

Watchful waiting is also an appropriate response concerning the insured's structures that encroach onto adjoining land and as to which there is no ongoing dispute.[10] Most such encroachments do not rise to the level of encumbrances on title, and most forms of title insurance policies do not provide affirmative protection against encroachments by the insured onto neighboring land (the Homeowner's policy being the primary exception). Absent such affirmative coverage, the insurer has no duty to cure or legitimize the encroachment or to pay the insured, because he or she has not suffered a loss.[11] In Fee v. Stahley,[12] although the insureds' septic cleanout, fence and part of their driveway were likely on their neighbor's land, the court held that the insurer

[8] In Trinder v. Connecticut Attorneys Title Ins. Co., 2011 VT 46, 22 A.3d 493 (Vt. 2011), the court cited Manneck in finding that letters from a neighbor saying that structures encroaching onto its property were there by permission, which could be revoked, were not "forced removal" triggering a duty to act under the forced removal coverage of the Residential owner's policy. The court said: "We conclude that the language of the clause is unambiguous and by its terms applies only to situations where an insured is 'forced to remove' structures that encroach on the property of another. To require coverage in situations where a structure is on neighboring land, but the neighbor has not affirmatively sought its removal, would extend the policy beyond its terms. … The clause is inapplicable here because the museum took no action to force homeowners to remove their septic system. The museum did not revoke permission to have the septic system on its property, nor did it demand removal by letter or through court action. That homeowners wished to resolve the uncertainty before the situation reached that level is understandable, but does not result in coverage that is beyond the terms of the policy. We need not reach homeowners' argument that potential imminent damage is synonymous with forced removal and could trigger coverage because under the facts found by the trial court there was no such impending demolition of homeowner's septic system in this case." In Johnston v. Connecticut Attorneys Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 1494016 (D.Vt. 2014) (unpublished), the court found that the insurer was entitled to conduct watchful waiting as a response to the neighbor's demand that the insured remove his encroaching structures. The court also held that the insurer's warning to the insureds not to invite a lawsuit was not a bad faith act. In In Wei v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2018 WL 1870400 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), the court said the insurer had no duty to take affirmative action due to the encroachment of the insured's garage onto neighboring land, because the sole coverage for that issue was Covered Risk 18 of the Homeowner's policy, which protects against forced removal of a structure, relying on Manneck.

[10] Trinder v. Connecticut Attorneys Title Ins. Co., 2011 VT 46, 22 A.3d 493 (Vt. 2011) (neighbor sent permission letter as to encroaching structures but did not require their removal; forced removal coverage not triggered).

[11] In Ky v. GOB Construction, Inc., 136 So.3d 1020 (Table), 2014 WL 1717454 (La.App. 3 Cir.) (unpublished), the court found that the fact that the insured's house encroached slightly into a setback line imposed by private restrictions and the zoning code had not caused him to suffer a loss, and dismissed his lawsuit demanding that the insurer indemnify him. The court noted: "Ky testified in his deposition that he hasn't suffered any loss at this time, but his fear is that he will suffer a loss in the future. This fear is not evidence of an actual loss."

had no duty to take affirmative action because "nobody has demanded that appellants remove any structures." Further, it said, "because appellants have suffered no loss, their claim is currently either improper or premature."

Similarly, watchful waiting is also an appropriate response concerning a neighbor's structures encroaching onto the insured's property as to which there is no ongoing dispute. In Eliopoulos v. Nations Title Ins. of New York,[13] the insured learned that there were encroachments onto the insured property by improvements belonging to adjoining owners. The insured demanded that the insurer clear and defend title. The insurer refused, because no action to assert the alleged encroachments had been taken by any adverse party. The court affirmed summary judgment in the insurer's favor. It held that the encroachments amounted to mere "perceived" encumbrances, and that the insurer had no "affirmative duty to clear title" in such a situation.[14] The court also noted that no action or proceeding had been begun against the insured which required a defense.

However, the lack of a pending or open dispute does not always suggest that watchful waiting is the best strategy for protecting the insured's rights. For example, if the claim involves a neighbor's use of a driveway crossing the insured property, and that matter is covered by the policy, it might be a mistake to allow that use to continue until it ripens into a prescriptive easement. In such a case, the insurer might instead elect to take the appropriate action to prevent that use from ripening into an enforceable easement. Also, when the title defect could be resolved in pending litigation, and that opportunity will be lost or waived if the issue is not joined, the title insurer will typically elect to clear title through the lawsuit rather than to conduct watchful waiting.[15]

3.2 Payment Of Loss To Insured

One of the insurer's options for resolving a covered claim is to pay a loss to the insured. The more mechanical aspects of loss payment are discussed at §2.9. This section discusses how the insurer evaluates payment of loss and calculates the amount payable. Loss is payable within 30 days after the amount of loss has become definite and fixed, as further discussed in §2.9.

The 1970 ALTA policy forms stated that the insurer indemnified the insured for "actual loss," but did not define the term. The 1992 and later ALTA policies inserted the explanation that loss is measured as the lesser of policy limits or "the difference between the value of the insured estate or interest as insured and the value of the insured estate or interest subject to the defect, lien or [14] Eliopolous was distinguished in Busch v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 84 A.D.3d 1561, 923 N.Y.S.2d 280 (A.D. 3 Dept. 2011), in which the court held the insurer was not entitled to conduct watchful waiting. In Busch, the insured faced an imminent threat by neighbors to construct a roadway on the insured's property, which the insured felt compelled to prevent by suing for an injunction, and the neighbors responded with counterclaims attacking title. The court said that no such imminent threat had existed in Eliopolous.

[15] For example, a lender might be able to extinguish a competing lien in a judicial foreclosure by equitable subrogation, but would waive that ability by not joining the lender and raising the issue in the present action. In such a case, watchful waiting or a letter of indemnity might frustrate the insurer's ability to clear title. See §3.4.7.3 concerning equitable subrogation.

encumbrance insured against by this policy."[16] The loan policy adds the condition that the loss payable may not exceed the amount of the debt owed to the insured lender.[17]

The sections below discuss the measure of loss under a leasehold policy or endorsement (§3.2.1), the owner's policy provision stating that a loss paid under a loan policy or to extinguish a mortgage loan incurred by the insured reduces the amount of the owner's policy (§3.2.2), loss payable under an owner's policy (§3.2.3), and loss payable under a loan policy (§3.2.4).

3.2.1 Leasehold Policy Damages

A leasehold estate is the right to possess property for a stated term. When that right of possession is lost, its value is determined differently from that of a fee simple interest. When a fee title to land is lost, the measure of loss is the value of the land. The value of a leasehold estate, by contrast, is measured as the margin between fair market rental cost and the actual rental fixed in the lost lease, over the lease term. In addition, the tenant will incur moving and related expenses in moving from the current space to an alternate site.

The American Land Title Association promulgated separate leasehold owner's and loan policies in 1975, which were amended from time to time, with the last revision in 1992. In October, 2001, the American Land Title Association adopted the ALTA 13 Leasehold Owner's Endorsement and ALTA 13.1 Leasehold Loan Endorsement. ALTA withdrew the 1992 ALTA Leasehold and Leasehold Loan policies at that time.[18] The ALTA 13 endorsements have been modified several times since 2001. The most recent versions are known as the ALTA 13-06, for owner's policies, and the 13.1-06, for loan policies, both of which were adopted on April 2, 2012.[19]

The most important change from the former policies to the endorsements concerns the measure of loss. The main criticism of the leasehold policies was that the primary element of loss found in Conditions and Stipulations 14 of the policies was the difference between fair market rent and the rent payable under the insured lease. If the insured lease was at market rate, that element of damage would have a zero value. See the discussion of the leasehold policies below.

[16] Conditions & Stipulations 7(a)(ii), 1992 ALTA Owner's and Loan policies. The 2006 ALTA Owner's and Loan policies use a nearly identical statement in Conditions 8(a): "the difference between the value of the Title as insured and the value of the Title subject to the risk insured against by this policy." The ALTA Homeowner's Policy, however, uses language similar to the 1970 policy form, saying only that the insurer will pay "Your actual loss… ." Conditions 6(a)(i). Similarly, the ALTA Residential Policy says "[w]e will pay up to your actual loss or the Policy Amount in force when the claim is made -- whichever is less." Conditions 6(a). "Actual loss" is not a defined term in either of those policies.

[17] Conditions & Stipulations 7(a)(ii) of the 1992 ALTA Loan policy describes this third measure of loss as: "the amount of the unpaid principal indebtedness secured by the insured mortgage as limited or provided under Section 8 of these Conditions and Stipulations or as reduced under Section 9 of these Conditions and Stipulations, at the time the loss or damage insured against by this policy occurs, together with interest thereon ... ." Conditions 8(a)(ii) of the 2006 ALTA Loan policy uses the much shorter description that loss is limited to "the Indebtedness," but "Indebtedness" is a defined term in the 2006 policy. See the discussion of that definition at §3.8.

[18] See John C. Murray, The 2001 Leasehold Endorsements For Owner's and Lender's Policies, 22 The Practical Real Estate Lawyer No. 3 (May 2006), p. 53 (providing comprehensive explanation of the new forms).

[19] The endorsements are found in Appendix B.

The measure of loss under the leasehold endorsements is different. Under the endorsements, if the lessee is evicted,[20] the value of the leasehold estate is measured as the remaining lease term plus any Tenant Leasehold Improvements[21] on the date of the eviction, less any "salvage value" and excluding rent "no longer required to be paid for the Remaining Lease Term." The endorsement does not describe the method to be used to value the tenant improvements or "salvage value." However, the leasehold estate and tenant improvements can be valued independently. "In short, the methods for valuing a loss and its deductions under this new endorsement are left to negotiation between the insured and title insurer when adjusting a claim."[22]

The ALTA 13 endorsement also provides for payment of other elements of loss. Perhaps the most significant is soft costs incurred in eviction and in locating replacement space. The list of additional elements of loss is found in paragraph 4 of the endorsement, which roughly corresponds to paragraph 15 of the 1992 ALTA policy, as discussed below.[23]

The ALTA 13 endorsement does not replace the policy measure of loss (Conditions & Stipulations 7(a) of the 1992 ALTA policies; Conditions 8(a) of the 2006 ALTA policies). Thus, Paragraph 1(a).

[21] "Tenant Leasehold Improvements": Those improvements, including landscaping, required or permitted to be built on the land by the Lease that have been built at the insured's expense or in which the insured has an interest greater than the right to possession during the Lease Term.

[23] "4. Additional items of loss covered by this endorsement: If the insured is Evicted, the following items of loss, if applicable, shall be included in computing loss or damage incurred by the insured, but not to the extent that the same are included in the valuation of the estates or interests insured by this policy. a. The reasonable cost of removing and relocating any Personal Property that the insured has the right to remove and relocate, situated on the land at the time of eviction, the cost of transportation of that Personal Property for the initial 100 miles incurred in connection with the relocation, and the reasonable cost of repairing the Personal Property damaged by reason of the removal and relocation. b. Rent or damages for use and occupancy of the land prior to the eviction which the insured as owner of the Leasehold Estate is obligated to pay to any person having paramount title to that of the lessor in the Lease. c. The amount of rent that, by the terms of the Lease, the insured must continue to pay to the lessor after eviction with respect to the portion of the Leasehold Estate and Tenant Leasehold Improvements from which the insured has been Evicted. d. The fair market value, at the time of the eviction, of the estate or interest of the insured in any lease or sublease made by the insured as lessor of all or part of the Leasehold Estate or the Tenant Leasehold Improvements. e. Damages that the insured is obligated to pay to lessees or sublessees on account of the breach of any lease or sublease made by the insured as lessor of all or part of the Leasehold Estate or the Tenant Leasehold Improvements caused by the eviction. f. Reasonable costs incurred by the insured to secure a replacement leasehold equivalent to the Leasehold Estate. g. If Tenant Leasehold Improvements are not substantially completed at the time of eviction, the actual cost incurred by the insured, less the salvage value, for the Tenant Leasehold Improvements up to the time of eviction. Those costs include costs incurred to obtain land use, zoning, building and occupancy permits, architectural and engineering fees, construction management fees, costs of environmental testing and reviews, landscaping costs and fees, costs and interest on loans for the acquisition and construction."

> Section 7(a) still applies if it is not inconsistent with the ALTA 13. Section 7(a)(ii) imposes a standard for indemnification for actual loss, but does not go so far as to impose a method of valuing the estate or interest. Indeed, it is the more flexible standard that many leasehold title insurance customers sought by ordering an owner's policy instead of the leasehold policy.[24]

The 2001 ALTA endorsement, which was drafted to become part of the 1992 ALTA policy, eliminated one aspect of the coinsurance provision in the 1992 ALTA Owner's policy, found in Conditions & Stipulations 7(a). It did not remove the coinsurance provision found in Conditions 7(b), however.[25] The coinsurance provision is not found in the 2006 ALTA policies, and therefore the reference to that provision has since been eliminated from the endorsement.

As was stated above, the primary measure of loss under the now-withdrawn ALTA leasehold owner's and loan policies was the difference between the fair market rental value of the leased space and rent actually paid under the insured lease.[26] The policy provided a method for the valuation of the leasehold estate.[27] In order to sustain a loss as to the lease rate, the lessee was required to [25] Mr. Bozarth writes: "However, Section 2 of the ALTA 13 may mislead the incautious insured. It does provide that the coinsurance limitations on coverage contained in Section 7(b) of the policy do not apply to the Leasehold Estate but does not make Section 7(b) inapplicable to Tenant Leasehold Improvements. If Leasehold Estates and Tenant Leasehold improvements are independent, primary items of loss, then Section 7(b) still must apply to the Tenant Leasehold Improvements. This shouldn't be too alarming. If the insured owns or builds Tenant Leasehold Improvements at the outset of the leasehold estate, it should have an investment or purchase value for those assets. It has not bargained to rent them for the term of the leasehold estate. I think the coinsurance limitations are a lot more benign than their reputation suggests. Section 7(b) does not limit the title company's duty to defend if Section 7(b) applies, and the insured is not obligated to share in the costs of its defense. That duty of the title insurer is not as clear when the coinsurance provisions are missing. Indeed, there is an argument that a title insurer could deny a claim if there is no coinsurance provision in the policy by claiming that information material to the risk (the value of the property sets the magnitude of the risk) was withheld from it when the policy was issued. The title insurer cannot do that under Section 7(b). The worst that can happen under Section 7(b) is that a loss may be prorated if the title insurer is liable to pay a loss, or the title insurer may seek a contribution toward settlement of a claim. If the insured worked a savings on its title insurance premium at the outset by undervaluing its exposure, it seems fair to prorate its recovery under the policy if a claim arises." Id.

[27] "14. VALUATION OF ESTATE OR INTEREST INSURED. If, in computing loss or damage incurred by the insured, it becomes necessary to determine the value of the estate or interest insured by this policy, the value shall consist of the then present worth of the excess, if any, of the fair market rental value of the estate or interest, undiminished by any matters for which claim is made, for that part of the term stated in Schedule A then remaining plus any renewal or extended term for which a valid option to renew or extend is contained in the Lease, over the value of the rent and other consideration required to be paid under the Lease for the same period."

establish that the present value of the rental expense over the life of the insured lease would be less than the present value of the cost to rent comparable space. If the lease was exactly at market rate for the entire life of the lease, the owner would have no "equity" in the lease and would not incur any additional rental expense under a new lease for other space.

The second type of loss described under the policy was moving and related expenses. The leasehold policy provided:

> 15. MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS OF LOSS.
>
> In the event the insured is evicted from possession of all or a part of the land by reason of any matters insured against by this policy, the following, if applicable, shall be included in computing loss or damage incurred by the insured, but not to the extent that the same are included in the valuation of the estate or interest insured by this policy.
>
> (a) The reasonable cost of removing and relocating any personal property which the insured has the right to remove and relocate, situated on the land at the time of eviction, the cost of transportation of that personal property for the initial twenty-five miles incurred in connection with the relocation, and the reasonable cost of repairing the personal property damaged by reason of the removal and relocation. The costs referred to above shall not exceed in the aggregate the value of the personal property prior to its removal and relocation.
> "Personal property," above referred to, shall mean chattels and property which because of its character and manner of affixation to the land, can be severed therefrom without causing appreciable damage to the property severed or to the land to which the property is affixed.

> (c) The amount of rent which, by the terms of the Lease, the insured must continue to pay to the lessor after eviction for the land, or part thereof, from which the insured has been evicted.
> (d) The fair market value, at the time of the eviction, of the estate or interest of the insured in any sublease of all or part of the land existing at the date of the eviction.
>
> (e) Damages which the insured may be obligated to pay to any sublessee on account of the breach of any sublease of all or part of the land caused by the eviction.

These expenses are similar to those found in the ALTA 13 endorsements.

Paragraph (a) covers some moving expenses. The primary limitations are that the expense payable is for no more than a 25-mile move, and the amount payable is not more than the value of the property being moved.

Items (b) and (c) cover rentals. These items apply when the source of the claim is that the lessor is not the true owner of the fee simple. In that event, rent paid to the true owner (not under the lease) before eviction is covered by item (b). Rent paid to the lessor under the insured lease after eviction (that is, after the benefit of possession has been relinquished) is payable under item (c).

The last two elements of damage involve subleases. Under item (d), the insurer is liable for the fair market value of any sublease estate. Fair market value is not defined but, by reference to paragraph 14, will ordinarily be the excess in value between the cost of renting the space and the income received under the sublease. This value should be determined over the remaining term of the sublease, discounted to present value. The second element of loss as to a sublease is any payment that the insured must make to the sublessee for its eviction resulting from the title defect.[28]

3.2.2 Owner's And Loan Policies Noncumulative

The ALTA Owner's policies provide that the amount of insurance is reduced by the amount of any payment made by the insurer to the holder of a mortgage "to which exception is taken in Schedule B or to which the Insured has agreed, assumed, or taken subject, or which is executed by an Insured after Date of Policy and which is a charge or lien on the Title, and the amount so paid shall be deemed a payment to the Insured under this policy."[29] This has been termed the "liability noncumulative" provision of the owner's policy. This provision acknowledges that a payment by the insurer that pays a debt owed by the insured owner, or that removes a lien on the property that the insured assumed or to which it took subject, confers a benefit on the owner in the amount of the debt or lien.

The noncumulative provision also serves a purpose similar to a lender loss payee endorsement on a homeowner's insurance policy. Such a loss payee endorsement confers on the lender the right to be paid if a loss is incurred under the policy. With title insurance policies, the lender has the right to obtain its own policy. Thus, owner's and loan policies are distinct, and the loan policy is not merely a rider to the owner's.[30] However, if title to the property fails, the owner and lender each suffer loss only to the extent of their respective interests, and the insurer is not required to pay, in total, more than the value of the property or the amount of the larger of the outstanding policies. Therefore, the owner's policies declare that a payment to an insured lender, or the holder of a lien on the insured property, reduces the amount of insurance to the owner by the amount of the payment and that payment is deemed a payment to the owner. Courts have enforced

[28] In Morris Builders, L.P. v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 2017 WL 5032996 (S.D.N.Y.) (unpublished), the court held preliminarily that the coverage for sublease termination fees might cover a $250,000 "break-up fee" that the insured paid to a subtenant when it terminated the sublease, allegedly due to a covered title issue.

[29] Condition 11, 2006 ALTA Owner's policy.

[30] The exception to this rule is created by the ALTA 16 Mezzanine endorsement, in which the owner insured specifically assigns to the mezzanine lender the right to receive any claim payable to the owner, subject to the terms of the endorsement. The court construed an ALTA 16 endorsement in 16th & K Hotel, LP v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 276 F.R.D. 8 (D.D.C. 2011), and characterized the mezzanine lender as a loss payee under the owner's policy.

this provision by reducing the owner's policy amount by the sum paid by the title insurer to a lender.[31]

The loan policy is not similarly reduced by any payment that the insurer makes to the owner. In fact, one court found that an insured lender was not a necessary party to the coverage suit brought by the insured owner, because any payment to the owner in that suit would not reduce the insurer's liability to the lender.[32] Nonetheless, once a loss is found to be payable to an owner, the owner's policy permits the insurer to make that payment, or part of it, to a lender insured or holder of a mortgage on the property.

When the insurer will pay off a mortgage holder or make a payment to an insured lender, the insurer will typically tell the owner in advance of its intent to pay off the lien or debt, and to explain what amount, if any, the insurer will pay to the insured owner. The insurer will ordinarily expect to receive a release from both insureds on payment of the loss.

When loss payments are made to both owner and lender insureds, the loan policy is reduced by the amount paid to the lender. The owner's policy is reduced by the amounts paid to both insureds, because the payment to the lender eliminates or reduces a debt owed by the owner. For example, assume that the property value, in its state as insured, is $100,000, and the owner's policy is in that amount also. The covered matter, however, reduces the value of the property to $65,000. The insurer pays the diminution in value of $35,000. Further assume that $15,000 is paid to an insured lender in full satisfaction of its debt, and the balance of $20,000 is paid to the owner. The loan policy is extinguished by the payment in full of the debt. The owner receives $20,000 as a diminution payment. The payment to the lender gives the owner 100% of the equity in the property. The owner is deemed to have received a payment of $35,000. He or she now holds unencumbered title to property worth $65,000, which is also the reduced policy amount.

Conditions & Stipulations 10 of the 1992 ALTA Loan policy stated that, if the insured acquired title to the property, "payment by the insurer to a lender holding a lien on the property senior to" the mortgage insured reduced the policy amount by the amount of the payment to the senior lien holder. The premise of this provision was that any loss payment to the senior lender [31] In Marchetti v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 829 F.3d 498 (7th Cir. (Ill.) 2016), the insurer paid the insured lender an amount at least equal to the value of the real estate, and obtained a release of the borrower-insureds' liability under the note, which the court found fully satisfied the insurer's duty under the owner's policy. The court also held that the insurer had made the insured owners whole, and was entitled to their rights by subrogation. The noncumulative provision was discussed in L. Smirlock Realty Corp. Title Guar. Co., 418 N.E.2d 650 (N.Y. 1981), subs.app. 469 N.Y.S.2d 415 (N.Y.A.D. 1983), in which the insurer was permitted to credit payment to the lender against liability to the owner, but not allowed to seek further setoff as to the owner for additional beneficial effects from the removal of the mortgage. In Gray v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 27 A.3d 852 (N.H. 2011), the insurer paid a lender in full when title failed, but did not pay the insured owner. The court did not discuss the noncumulative provision directly, but did hold that the insured owner had not proven a loss.

[32] Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. West, 110 Md.App. 114, 676 A.2d 953, 967 (1996). In West, the court found that the noncumulative provision did not make the lender a necessary party in a suit regarding the owner's coverage: "This provision does not reduce the amount of coverage on Margaretten's lender's policy by the amount paid to the Wests under their Policy. Instead, it only reduces the amount of coverage on the Wests' Policy by any amount paid to a mortgagee, such as Margaretten, under a lender's policy." Nonetheless, an insurer should have the right to add the lender to a coverage action so that the suit determines the lender's right, if any, to policy proceeds.

would increase the equity in the property to which the insured junior lien would attach. However, it is common for a first lien debt to be more than the amount of a second lien debt. Thus, a payment to the senior lender is sometimes more than the amount of a junior mortgage policy. This policy provision thus frequently meant that a payment to the senior lender extinguished the policy issued to the junior lender. Conditions & Stipulations 10 was excised from the 2006 ALTA Loan policy. ALTA's explanation for the 2006 change was that a lender "could totally lose coverage without having benefited from any payment made under the policy… ."[33] The elimination of the noncumulative provision from the loan policy can affect the calculation made in the handling of certain claims. When the insurer has received claims from both a senior and junior lender, and the junior lender holds a 2006 ALTA policy, even full payment to the senior lender will not resolve the claim brought by the junior lender. Thus, if the cost to cure the title defect is more than the indebtedness under the senior lender's policy but less than the aggregate of the two insureds' debt, the claim administrator will often elect to cure the defect rather than pay the insureds.

3.2.3 Determining Amount Of Loss On An Owner's Policy

An owner's policy indemnifies the insured against actual monetary loss or damage the owner incurs as a result of a defect, lien, encumbrance or other matter covered by the policy. The policy is one of indemnity, not guaranty. See §9.1.2 on that subject. The policy also does not insure the value of the property.[34] Generally, there is no loss payable unless there is both a covered title issue and a resulting diminution in the value of the insured property.[35] However, when an owner was pursuing a claim of loss after having been foreclosed out of the property, it was held proper to consider whether or not the owner had any equity in the property which would have been lost by paying off a judgment not shown on the policy.[36] Insureds who recovered against their sellers in an arbitration over a claimed title defect were precluded by the doctrine of collateral estoppel from suing the insurer for the same damages.[37]

[35] There is no duty to indemnify an insured when there is no evidence that the defect lessens the value of the property. For example, in Summer Pond Properties, Inc. v. Transamerica Title Ins. Co., 1998 WL 283052 (Wash.App.Div. 1) (unpublished), the policy mistakenly included some land which the seller did not own and which the insurer argued the insured had not intended to purchase. The trial court found that the insured had failed to submit credible evidence of the value of the land. The appellate court affirmed, finding that the insurer did not owe anything because the insured had failed to establish a value for the parcel mistakenly insured. In Zeiger v. Shons, 2001 WL 470175 (Ohio App. 8 Dist.) (unpublished), the court said the insured had not suffered a loss due to the fact that the insured parcel was smaller than the insured had thought, when his own appraiser put the value of the property actually owned by the insured at more than policy limits. The "no loss" exclusion, 3(c), states in the negative that there is no coverage if the insured does not suffer a loss in the value of the property. That exclusion is analyzed at §11.4.

3.2.3.1 Partial Loss Under An Owner's Policy

There are several types of losses that may be considered to be a partial loss of title. There are also different means of measuring such a loss, depending on the title issue. See §3.2.3.1.3 for a general discussion of the two primary methods for valuing a loss, which are the difference in value with and without the defect or encumbrance and the cost to cure the defect. The following sections will discuss the resolution of owner policy claims other than for a complete failure of title, arranged by the nature of the claim issue.

3.2.3.1.1 Lesser Estate Than As Insured

When the insured does not hold the estate or interest in the land as insured by the policy, the measure of loss is either the difference in value between the estate insured and the one actually possessed by the insured, or the cost of obtaining the insured estate.[38] When the policy insures fee simple title but the insured holds a leasehold estate only, loss is measured as the difference in value between the fee simple estate and the leasehold estate.[39] When the policy insures ownership of the mineral estate, but the insured does not have that estate, loss is measured as the value of the mineral estate, including such leases and other income rights that attach to it on the date of loss.[40] The subject of the insured's estate in the land is fully discussed at §8.1.

When the covered matter is the failure of title to an undivided interest in the fee simple title, such as a half interest of a tenant in common, or the failure of the insured mortgage to encumber such an undivided interest in the property, loss is measured as the percentage or fractional share to which title has failed in relation to the full value of the property on the date of loss.[41] The fact that the insured does not have title to the complete estate does not render the interest it does hold [38] See Bar-K, Inc. v. Security Title Corp., 2010 WL 3333391 (Cal.App. 1 Dist.) (unpublished), in which the insurer purchased the insured estate for the benefit of the insured, and the court determined that no further loss was payable by the insurer.

[39] Rancher's Life Ins. Co. v. Banker's Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 190 So.2d 897 (Miss. 1966). In Gauler v. Solicitors' Loan & Trust Co., 9 Pa. County Ct. 634 (1891), involving a policy with terms quite different from a modern ALTA policy, the insured paid for a ground lease, but failed to get title to the ground which was leased. The court awarded as loss the full cumulative lost income from the lease.

[40] In May v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 422 S.W.3d 93 (Tex.App.-Houston (14 Dist.) 2014), the several insureds owned residential lots that had been subdivided from one large parcel that had been leased for oil, gas, and other minerals. The lot owners were insured as owning the full mineral estate, but in fact only held a half interest in the minerals. The court approved an award of the lease signing bonus and the value of the lease royalty, per net mineral acre, divided in half because the insureds owned half of the minerals, and then divided between the insureds based on the net mineral acres that they each owned.

[41] See May v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 422 S.W.3d 93 (Tex.App.-Houston (14 Dist.) 2014), in which the court valued the entire mineral interest as insured, then divided that value in two because the insureds owned a half interest in the minerals only. However, in In re D'Anna, 548 B.R. 155 (Bkcy.E.D.La. 2016), the court ruled that the insured owner was entitled to collect policy limits from her title insurer for the loss of a one-sixth interest in the property, based on a convoluted analysis bolstered by a misinterpretation of a quote from a title insurance book. The court simply refused to acknowledge that the one-sixth interest was anything less than a complete failure of title.

worthless, because the insured may sell the property, either under an agreement with the other owner or at the direction of a court order for a partition sale. The market value of the property is not affected by the fact that title is held by tenants in common, only one of which is the insured. Therefore, if the insured obtained good title to a half interest only, loss equals one-half of the value of the property on the date of loss. It is incorrect and unnecessary to seek with-and-without valuations, as is done when the covered matter is an encumbrance on title, or title to a portion of the land is lost in full.[42] In some circumstances, the insurer may offer to pay the cost of obtaining a court order commanding the non-insured undivided interest owner to cooperate in a partition sale.

3.2.3.1.2 Loss Of Title To Portion Of Land

When title to a part of the insured land is not held by the insured, the measure of loss is typically the difference in value between the entire parcel as insured and the parcel actually owned by the insured.[43] However, when the parcel whose title is lost is a separate parcel, it is commonly appropriate to measure loss as the value of the lost land as a separate parcel.[44]

The insurer has the alternative, in some cases, of acquiring title to the lost land for the insured. See §3.4 for a complete discussion of title clearance, and §3.7 concerning the insurer's right to buy land for the insured. The insurer is not required to pay a price for the lost property that far exceeds the land's true value. Nor is the insured entitled to purchase the land at whatever price the seller demands, and then be fully reimbursed by the insurer, as discussed at §3.7. Rather, loss is always measured as the true value of the lost parcel. The insurer will typically either pay the true diminution value to the insured as loss, or to the property owner to acquire the land, in which latter case no loss is payable to the insured.

[42] In Commercial Credit Plan, Inc. v. Estate of Smith, 1998 WL 312855 (Tenn.App.) (unpublished), the insured lender held a mortgage on a one-half interest rather than the full fee title. The insured's appraiser opined that the mortgaged estate was worthless because it could not be sold, but later admitted that he was unaware that a tenancy in common may be partitioned. Therefore, the appellate court remanded to require the insured to establish the true value of the mortgaged estate.

Co.*, 712 S.E.2d 531 (Ga.App. 2011) (court accepted valuation of only the parcel whose title failed, when policy insured another contiguous parcel but each was a separate buildable parcel). In Hartman v. Shambaugh, 96 N.M. 359, 630 P.2d 758 (1981), the court said: "The value of the real estate has been determined in other jurisdictions in two primary manners. Annot., 60 A.L.R.2d 972 (1958). One is simply to determine the value of the property to which title failed. Kentucky Title Co. v. Hail, 219 Ky. 256, 292 S.W. 817 (1927). This solution may apply where the value of the entire tract is not diminished, except by the percentage loss, such as with open ranchland. It is not proper where the value of the entire tract may be disproportionately diminished, such as with urban property." In Lauritzen v. First American Title Ins. Co., 424 P.3d 1043, 2018 UT App 58 (Utah App. 2018), the insured owned five parcels. There was a record overlap affecting one parcel. The court rejected the insured's assertion that he could recover for a claimed loss to the other parcels, on the theory that the aggregate value of the lots was lower due to the covered overlap. The court said that only the diminution in value to the affected lot would be considered at trial.

Also, when the insured purchases the lost land before tendering a claim to the insurer, or without the insurer's written consent given in advance, the voluntary settlement provision will ordinarily apply, meaning that the insurer is not required to reimburse the insured. The voluntary settlement provision is discussed at §2.14.

3.2.3.1.3 Encumbrances

All title insurance policies indemnify the insured against encumbrances on title. See §9.6 for a discussion of the scope of the covered risk concerning encumbrances, such as easement and restrictions. An encumbrance may sometimes be defeated or declared unenforceable because it does not impart constructive notice, is recorded outside the chain of title, is deficient under the Statute of Frauds, has expired or may not be enforced due to a statute of limitations.[45] See §3.4.7.6, which discusses instruments that do not impart constructive notice. Restrictions based on race, color or creed are unconstitutional and unenforceable as a matter of law.[46]

When title is subject to an unexcepted encumbrance, the most common statement is that actual loss equals the difference in the value of the estate as insured (i.e., without the encumbrance) and with the encumbrance.[47] When the title defect is an easement, the loss is equal to the value of the entire parcel as if the easement did not exist versus the value of the entire parcel subject to the easement. The appraiser should not value only the area encumbered by the easement, or value the easement area in fee simple, as if the insured had lost title to it altogether.[48]

An alternate means of resolving a claim concerning an encumbrance is to obtain its release.[49]

[45] For example, in McGee v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 2012 WL 263000 (M.D.Fla.) (unpublished), the court held that the minor errors in a condominium declaration that were asserted by the insured unit owners as defects in their titles were moot, because the suit was brought after any defect had been cured by passage of time, as provided by a curative statute. The insurer was not required to take any action regarding the claimed drafting errors.

[46] On May 3, 1948, the United State Supreme Court prohibited a court from enforcing such restrictions in Shelley v. Kraemer, 334 U.S. 1 (1948). Congress codified and expanded on Shelley by passing the Fair Housing Act in 1968, which is found at 42 U.S.C. §§ 3601–3631. Some states have adopted similar laws. The net effect is that unconstitutional restrictions have been expunged as a matter of law. See the informative discussion of such restrictions in Mason v. Adams County Recorder, 901 F.3d 753 (6th Cir. (Ohio) 2018).

Co*., 2013 WL 6818152 (Wis.App.) (unpublished) (finding that insurer breached policy by paying the amount it had determined was the diminution in value, which sum was less than what the jury determined to be the insured's damages).

[48] In Stanley v. Atlantic Title Ins. Co., 377 S.C. 405, 661 S.E.2d 62 (S.C. 2008), a drainage easement affected a third of an acre of the insured land. The court said: "the measure of damages ought to be the difference in value of his whole property (including the useless portion), and the value of the property if the defect did not exist. For this reason, it appears that the master erred in awarding damages based on the total deprivation of the value of the third of an acre affected by the drain field. Such an award treats the third of an acre as if it has been taken."

The loss is the lesser of the diminution in value or the cost to cure.[50] As one court explained:

> [I]f the property owner can be made whole by curing the defect, and this cost is less than the diminished value, the cure approach should be used. Using a higher measure would result in unjust enrichment, for the property owner could spend part of the award curing the defect and retain the rest of the award.[51]

If the insured removes the defect without the insurer's written consent, the claim may be barred by the voluntary settlement provision, which is fully discussed at §2.14. However, when the insured asks the insurer to remove the encumbrance and it wrongly denies the claim, after which the insured removes it, some courts have held that loss is not limited to the cost incurred by the insured to remove the encumbrance.[52] The principle underlying those decisions is that an insurer should not be encouraged to cause the insured to advance the money needed to clear title and then merely reimburse that cost.

The ALTA policies permit the insurer to take action to clear title "to prevent or reduce loss or damage to the Insured."[53] The insurer may elect to take a title clearance action that limits the effect of an encumbrance, such as by reducing the affected area, making its terms less onerous, moving the path of an easement, or adding terms that protect the insured's rights.[54] A common example is the limitation of a so-called blanket easement (one that does not specify a particular path and width) to encumber only the path of an existing utility line or access drive. In such cases, after the encumbrance is so limited, the loss payable is the difference in the value of the land as insured versus as encumbered by the right as limited. See §3.4.5 for a full discussion of measurement of loss after a title clearance action.

[A]t least in cases involving a partial and not a total failure of title, the measure of damages is the same--i.e., the difference in fair market value or the cost of restoring title, whichever is less, up to the limits of the policy." See also Perry v. Stewart Title Co., 756 F.2d 1197 (5th Cir. 1985), in which an encroachment onto an easement was resolved by payment of a $100 fee to release part of the easement. The purchaser had insisted on rescinding the sale despite the easement holder's willingness to release. The court rejected the purchaser's claims against both seller and title insurer for "house hunting expenses, the cost of moving from their house, the cost of renting an apartment after they moved, the loss of favorable financing and depreciation on the house, closing costs, and house payments made to" their lender. Id. at 1205. Because the insurer had obtained the release at its own cost, the purchaser obtained no judgment award against the insurer. In Perry, the insurer was sued in its role as escrowee, not on the policy, but the result is entirely consistent with a claim on the policy. In Weber Estates Investments, LLC v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2014 IL App (4th) 130892-U, 2014 WL 4793008 (Ill.App. 4 Dist. 2014) (unpublished), the court reiterated that diminution in value and the cost to cure are two different ways to measure loss due to an encumbrance, and the insurer is required to pay whichever cost is less.

Another means of resolving a claim involving an easement, particularly a utility easement, is to relocate the easement and the service line. Once relocated, the easement may have little or no effect on value. However, in some cases, the diminution effect of the easement is less than the cost to relocate the easement and service line. Loss is always limited to the lesser of the diminution in value caused by the easement as it existed on the policy date or the cost to relocate it.[55]

The loss payable for a recorded covenant, condition or restriction on the use of the land for which there is policy coverage is the difference in the value of the property, with and without the restriction, as of the date of loss. Some restrictions have little effect on the value of the property on the open market.[56] It is generally recognized that most use restrictions are imposed as a means of preserving the value of the property. As a result, they typically increase rather than diminish the value of the encumbered land. See §11.4.1, regarding the no-loss exclusion and encumbrances. There may be no diminution in value due to a recorded restriction, if the use prohibited by the restriction would also be barred by a zoning or building ordinance.[57]

A common type of claim involves a use restriction that prohibits or limits the insured's intended use of the property. Loss is limited to the actual diminution in the fair market value caused by the existence of the restriction. Loss is not measured as the effect of a prohibition on a particular intended use of the property by the insured.[58] Even when the insured's particular intended use is [54] See, for example, Kasco, L.P. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2011 WL 4984741 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), in which the insured paid to limit a utility easement to the path of its existing power lines.

[55] In Weber Estates Investments, LLC v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2014 IL App (4th) 130892-U, 2014 WL 4793008 (Ill.App. 4 Dist. 2014) (unpublished), the court affirmed that the loss due to an underground gas pipeline was the $4,200 reduction in the property's value as undeveloped land, not the $521,578.76 the insureds spent to move the gas line.

[56] See, for example, Security Union Title Ins. Co. v. RC Acres, Inc., 269 Ga.App. 359, 604 S.E.2d 547 (Ga.App. 2004), reconsid.den. (Aug 31, 2004), cert.den. (Nov 22, 2004), in which the court held that the insured did not suffer a loss due to a flowage easement because the purchase price reflected the value of the property subject to the easement. See §11.4.1 for a complete discussion of cases on the subject of encumbrances that do not cause a loss.

[57] In Gibbs v. Williams, 2015 WL 5440628 (W.D.Wis. 2015) (unpublished), the court held that an attorney for the insureds did not commit malpractice by failing to submit a claim notice to the insurer concerning a recorded use restriction prohibiting use of the property for a business, because a county zoning ordinance also prohibited the property's use as a resort. The court held that, because the policy included Exclusion 1, the insureds "could not recover under the title policy."

[58] An insurer can assume a separate contractual obligation to identify encumbrances for the customer. In Red Lobster Inns of America Inc. v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 656 F.2d 381 (8th Cir. 1981), the property was encumbered by a restriction not shown on the policy that prohibited the restaurant use for which the land was purchased. The insured settled the restriction claim, then sued for the profit it would have made during the delay period. The insured's claim was not based on the policy, however, but on a separate contract under which the title insurer, as closing agent, agreed to prohibited, the insured may sell the property at its market value and purchase other property that is not so restricted. The insured is made whole by the insurer's payment of the amount, if any, by which the property's value on the open market is diminished due to the restriction for which there is policy coverage.

Similarly, the loss payable for an easement for which there is policy coverage is measured as the difference in the value of the property, with and without the easement, as of the date of loss. See §9.6 for a complete discussion of decisions concerning policy coverage for easements.

The effect on value caused by an easement varies widely, depending on the location of the easement path and the nature of the easement. One helpful guide comes from the law and appraisal methods applicable to condemnation by utilities. A study by the Bonneville Power Administration in the Pacific Northwest noted the effect on value of an electrical or telephone transmission line easement:

> Overhead transmission lines can reduce the value of residential and agricultural property. The impact is usually small (0-10 percent) for single-family residential properties. The greatest impacts have been measured in intensively managed agricultural property (irrigator, etc.) and in rural, second (vacation) home developments. ... Impacts may be greater for smaller properties than for larger properties. ... Impacts are more pronounced immediately after construction of a new line and diminish over time.[59]

As the Bonneville study results indicate, there are a number of factors to be considered in setting the appropriate discount. The following is a discussion of some such factors.

One factor is the intensity or dominance of use by the easement holder. An easement for an encroaching building establishes substantial dominion of the easement holder over the affected area. An easement for an underground septic field, by contrast, allows unfettered use of the surface of the property. A claimed easement that is not in regular use by anyone has little or no effect on the market value of the property.[60] review all recorded use restrictions and verify that they would not prohibit the restaurant chain's use of the property. Such contractual arrangements are rare.

[59] A thorough discussion of the data collected and the formulae developed by the right-of-way agents in the Bonnevile study is reported in Cowger, Bottemiller and Cahill, Transmission Line Impact on Residential Property Values, Right of Way, September/October, 1996, p. 13. Right of Way is published by the International Right of Way Association. A second article with a self-explanatory title is Richard A. Forsten, Wendie C. Stabler and Olufunke O. Fagbami, Cell Phone Towers Do Not Affect Property Values (Or the Case of Three Board Hearings and One Temporary Tower), in Probate & Property, May/June 2016 at p. 11. The authors make this statement: "Studies have long shown that cell towers have no appreciable effect on property values, but opponents of towers, and some boards that consider these applications, refuse to believe these studies."

[60] See Osprey Landing, LLC v. First American Title Ins. Co., 157 A.3d 247, 2017 ME 46 (Maine 2017), which held that a recorded affidavit asserting that the public might have a prescriptive easement over the property, but which no member of the public was actually using, was a "merely hypothetical" encumbrance, "as is any loss or damage due to the hypothetical encumbrance." The court found that the insured had not proven any loss in value caused by the alleged easement.

Another factor is the nature of the easement.[61] Most utility transmission easements are innocuous; they may serve the property as well as burden it, creating more of a benefit than a diminution in value. Underground easements are particularly benign, in most cases. Nonetheless, some utilities arouse fears. An underground easement for a natural gas pipeline that runs under the insured's home may have no effect on the property's use or value, but the insured may assert that he or she is afraid of an explosion.[62] Similarly, some people are afraid of stray voltage from nearby high tension electrical lines. Nonetheless, loss is measured as the objective effect on the value of the property caused by the easement right for which there is coverage, and is not amplified based on the insured's particular concerns.

A third factor is whether the easement use is congruent with, or antithetical to, the insured's own use of the land. Shared use of the easement area for the same or complementary purposes causes little or no compensable loss.[63] For example, an access easement in favor of others running across the insured's own driveway or paved parking lot has a minimal impact in most cases, and may not even become known until the insured desires to change the property use. A cable television easement lying within a telephone easement area adds little or no additional burden to the land, and in most cases results in no diminution.

A fourth factor is the use to which the insured property is put. An easement that would cause significant diminution to residential property may have no effect on the value of agricultural land, and vice versa. An avigation easement might sharply reduce the value of a home, but have no effect on the value of a farm or ranch. A fiber optic cable easement would, in most cases, cause no diminution to a residence, but might prohibit tilling of the soil on a farm. An underground sewer easement that causes no diminution for a farmer might prohibit the building of an apartment complex, precluding the use for which the land is zoned.

Finally, the size of the parcel can be a factor in the easement's effect on value. A twenty-foot utility easement could prevent the building of a garage in the only permitted location on a small suburban lot, but not impede the use of an 80-acre hunting parcel at all.

[61] See Overholtzer v. Northern Counties Title Ins. Co., 116 Cal.App.2d 113, 253 P.2d 116 (Cal.App. 1 Dist. 1953) (underground gas line); Bohr v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2008 WL 2977353 (M.D.Fla.) (unpublished) (easement allowing neighboring condominium unit owners to use swimming pool).

[62] In Gaviota Holdings, LLC v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 7334429 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), the court of appeals upheld a jury verdict based on an appraiser's opinion that land that had an underground gas pipeline easement was reduced in value by four percent due to the possibility of an explosion. This "diminution" percentage was derived from the effect on the value of parcels in the immediate vicinity of two actual gas pipeline explosions.

[63] Note, however, that in Kasco, L.P. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2011 WL 4984741 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), the court refused to find no diminution in value due to a utility easement that was limited to the same area within the insured property as to which a neighbor established a claim of adverse possession, despite the insurer's urging that the insured had lost all use of that area due to the (non-covered) adverse possession claim. That ruling was apparently based primarily on the fact that the insured himself paid to have the easement limited to that area, and the insurer refused to pay for that work, and thus the court was unwilling to discount the loss due to the insured's mitigation efforts.

3.2.3.1.4 Liens

The policy protects against liens that affect the insured property. See §9.4 for a discussion of real estate taxes, and §9.5 regarding other types of liens. The first step in analyzing a claim based on a lien is to determine if the lien attaches to the insured property, remains enforceable, and imparts notice to a bona fide purchaser for value. There are a number of possible defenses. See §3.4.7.6 concerning liens and other instruments that do not impart constructive notice, and §3.4.7.5 concerning interests that are not in the chain of title. Section 3.4.7.7 addresses estate tax liens. See §3.4.7.1.3 regarding non-attachment of federal tax liens. Section 3.4.7.4 discusses the use of the adverse party's knowledge of the insured deed or mortgage to defeat the person's claim of priority under race-notice recording laws.

This section discusses how to resolve a lien claim under an owner's policy. An insured lender's loss due to a lien is often different from the loss payable to an owner. See §3.2.4.1 for a complete discussion of the loss payable to a lender insured due to a lien. Under a loan policy, the insurer often protects an insured against a lien by establishing that the lien is subordinate to the insured mortgage. See §3.4.7 on the subject of establishing priority over existing liens, and §3.4.7.1 concerning federal tax lien issues. See §3.4.7.3 for a complete discussion of the doctrine of equitable subrogation, which is used to subordinate mortgages and other liens to later-recorded mortgages.

It is most common for an insurer to resolve a claim concerning a covered lien by paying the cost to remove or subordinate it, rather than paying a loss to the insured.[64] See §3.6 regarding the insurer's right to settle a lien claim and §3.4 regarding the insurer's right to clear title.

The insurer may also purchase a release of the insured parcel from the lien rather than paying off the lien in full. The subject of releases of federal tax lien releases is discussed at §3.4.7.1. The insurer is also entitled in many cases to conduct watchful waiting, particularly when the lien will expire in the reasonably near future. See §3.1 on watchful waiting.

If the insured removes a lien, its recovery against the insurer is limited to the actual, reasonable cost paid by the insured to remove the lien.[65] When the insured takes such action, the [64] In Swanson v. Safeco Title Ins. Co., 186 Ariz. 637, 925 P.2d 1354 (Ariz.App. 1 Div. 1995), the policy did not except a deed of trust. The court found that the proper measure of damage would be the cost to defeat the deed of trust or, if that was not possible, the cost to obtain its release. See also Arizona Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Smith, 21 Ariz.App. 371, 519 P.2d 860 (1974); Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. Lunt Land Corp., 162 Tex. 435, 347 S.W.2d 584 (Tex. 1961); Holly Hotel Co. v. Title Guar. & Trust Co., 147 Misc. 861, 264 N.Y.S. 3 (Sup.Ct. 1932), aff'd, 239 App.Div. 773, 264 N.Y.S. 7 (1933); Lake Havasu Community Hospital, Inc. v. Arizona Title Ins. & Trust Co., 141 Ariz. 363, 687 P.2d 371 (Ariz.App. 1984); and Brown's Tie & Lumber Co. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 764 P.2d 423 (Idaho 1988). In Neikes v. Ticor Title Company of Oregon, 291 Or.App. 720, 423 P.3d 102 (Or.App. 2018), the title insurer obtained the release of a deed of trust, after which the insured suffered no loss, including a claimed lost sale, lost rent or an alleged decline in the property's value while its title was in jeopardy.

[65] For example, in MacDonald v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 1996 WL 114719, 79 F.3d 1141(Table) (4th Cir.) (unpublished), the insured sought payment from the insurer of the face amounts of six unexcepted liens. However, the insured had contested three of the liens and proven them to be invalid, and had settled with the other three lien claimants and obtained releases. The court affirmed the trial court decision limiting the insured's recovery from the insurer to the expense of removing the liens, including attorneys' fees,. The court distinguished the two cases cited by the insured, Bluff Ventures Limited Partnership v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 950 F.2d 139 (4th Cir. (Va.) 1991), and Title Ins. Co. of Richmond v. Industrial Bank of Richmond, 157 S.E. 710 (Va. 1931), saying: "In Bluff Ventures and Industrial Bank, the plaintiff received as damages the face value of the lien because, in each case, the lien was valid and the face value of the claim may be barred by the voluntary settlement provision, discussed at §2.14. Also, the insured is required to cooperate with the insurer in its efforts to clear title. See §3.4.1.2 for a complete discussion of that subject. Therefore, the insured jeopardizes its policy rights, and may limit its recovery, by interfering with or impeding the insurer's effort to remove, release or subordinate the lien for which there is coverage.

3.2.3.1.5 Lack Of A Right Of Access

All or most title insurance policies indemnify against loss due to the lack of a right of access to the insured land. This scope of this covered risk is explained at §9.7. The enhanced access coverage of the ALTA Homeowner's policy is discussed at §9.14.2.

The claim administrator's first objective is usually to determine if there is in fact a right of access or if one can be obtained. Only very rarely does a parcel truly have no means of access. A diligent investigation often discloses that current or former owners have traveled to the property over some route, by permission of a neighbor, over a trail used that is semi-public in nature, or adversely.

If there is an existing access road, drive or path but the insured does not have a right to use the pathway, it is sometimes possible to formalize the access right sufficiently to satisfy the actual right assured in the policy. The claim administrator or counsel should be careful not to seek, or promise to seek, a right greater than what the policy has assured. Carefully review any access endorsement issued to the insured to determine the exact scope of the rights assured. The insurer is not required, for example, to purchase a higher quality access right in order to foster the insured's plan to develop the land, in the absence of a very specific affirmative coverage of such right.

There is a complete discussion of the nature and quality of a right of access that qualifies as a "right of access," and a discussion of the types of access rights that are commonly granted by various governmental bodies and other classes of property owners, at §§9.7 and 9.7.1. Also see §9.7.1 for a discussion of access via water.

If the parcel became landlocked by a land division, most states recognize an easement by necessity or implication over the parcel from which the insured land was split. A thorough title examination will allow the claim administrator to determine if a severance occurred that would, by law, impose an easement by necessity across another parcel and, if so, over which parcel. Some states have laws permitting owners of landlocked property to seek a judicial declaration of access, essentially a private condemnation power, or to petition for public condemnation of a roadway.[66] Also, long-time use of an access path may have ripened into a prescriptive easement. An insurer will sometimes pay for a court order establishing such a right of access, but in other cases will not, depending on the nature of the right, the facts on which it is based, and the statute or case law on which the right is founded.

lien was the cost of removing the lien. Neither case involved a situation where a lien ... turned out to be invalid or was settled for a lesser amount."

[66] For example, Minnesota Statute Section 164.08, subdivision 2(a), permits a private landowner to petition a town board for an access path termed a "cartway" to be run over neighboring land to provide access to a public road. That statute was construed in Watson v. Bd. of Supervisors of Town, 239 N.W. 913 (Minn. 1931) and Cich v. Bay Lake Township, 2018 WL 5915444 (Minn.App.) (unpublished). There is further discussion of private condemnation powers at §9.7.1.

If no access right exists at present, it is still often possible to obtain such a right by buying it from a neighbor. This is most effectively done through a personal meeting, preferably at the property so that a route can be mapped out. A briefcase or knapsack filled with twine, rebar or metal stakes, spray paint and a clipboard for holding a survey or map are most useful in walking the path and setting stakes for a surveyor to follow in order to prepare a description of the route. Some insureds are very good at asking their neighbors for such assistance. Others will ruin any chance of working out a deal, or have already so angered their neighbors that they will obtain no cooperation from them. On balance, the better approach is to send a person who is likeable and courteous, and to arm the representative with authority to buy the rights for a realistic sum. If more than one neighbor could provide an access right, the representative should approach all of the neighbors, but separately.

Property may have a right of access that is limited in nature or subject to restrictions. The existence of a loss, and its measure, for a limitation on access depends on the type of real estate and its locale. See §9.7.2 regarding public and private limitations on access. A limitation on access may cause no diminution in value. In one case, the policy failed to refer to a deed establishing a service drive on a highway. The insured did not allege any damage resulting from the service drive access. As a result, the court found the complaint against the insurer insufficient:

> So far as appears from the complaint, the land may be worth as much without access rights to a highway as with access rights. It is alleged that a service station was built on the property, and normal access rights to a highway would be thought to be valuable to such a structure. However, it might be that the station is visible from the highway, and access through the service road is adequate. It might be that denial of access except through certain turnoffs encourages traffic on the highway and makes the property more valuable for a service station than it would otherwise be. Without this basic allegation of diminution in value, it would seem that in any event plaintiffs have not stated a cause of action under the policy.[67]

Another common claim issue is an assertion by the insured that the right of access he or she enjoys does not include vehicular access. The claim administrator must determine if the policy provides that assurance. See §9.7.1 for a complete discussion of that subject.

The measure of damages for the lack of a right of access is the difference in value of the property with and without that right. A complete lack of a right of access is rare, but typically has a significant effect on the value of the property. For this reason, a common recourse in resolving claims involving access is to obtain an access route for the insured, either by clearing title to establish an easement or adverse possession (see §3.4), or by purchasing fee title or an easement for the insured (see §3.7). If the insurer is successful, no loss is payable to the insured.

The effect on value due to the lack of a right of access is normally related to the frequency and volume of travel to and from the property. On one end of the spectrum is urban property whose use and value depends on traffic by tenants, patrons or invitees, with the other end being rural property, particularly land on which there are no inhabited dwellings. In a case involving tax assessment rather than title insurance, suburban property was found to be reduced in value by 10% because its access was via an easement that title insurers considered to be insufficient to insure as an access right. No market data existed to support a valuation, so the court's adjustment in value was "a judgment factor ... based upon all the known circumstances."[68]

3.2.3.1.6 Unmarketability Of Title

Most title insurance policies indemnify the insured against loss due to the unmarketability of the title as insured. See §9.8 for a complete discussion of the marketability of title covered risk.

There is no separate policy provision describing the manner in which loss due to unmarketability of title is measured. In most jurisdictions, there is no damage for lack of marketability of title unless the owner loses a contract for the sale of the property or is unable to obtain financing. Proof of a lost sale or loan due to a covered defect in or encumbrance on title is also a predicate to a policy claim for unmarketability of title.[69] The lack of such a rejection of title has been found to preclude any damage claim under the marketability coverage.[70] The rejection by the buyer or lender must be due to the unmarketability of the title, moreover, and must concern a matter as to which the policy provides coverage.[71]

[68] Hinzdel v. Dep't of Revenue, 1997 WL 189468 (Or. Tax) (unpublished).

[69] In Mattson Ridge, LLC v. Clear Rock Title, LLP, 824 N.W.2d 622 (Minn. 2012), the court affirmed a ruling that a supposedly vague legal description rendered title unmarketable, making the insurer liable for the insured's loss up to policy limits. The loss was fixed based on testimony that the "unmarketability" of the title had reduced the land's value by 90%, even though the description was modified at nominal cost. In Captiva Lake Investments, LLC v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 883 F.3d 1038 (8th Cir. (Mo.) 2018), a purchaser terminated a contract, allegedly due to mechanic's liens that had been filed by that time, but the court held that there was no coverage because title was not unmarketable on the policy date. The policy date was before the liens were filed and even before the work had been performed for which the liens were later filed.

[70] In Finley v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2010 WL 4362582 (Cal.App. 1 Dist.) (unpublished), the court dismissed an action against the insurer brought by insured owners who claimed their title was unmarketable and that they would be unable to get a new loan, but failed to allege that they had applied for a loan or that a lender had actually refused to lend money due to the claimed defects in title. The court held that they were unable to establish any compensable loss caused by the claimed unmarketability of title. In Booth v. Attorneys' Title Guaranty Fund, Inc., 2001 UT 13, 20 P.3d 319 (Utah 2001), the court found title marketable, and therefore did not address the claimed damages. However, it noted: "[f]urthermore, [the insureds] conceded at oral argument that because they never made any written application for financing and did not accept the discounted offer to buy, they did not suffer any actual damages. Therefore, there is no claim for damages under the ATGF policy." In Lemon-Pittman v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 3498323 (E.D.La. 2014) (unpublished), Ms. Lemon-Pittman's fallback position was that Covered Risk 18 of the policy had been invoked. That coverage applies when "[s]omeone else refuses to perform a contract to purchase, to lease or to make a mortgage loan because of any violations on your land of any restrictions shown in Schedule B which happened before you became the owner of your land." The court said that this Covered Risk required the insured to allege four facts: (1) that someone else has refused to perform a contract; (2) the contract was one to purchase, to lease or to make a mortgage loan; (3) the breach of the contract occurred because of a violation of one of the restrictions listed in Schedule B of the Policy; and (4) the violation predates her ownership of the property. Ms. Lemon-Pittman had alleged that the SBA had refused to enter into a contract, rather than that it refused to perform on one. Further, its refusal was not based on a restriction in an instrument found in Schedule B. Thus, the court said, this Covered Risk also was not invoked.

[71] In Dollinger DeAnza Associates v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 199 Cal.App.4th 1132, 131 Cal.Rptr.3d 596 (Cal.App. 6

Further, the strongest indicator that title is unmarketable is that it is under attack by a party claiming an interest in the property adversely to the owner.[72] Such is not the case when the infirmity lies with the insured's own interest in the land. Thus, when the claimed defect was the insured's own lack of authority as trustee to take title, the court found that the claim "does not void the conveyance to him. We see no reason, then, that his title should be impaired."[73]

Encumbrances do not render title unmarketable, because such a holding would render the titles to millions of parcels unmarketable.[74]

A title insurer will commonly take action to clear title of a matter that at least allegedly renders title unmarketable. See §3.4 regarding clearing of title. In some cases, the matter that allegedly renders title unmarketable has in fact been barred or cured by a curative statute or marketable title act. See the discussion of such matters under §3.1, concerning watchful waiting. Also, an insurer's willingness to insure title for a purchaser or lender will often resolve the claimed unmarketability issue. See §3.4.4 concerning the insuring of title and other measures the insurer may take, either while title is being cleared or generally. Delay damages, or a possible lost sale while the title insurer is clearing title, are not compensable losses. See §3.4.5 regarding the final determination provision.

Dist. 2011), a title insurer was found not to be liable to the insured owner due to the fact that the insured property, which was platted as seven lots, had been merged by a document recorded by the city some years before, which instrument was not excepted in Schedule B. Although a buyer had refused to purchase, the court was persuaded by Chicago Title's emphasis on the final phrase in the definition of marketability, which says that coverage is limited to "a matter affecting title to the land." The court held that the merger of parcels was a governmental restriction on the use of the land and did not affect its title. 199 Cal.App.4th at 1152; 131 Cal.Rptr.3d at 610. In Latter & Blum, Inc. v. Ditta, 223 So.3d 54 (La.App. 4 Cir. 2017), the court found that an encroaching fence made title unmarketable, excusing the buyer from the obligation to purchase, and a title insurer's willingness to issue a policy protecting against the encroachment did not cure the marketability issue. However, the decision did not concern title insurance policy coverage.

[72] A purchaser may not challenge its own title in order to be relieved of the obligation to purchase. For example, when the sole basis for the purchaser city to claim unmarketability was the offhand opinion of a person who had not examined the title, the court concluded: "Here, the city itself, rather than a third party, has undertaken to attack its own title." The court also noted that the purchaser had not made a claim on its title insurance policy. Prestwood v. City of Andalusia, 709 So.2d 1173 (Ala. 1997). Possible large future homeowners' association assessments were found not to make title unmarketable in Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co. v. Graoch Associates No. 73, 2010 WL 1257748 (E.D.Ky.) (unpublished).

[73] Keown v. West Jersey Title & Guar. Co., 161 N.J.Super. 19, 390 A.2d 715 (N.J.A.D. 1978). Exclusion 3(a) would seem to apply, and was argued. The court refused to apply the exclusion, based on the ruling that the exclusion requires an element of intent that did not exist in that case. See the cases at §9.8.3 concerning other acts of the insured which were found to exclude marketability claims.

[74] See Osprey Landing, LLC v. First American Title Ins. Co., 157 A.3d 247, 2017 ME 46 (Maine 2017), in which the Maine Supreme Court ruled that a claimed prescriptive easement did not render title unmarketable, saying: "If we were to hold that a title becomes unmarketable merely because there is a possibility that a claim for an easement could be brought in the future, an untold quantity of titles across the state would subsequently become unmarketable, resulting in uncertainty of ownership and a profusion of litigation." In Chesapeake Land Development Company LLC v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2017 WL 5930295 (W.D.Okla.) (unpublished), the court held that a use restriction does not make title unmarketable.

The policy's marketability coverage is subject to any applicable exclusions and exceptions. Thus, tortious conduct in the procurement of title does not create a marketability claim under the policy.[75] Also, Exclusion 1, concerning governmental regulation of the use of the property, serves as a limitation on the policy's marketability coverage. For example, title was not made unmarketable because the insured would be obligated to comply with subdivision laws before conveying the property.[76] When a valid subdivision existed on paper, but no roads existed, title was not unmarketable on the grounds that a building permit would be denied until streets had been built and/or street improvement bonds had been posted.[77] However, a pending municipal housing code violation lawsuit which rendered title unmarketable under state law was found covered despite the exclusion for building and zoning ordinances.[78]

If the insured establishes that title has been deemed unmarketable by proof of a lost sale or financing, loss is measured as the diminution in value due to the defect or encumbrance that renders title unmarketable. The loss is not measured as a dollar amount ascribed to the effect of the covered matter on the marketability of the title. Nonetheless, several courts have adopted unconventional or idiosyncratic loss measurements due to the effect of the unmarketability of title as applied to the particular facts of the claim. One type of measure has been lost revenue or expenses incurred by the insured while title was being cleared.[79] Another measure of loss can be the economic value of a lost sale.[80]

An insured must establish that he or she suffered an actual loss caused by the unmarketable title. An insured owner that lost title because its lender foreclosed did not suffer a loss resulting from unrecorded construction liens, even though those lien rights caused title to be unmarketable.[81]

The Supreme Court held that, because the insurer could not have done the Torrens action any faster than the insured did, its failure to conduct the Torrens action was not the source of the insured's lost profit. Nonetheless, the court permitted recovery of policy limits, based on testimony that the title issue reduced the value of the property by 90%. One very old decision, based on a policy that did not contain a final determination provision, found that such loss was not avoided by an insurer's curing of the title defect accomplished after the buyer rejected the purchase contract. *Montemarano v. 3.2.3.1.7 Forced Removal Of Structure

A title insurance policy may give coverage against the forced removal of a structure. This type of coverage is often provided by endorsement. Also, Title Risk 12 of the ALTA Residential policy protects against the forced removal of a structure other than a boundary wall or fence. See §9.14.1 for a discussion of the Residential policy coverages and terms.

Covered Risks 18, 19, 21 and 23 of the ALTA Homeowner's policy concern the forced removal of existing structures. These covered risks are limited by deductibles and Maximum Dollar Amounts of Liability. Covered Risk 18 protects against the forced removal of "existing structures, or any part of them—other than boundary walls or fences—because any portion was built without obtaining a building permit" from the appropriate government office. Covered Risk 19 protects the insured if he or she is forced to "remove or remedy" existing structures because they violate an existing zoning law or regulation. The phrase "or remedy" makes it clear that the insurer has the right to remedy the violation as an alternative to removing the structure. Covered Risk 21 protects against enforced removal of existing structures because they encroach onto a neighbor's land. Covered Risk 21 specifies that it does not apply to encroaching boundary walls or fences. Covered Risk 23 protects against the forced removal of "existing structures which encroach onto an Easement or over a building set-back line, even if the easement or building set-back line is excepted in Schedule B." This covered risk may be negated by a possession, survey or other exception. There is no Maximum Dollar Amount of Liability for this covered risk. See §9.14.2 for a discussion of the Homeowner's policy coverages and terms.

The word structure is not defined in these policies. The term is broader than "house" or "principal structure." However, a "structure" includes only man-made improvements. For example, a lay dictionary gives the following definition for the word: "Something (as a building) that is constructed."[82] It may be helpful, in explaining the coverage to an insured, to refer to a definition of "structure" as found in a state statute.[83]

These coverages apply only when the insured is "forced to remove" a structure. The insured has not suffered loss immediately on learning that a structure encroaches, or that it violates a restriction or zoning ordinance. The insurer does not have a duty to cure the problem until the insured is forced to remove it.[84] One court explained:

Partnership v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 706 F.Supp. 477, 487 (S.D. Miss. 1988).

[82] Webster's New Collegiate Dictionary (1973). The use of a lay dictionary is appropriate in finding the plain and ordinary meaning of a word that is not a term of art, as discussed at §9.1.3.1, Insurance Contract Interpretation Principles.

[83] For example, a Wisconsin statute says that the term structure includes a "dwelling," defined as "any building, or structure, or part thereof, used and occupied for human habitation ... and ... any appurtenances belonging thereto... ." The statute goes on to say that "[t]he term 'structure' shall also include fences, garages, sheds, and any type of store, commercial, industrial or manufacturing building." § 66.435(4), Wis.Stats.

[84] Manneck v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 28 Cal.App.4th 1294, 33 Cal.Rptr.2d 771 (Cal.App. 2 Dist. 1994). In Trinder v. Connecticut Attorneys Title Ins. Co., 2011 VT 46, 22 A.3d 493 (Vt. 2011), the court cited Manneck in finding that letters from a neighbor, saying that structures encroaching onto its property were there by permission that could be revoked, were not "forced removal" triggering a duty to act under this covered risk. The court said: "[w]e conclude that

> The clause in the policy pertaining to forced removal coverage only comes into play if in fact there is a forced removal of the insured's structures which encroach on the property of another. ... [T]he insurer could have in good faith waited to act until, for example, a court order requiring removal or the imminent destruction of the encroaching improvements by bulldozers.[85]

Enforced removal coverage does not require the insurer to establish the insured's right to maintain the encroachment.[86]

A forced removal coverage is invoked only if the party having the power to command removal of the existing structure actually enforces that right.[87] The order requiring removal of the structure will typically dictate the action that the insured owner must take.

Forced removal coverage may not create a duty to defend an action seeking removal of a

the language of the clause is unambiguous and by its terms applies only to situations where an insured is "forced to remove" structures that encroach on the property of another. To require coverage in situations where a structure is on neighboring land, but the neighbor has not affirmatively sought its removal, would extend the policy beyond its terms. … The clause is inapplicable here because the museum took no action to force homeowners to remove their septic system. The museum did not revoke permission to have the septic system on its property, nor did it demand removal by letter or through court action. That homeowners wished to resolve the uncertainty before the situation reached that level is understandable, but does not result in coverage that is beyond the terms of the policy. We need not reach homeowners' argument that potential imminent damage is synonymous with forced removal and could trigger coverage because under the facts found by the trial court there was no such impending demolition of homeowner's septic system in this case." In Fee v. Stahley, 2008 WL 4849844 (Minn.App.) (unpublished), although the insureds' septic cleanout, fence and part of their driveway were likely on their neighbor's land, the court held that the insurer had no duty to take affirmative action because "nobody has demanded that appellants remove any structures." Further, it said, "because appellants have suffered no loss, their claim is currently either improper or premature." In Johnston v. Connecticut Attorneys Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 1494016 (D.Vt. 2014) (unpublished), the court held that a U.S. Forest Service letter demanding that property owners get their encroaching structures off of the Forest Service's land did not trigger the forced removal coverage of an ALTA Residential policy, because the Forest Service has never taken action to remove the structures. The court cited Manneck, Trinder and Fee as authority for its ruling. In Wei v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2018 WL 1870400 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), the insured's garage encroached onto the neighbor's property and the neighbors sued to force its removal. The insurer paid for the defense, based on Covered Risk 18 of the Homeowner's policy. Although the court said the garage could stay until it was voluntarily demolished or condemned, the insurer paid the insureds the Maximum Dollar Limit of Liability of $5,000 and refused to appeal the ruling. The court found that the insurer had fulfilled all of its policy duties, as to both indemnity and defense, relying mainly on Manneck in reaching its conclusions.

[86] Id. The Manneck decision distinguished Jarchow v. Transamerica Title Ins. Co., 48 Cal.App.3d 917, 122 Cal.Rptr. 470 (Cal.App. 1 Dist. 1975), on the basis that the Residential policy does not include the language requiring the insurer to take "such action as may be appropriate to establish the title" as insured "without undue delay." The court found that encroachments of improvements created only the potential for coverage under Title Risk 12, since the coverage was limited to forced removal.

[87] See Manneck v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 28 Cal.App. 4th 1294, 33 Cal.Rptr.2d 771, 775-6 (Cal.App. 2 Dist. 1994), which held that forced removal means "a court order requiring removal or the imminent destruction of the encroaching improvements by bulldozers."

structure.[88] Although generally the duty to defend extends to all covered risks, title insurers recognize that, in most cases, "forced removal" coverage does not obligate the insurer to contest the removal action. When one is "forced" to remove something, the implication is that there has already been an action seeking the removal, which has resulted in an order or judgment.[89] However, an insurer may elect to defend the enforcement action in order to assert any applicable defenses, if the insurer reasonably believes that it might prevent the entry of an order removing the structure.[90]

Forced removal coverage, as with all coverages, is limited by the policy's exclusions, exceptions and conditions.[91] A seminal decision found that the forced removal coverage was limited by the survey exception:

> [T]he plain language of the title insurance policy provides coverage for the unmarketability of title, as described by lot and tract number, and does not apply to any matters which a correct survey would have disclosed and which are not shown by the public records, such as the encroachments in the present case. Only forced removal coverage is provided for such encroachments, and no such forced removal occurred here.[92]

Thus, the court held that the coverage did not assure the ownership of improvements that encroached, including a swimming pool and deck.

[89] In an analogous situation, a policy insured against loss from "the enforcement or attempted enforcement" of a mortgage. The insureds submitted claims based on the premise that the property was not "salable" due to the mortgage insured over. However, the mortgage lender had not attempted to enforce the mortgage. The court found that the insureds had not suffered any actual loss, because there had not been any attempt to enforce. Humphries v. West End Terrace, Inc., 795 S.W.2d 128 (Tenn.App. 1990). Also see §9.8.3 concerning "salability" claims in general.

[90] In Wei v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2018 WL 1870400 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), the insured's garage encroached onto the neighbor's property and the neighbors sued to force its removal. The insurer paid for the defense, based on Covered Risk 18 of the Homeowner's policy. Although the court said the garage could stay until it was voluntarily demolished or condemned, the insurer paid the insureds the Maximum Dollar Limit of Liability of $5,000 and refused to appeal the ruling. The court found that the insurer had fulfilled all of its policy duties, as to both indemnity and defense. The decision could be read to imply a duty to defend the action seeking the removal of the garage.

[91] In Ghezeli v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2013 WL 3828805 (Cal.App. 4 Dist.) (unpublished), the court found that Covered Risk 12 of the First American Eagle policy, protecting against forced removal of structures that violate restrictions, did not apply to structures that encroach into the path of an easement excepted in Schedule B.

[92] Manneck v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 28 Cal.App.4th 1294, 33 Cal.Rptr.2d at 776 (Cal.App. 2 Dist. 1994). In Johnston v. Connecticut Attorneys Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 1494016 (D.Vt. 2014) (unpublished), the court also found that the survey exception limited the forced removal coverage, and rejected the insured's argument that the exception rendered the coverage illusory: "Although the survey exception limits forced removal coverage in the event an encroachment would have been revealed by an accurate survey or personal inspection, it does not render that coverage wholly illusory. Coverage remains available for forced removals on alternative grounds such as a structure built in violation of zoning laws or built without a building permit."

Residential policy use the phrase "existing structures," to make clear that the coverages are limited to the forced removal of structures that existed on the date of policy. Both policies also include exclusions for post-policy matters.[93]

The entire limited scope of a forced-removal covered risk is the cost to remove the structure. These coverages do not indemnify the insured against any diminution in the value of the property due to the structure that is removed, or any other effect of its removal. Thus, loss is measured as the cost of complying with the removal order.[94] The forced removal covered risks also do not obligate the insurer to pay for the cost of restoring the property, or altering its appearance or use, after the removal of the offending, existing structure.

An insurer may elect to resolve a forced removal claim, when feasible, by paying to cure a code violation, if that will induce the governing authority not to issue an order requiring the removal of the structure. Conditions 5.e of the Homeowner's policy gives the insurer the right to elect to cure title. However, the policy does not require the insurer to take such curative action, and liability under these covered risks is not measured by the cost to "cure" the forced removal. Conditions 6.c.(1) states that, if the insurer "remove[s] the cause of the claim with reasonable diligence after receiving notice of it," all obligations end as to the claim.

Another appropriate method for resolving a claim under the forced removal covered risks is for either the insurer or insured, or both, to obtain estimates for the cost of removal, followed by payment from the insurer to the insured or to the contractor of the cost to remove the structure.

Covered Risks 18, 19 and 21 of the Homeowner's policy state that they are subject to a deductible and a maximum coverage amount. Thus, the removal expense is limited to the Maximum Dollar Limit of Liability for that risk, after subtracting the applicable deductible amount.[95] This formula is found in Conditions 6.a, which states that, "[a]fter subtracting Your Deductible Amount if it applies," the insurer will pay the least of actual loss, policy limits or the "Maximum Dollar Limit of Liability then in force for" Covered Risks 16, 18, 19 or 21. This limitation on liability is restated in Conditions 4.a.(6), which says that the insurer may "[e]nd the coverage described in Covered Risk 16, 18, 19 or 21 by paying You the amount of Your insurance then in force for the particular Covered Risk" plus any accrued attorneys' fees and costs. Conditions 4(a)(6) does not mean that an insurer must pay the Maximum Dollar Amount of Liability to end the covered risk, because it does [93] See Wei v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2018 WL 1870400 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), in which the insured's existing garage encroachment was found to invoke Covered Risk 18 of the Homeowner's policy.

[94] See First American Title Ins. Co. v. Columbia Harbison LLC, 2013 WL 1501702 (D.S.C.) (unpublished), which found the insurer liable for the cost of removing and rebuilding a retaining wall whose removal was protected against by an endorsement, along with as-yet-undetermined costs in shrinking the size of a building that also encroached.

[95] In Wei v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2018 WL 1870400 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), the insured's garage encroached onto the neighbor's property, invoking Covered Risk 18 of the Homeowner's policy. Although the court said the garage could stay until it was voluntarily demolished or condemned, the insurer paid the insureds the Maximum Dollar Limit of Liability of $5,000, including the deductible amount, and refused to appeal the ruling. The court found that the insurer had fulfilled all of its policy duties, as to both indemnity and defense. The court rejected the insured's claim that other covered risks had been invoked, which was designed to allow recovery in an amount greater than the $5,000.

not use that defined phrase. Rather, it refers to "the amount of Your insurance then in force." That phrase means the amount of loss as set by the cost of removal, minus the deductible, and up to the Maximum Dollar Amount of Liability.

A hypothetical example is illustrative. Assume that the city orders the removal of a house an addition because it was constructed without a building permit, invoking Covered Risk 18, and that the city's removal order specifies that "removal" includes sealing off the remaining house to the outside, and removal of any foundation slab or basement. Assume that the policy amount is $100,000 and that the Maximum Dollar Amount of Liability for Covered Risk 18 is set at $20,000, with a deductible of 5% of the policy amount or $5,000. Assume that the estimated cost to remove the addition per the city's specifications is $40,000. Conditions 6 states that the deductible is subtracted first. In this example, if the removal order was issued within the first year after the date of policy, the policy amount would be $100,000, and the deductible would be $5,000. If the notice was sent to the insured during the year after the first policy date anniversary, the policy amount would have increased to $110,000 (see Conditions 9, which says that the policy amount increases by 10% a year for the first five years). The deductible would still be $5,000, because the deductible is always the lesser of the policy amount percentage or the dollar amount stated on Schedule A (the stated amount is $5,000 and $5,500 is 10% of the policy amount in the second year). After subtracting the deductible of $5,000, the loss would be $35,000. The insurer would pay the Maximum Dollar Amount of Liability of $20,000. The insured would pay the balance of the cost. The insurer may choose to be involved in the process of the structure's removal and pay the contractor as removal expenses are incurred, or elect to pay the insured the loss amount and allow the insured to manage the removal project.

Once the insurer has paid the Maximum Dollar Amount of Liability for a Covered Risk, all coverage for that type of risk, not just for that particular occurrence, is at an end. In the above example, after the insurer paid the Maximum Dollar Amount of Liability, the insured would not be entitled to be paid again if a second order was issued by the city requiring the removal of another existing structure.

3.2.3.1.8 Zoning Coverage

The ALTA Residential and Homeowner's policies provide limited zoning coverages. See §§9.14.1 and 9.14.2 for a discussion of the covered risks under those policies. The Residential policy assures against loss due to the inability to use the property for a single family residence. For the coverage to be triggered, then, the zoning code would have to prohibit the use of the existing structure for a single-family residence. This covered risk will rarely be invoked in areas that have adopted Euclidean zoning because, in such zoning codes, nearly all classes of property permit use as a single-family residence.[96] However, one court found the Residential policy zoning Covered Risk invoked by an ordinance permitting the owner to replace the mobile home on the parcel only with another mobile home, and not a stick-built house. The court ruled that "the term 'single-family residence' is patently ambiguous and must be construed against the drafter so as not to include a [96] See Patricia E. Salkin, American Law of Zoning (5th Ed.), Chapter 1, Introduction: Public Control of Private Land (West).

mobile home," which it said invoked the coverage.[97]

The insurer will typically compare the cost of curing the zoning violation with the diminution in value due to the violation, and select the option that is less expensive or more expedient. If the insurer elects to pay a loss to the insured, such loss is measured as the difference in value of the property with the zoning as insured and the zoning classification that actually applies.[98]

3.2.3.1.9 Violation Of Building Or Subdivision Code

The ALTA Homeowner's policy provides limited coverage against existing violations of building or subdivision ordinances. See §9.14.2 for a discussion of these Covered Risks. The insurer will typically compare the cost of curing the violation with the diminution in value due to the violation, and resolve the claim using the option that is less expensive or more expedient.

3.2.3.1.10 Notice Of Exercise, Violation Or Enforcement

The 2006 ALTA policies contain four Covered Risks protecting against the effect of notices of the exercise of rights, or notices of the violation or enforcement of regulations and other matters against the property, if such notices are in the public records and not excepted in Schedule B of the policy. Those Covered Risks are discussed at §9.9.2 and §11.1. The subjects of the four coverages are for a notice of violation or enforcement concerning a zoning, building code, subdivision and environmental protection regulations (Covered Risk 5); a notice of an enforcement action based on an exercise of governmental police power (Covered Risk 6); a notice of an enforcement action based on an exercise of a governmental right of eminent domain (Covered Risk 7); and "[a]ny taking by a governmental body that has occurred and is binding on the rights of a purchaser for value without Knowledge" (Covered Risk 8).

The ALTA Homeowner's policy contains corresponding provisions. Covered Risk 5 of the ALTA 2006 policies is nearly identical to Covered Risk 14 of the Homeowner's policy. Covered Risk 6 of the ALTA 2006 policies is nearly identical to Covered Risk 15 of the Homeowner's policy. Covered Risks 7 and 8 of the ALTA 2006 policies are combined in Covered Risk 17 of the Homeowner's policy. Covered Risk 12 contains a similar coverage against existing violations of recorded covenants, conditions and restrictions. That coverage is discussed at the end of this section. See §9.14.2 for further discussion of the Homeowner's policy coverages.

Unlike the condemnation and takings coverages, which concern the loss of title, the covered risks concerning notices of violation or enforcement provide very limited coverage on subjects that are otherwise excluded from coverage because they do not affect title. The insured must establish that there is a recorded notice of violation or enforcement. If there is no such recorded notice, the covered risk is not invoked. Further, these covered risks are limited by corresponding exclusions, even when no exception for the notice is found in Schedule B of the policy. See Exclusions 1, 2 and 3(d) (post-policy matters), discussed in Chapter 11.

Finally, and perhaps most importantly, Covered Risks 5 and 6 are limited to the exact subject of the recorded notice. Covered Risk 5 specifically states that there is coverage "only to the extent of the violation or enforcement referred to in that notice." Covered Risk 6 contains a similar explicit limitation. Thus, the insurer will typically resolve a claim under these covered risks by paying for the cost of correcting or complying with the violations that are described in the notice. These covered risks are not "compliance" coverage, however. They do not obligate the insurer to pay for the cost of obtaining a certificate of occupancy, a building permit, or other governmental certifications. If the governmental body insists on repairs, changes or improvements that go beyond the subject of the recorded notice, or that work will be part of a larger project on the property, the insurer will typically obtain estimates for the cost of the work necessary to comply with the matters described in the recorded notice and tender that amount to the insured so that the insured can proceed with the larger project. In some cases, the governmental body will have assessed penalties or fines, and interest on those amounts, due to the violations stated in the notice. The insurer typically agrees to pay such penalties, fines and interest that accrued up to the date on which the insured became aware of the notice. If the insured is tardy in submitting a notice of claim, the insurer typically will not pay penalties, fines or interest that accrued between the date of discovery and the date on which the insured submitted the notice of claim, because the insurer could have stopped the accrual of those penalties. The insurer may or may not elect to pay the penalties that accrue during the pendency of the claim.

The notice of violation or enforcement coverages do not state that the insurer will obtain the removal or satisfaction of the recorded notice. The insurer typically does not pay for the administrative cost of obtaining the removal of the notice. In some cases, the insurer will make the alternative election to pay the insured the amount by which the property's value is reduced due to the matter that is the subject of the notice, if that amount is less than the cost of compliance with the notice or such payment is more expedient.

As to condemnation claims and Covered Risks 7 and 8, if the policy was issued to an owner when he or she purchased the land, the insurer usually wishes to review the purchase contract and other closing documents to determine if the pending condemnation was disclosed and if the insured contracted to take title subject to its outcome. Exclusion 3(a) will likely apply if the insured "agreed to" the matter. See §11.2.2. When a buyer contracted to purchase property that was subject to a pending condemnation action, and the contract permitted the seller to receive the condemnation award, the insurer is entitled to presume that the purchase price accurately reflected the value of the property less the land that the insured knew would be lost, which also invokes the no-loss exclusion.

If the insured will receive a condemnation award from the government for the taking, the insured will not suffer a loss if the award represents the fair market value of the property or the diminution in value to the remainder parcel caused by the taking. See the discussion of the no-loss exclusion at §11.4.

If the condemnation action is still pending when the insurer receives notice of the claim, and there are meritorious defenses to the taking or a genuine dispute about the value of the property, the insurer may elect to assert those defenses as a means of clearing title or limiting the loss payable. See

§3.4 concerning the clearing of title. In the taking or condemnation had already occurred before the insured took title, the insurer's options in resolving the claim are often limited to paying the insured the lesser of policy limits or the value of the lost land. Such a claim is essentially the same as any other claim involving the loss of the title to all or a portion of the insured parcel. See §3.2.3.2 concerning total failure of title and §3.2.3.1.2 concerning loss of title to part of the insured land.

The Homeowner's policy also contains Covered Risk 12, which indemnifies the insured if he or she is "required to correct or remove an existing violation of any covenant, condition or restriction affecting the Land, even if the covenant, condition or restriction is excepted in Schedule B." The Covered Risk contains this limitation:

> However, You are not covered for any violation that relates to:
>
> a. any obligation to perform maintenance or repair on the Land; or
>
> b. environmental protection of any kind, including hazardous or toxic conditions or substances
> unless there is a notice recorded in the Public Records, describing any part of the Land, claiming a violation exists. Our liability for this Covered Risk is limited to the extent of the violation stated in that notice.

In First American Title Ins. Co. v. Silbiger,[99] the court refused to interpret this coverage using its precise terms, in order to achieve a "broader" result. In Silbiger, the insured parcel contained an underground storm water retention vault that caved in during a heavy rain after the date of policy. The policy contained an exception for a recorded instrument in which the developer had agreed to maintain the vault, and which stated that the maintenance provision ran with the land. When the insured asked the city to repair the vault, it replied that he had that duty, under the recorded indemnity agreement. The insured sued the insurer, claiming coverage under Covered Risk 12. The court held that the indemnity agreement was a "covenant" against title, primarily because it was recorded and excepted in the policy. The court noted, correctly, that Covered Risk 12 applies even if the "covenant" is recorded and excepted. The court then held that the municipality's letter informing the insured that it had to repair the vault had "required" him to "correct" an "existing violation" of the "covenant." It is true that Covered Risk 12 does not use the phrase "forced removal," and does not refer to a recorded notice of violation or enforcement, as is found in a number of other coverages. The court held that this difference in language allowed it to disregard the numerous decisions that have found that enforcement means something more than a mere suggestion in a letter. However, the court went so far as to find that an insured could feel "required" to repair the vault because "one feels compelled by duty, community pressure, or the consequences of inaction, not just by operation of law." The court also refused to find that the insured's claim fell within the limitation of the covered risk, which says that it does not provide coverage for an "obligation to perform maintenance or repair on the Land." It also held that the post-policy exclusion did not apply because, although the vault collapsed after the policy date, the defective design of the vault existed on the date of policy. It said that "[t]his violation of the Indemnity Agreement existed well before the Silbigers ever bought the Property, and as a result, the Silbigers were never aware of nor able to fulfill their duties under the Indemnity Agreement." The Silbiger court's rulings are not a fair interpretation of the precise limits of Covered Risk 12.

3.2.3.2 Owner's Complete Failure Of Title

The measure of loss for an owner's complete failure of title is the fair market value of the property on the date of loss, or the policy limits, whichever is less.[100] Payment to the insured of the fair market value as of the date of loss is deemed to compensate the insured in full for his or her "actual monetary loss or damage," which the policy declares to be the measure of loss.[101] If the value of the property has fallen between the date the insured purchased it and the date of loss, loss is limited to the value as of the date of loss.[102]

When the value of the insured estate is more than what the insured paid for it, and the insured has paid the full purchase price, the loss is measured as the value of the property, and is not limited to what the insured paid for it.[103] An early New York decision, Grimsey v. Lawyers Title Ins.

[101] Condition 8 of the 2006 ALTA policies (Conditions & Stipulations 7 of the 1992 ALTA policies) states: "[t]his policy is a contract of indemnity against actual monetary loss or damage sustained or incurred by the Insured Claimant who has suffered loss or damage by reason of matters insured against by this policy." Condition 6 of the ALTA Residential and Homeowner's policies both use the term "actual loss."

[103] Securities Service, Inc. v. Transamerica Title Ins. Co., 20 Wash.App. 664, 583 P.2d 1217 (1978) had adopted the out-of-pocket rule when the insured had not yet paid for the property in full. That decision was overturned or limited by Miebach v. Safeco Title Ins. Co., 49 Wash.App. 451, 743 P.2d 845 (Wash.App. 1987), rev.den. 110 Wash.2d 1005 (1988), which held that loss due to a lien is measured as the cost to remove it. The two rules are not inconsistent.

Corp.,[104] had limited the insured's recovery to what the insured paid for the land. That rule was overturned in L. Smirlock Realty Corp. v. Title Guarantee Co.,[105] which held that, when the insured holds an estate that is less than fee simple, the insured may collect either its out-of-pocket acquisition costs and expenses or the fair market value of the insured estate, whichever is greater.

Some courts have stated that an owner's loss is not measured as the amount of the insured's equity in the property.[106] However, the owner's loss must represent the value of his or her actual investment in the real estate that the owner lost due to the covered defect in or failure of the title.[107] Also, when the insured learns that his or her title is invalid before the insured has paid the full purchase price, such as when the insured has entered into a contract for deed or installment purchase contract, the insured's loss is equal to the value of his or her estate or interest, and not as if the insured already held the full fee simple estate.

[106] In Swanson v. Safeco Title Ins. Co., 186 Ariz. 637, 925 P.2d 1354 (Ariz.App. 1 Div. 1995), the policy did not except a deed of trust that the seller had granted and which had been paid off but not released. The insureds had granted a deed of trust to the seller for part of the purchase price. The insureds said the unreleased lien stymied their attempt to refinance the carry-back debt. The seller foreclosed and made the high bid at the sheriff's sale, extinguishing the insureds' title. The trial court held that the insureds were entitled to recover the greater of their equity in the property or their out-of-pocket expenses. The appeals court reversed, holding that loss is limited to the lesser of the cost to remove the paid-off deed of trust or, if not removed, the difference in the value of the property with and without the lien. It rejected the insureds' argument that loss should be measured as the amount of money that they had paid toward the purchase price. The court acknowledged that loss measured as the amount of equity investment would yield a different loss payment to every insured, depending on the amount of that investment, rather than a uniform rule based on diminution in value due to the covered title defect or lien. "We decline to adopt a rule that would measure damages under title insurance differently in every case, comparing the 'out-of-pocket' losses and the 'loss of equity.' As evidenced by the parties' arguments, these terms can be as ambiguous as the term 'actual loss.'" 186 Ariz at 641, 925 P.2d at 1358. In Gray v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 27 A.3d 852 (N.H. 2011), the insured wanted to be paid her out-of-pocket expenses, including both purchase price and money spent to develop the land. The court rejected the claim and limited recovery to the fair market value of property on the date the insured discovered that title was defective. The court rejected the insured's incorrect reading of the Swanson decision.

[107] In Gray v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 27 A.3d 852 (N.H. 2011), the insured wanted to be paid her out-of-pocket expenses, including both purchase price and money spent to develop the land. The court limited recovery to the fair market value of property on the date the insured discovered that title was defective, and rejected the insured's citation to Swanson v. Safeco Title Ins. Co., 186 Ariz. 637, 925 P.2d 1354 (Ariz.App. 1 Div. 1995). In Marchetti v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 829 F.3d 498 (7th Cir. (Ill.) 2016), the court held that the insured owners had no loss despite the total failure of their title, because they had made no equity contribution toward the purchase of the property. In addition, the insurer had paid off their lender and obtained a cancellation of the promissory note. The court said: "The Marchettis treat the policy as if it promised to pay owners the market value of the property. But that's not what it says. The property's market value matters only as one determinant of how much loss the owner suffers. The policy covers only 'actual monetary loss or damage sustained or incurred by the Insured Claimant.' The loss the Marchettis suffered was zero, because they had no equity interest in the property."

Most owner's title insurance policies contain provisions allowing the insurer to make payments to insured lenders, the holders of liens that the insured assumed or to which he or she took subject at time of purchase, or liens that the insured granted after the policy date. All such payments reduce the amount of the owner's policy and are deemed to be payments under the owner's policy. See §3.2.2 for a discussion of this policy-noncumulative provision. In many cases, the effect of the noncumulative provision is to limit the owner's loss payment, on a total failure of title, to his or her equity in the property, if any.

Sometimes, the insured has not paid for the insured estate in full at the time title fails, such as when the insured is purchasing under a land contract or contract for deed. In such a circumstance, loss may be measured as the lesser of the aggregate amount of payments made by the insured under the contract or the property's value, or the value of the estate or interest held by the insured as of the date of loss if such estate or interest can be valued separately. In New York, most such loss equations are governed by the rulings in the Smirlock case cited above.

If title completely fails, the insured's loss is measured as the value of the interest actually held by the insured, if that estate or interest is different from that stated in Schedule A of the policy. In Kapelus v. United Title Guaranty Co.,[108] the insured held fee title of record. He was divested of that title by a court, on proof that the deed he held was really for security only. The debt owed to the insured that was secured by the property was in an amount equal to about one-tenth of the value of the property. The insured's loss was limited to the debt, rather than the value of the fee simple estate that the court had already declared was not held by the insured.

3.2.3.3 Coinsurance Provision

The 1987, 1990 and 1992 ALTA Owner's policy stated that the insurer shall pay only a pro rata share of a loss if (a) the policy amount is less than 80 percent of the land's value as of the date of policy, or (b) after the policy date, an improvement is made to the property increasing its value by 20 percent or more.[109] This so-called coinsurance provision is not found in the 2006 and other ALTA policies.

If the property was underinsured on the date of policy, the actual fair market value on date of policy and the amount of insurance are compared to determine the pro rata share for which the insurer is responsible. For example, if the policy is for $100,000, but the property was worth $150,000, the insurer must pay two-thirds of any loss.

[109] Conditions & Stipulations 7(b) of the 1992 ALTA Owner's policy states: "In the event the Amount of Insurance stated in Schedule A at the Date of Policy is less than 80 percent of the value of the insured estate or interest or the full consideration paid for the land, whichever is less, or if subsequent to the Date of Policy an improvement is erected on the land which increases the value of the insured estate or interest by at least 20 percent over the Amount of Insurance stated in Schedule A, then this Policy is subject to the following: (i) where no subsequent improvement has been made, as to any partial loss, the Company shall only pay the loss pro rata in the proportion that the amount of insurance at Date of Policy bears to the total value of the insured estate or interest at Date of Policy; or (ii) where a subsequent improvement has been made, as to any partial loss, the Company shall only pay the loss pro rata in the proportion that 120 percent of the Amount of Insurance stated in Schedule A bears to the sum of the Amount of Insurance stated in Schedule A and the amount expended for the improvement. The provisions of this paragraph shall not apply to costs, attorneys' fees and expenses for which the Company is liable under this policy, and shall only apply to that portion of any loss which exceeds, in the aggregate, 10 percent of the Amount of Insurance stated in Schedule A."

If the property was improved by more than 20 percent after the date of policy, the proportionate loss share is determined by "the amount expended for the improvement." For example, if the amount of insurance was $100,000, and the property was subsequently improved at a cost of $50,000, the insurer's share of the loss is two-thirds of the total. The insured's pro rata share is thus tied to the amount invested in the property for which the insured obtained no additional insurance coverage.

The valid purpose of the coinsurance provision was to rectify two inherent deficiencies in risk-spreading in the title industry. The two prongs of the coinsurance provision addressed the two separate problems.

The first issue is deliberate underinsurance. Certain sophisticated purchasers of title insurance have, on occasion, purchased only as much title insurance coverage as they believed would be adequate to cover the amount of likely losses. For example, an insured might project that it is unlikely to face a loss of greater than 20 percent of the value of the property, and purchase only that amount of insurance. This practice cuts at the heart of the basic principle of insurance: the spreading of risk. Insurers' premiums are based on the value of the property insured, not the dollar amount of the most serious or likely risks assumed as to each property. The industry is already modestly capitalized, and offers only a narrow return on investment. A shift to underinsurance, without a coinsurance provision built into policies, could be a terminal illness for the industry.

In automobile or property insurance, the insurer prevents deliberate underinsurance by obtaining an independent value of the property based on established resale values or construction cost formulae. Title insurers typically do not make such an independent analysis of value. Further, mortgage loan amounts are often not reflective of the value of the real estate because the loan includes other real estate collateral or personal property. Thus, the coinsurance provision allows the insurer to accept the insured's valuation of the real estate for insurance purposes without unduly burdening the insured with proving that value. A gift or below-market sale price may also trigger the coinsurance provision.[110]

The second issue addressed by the coinsurance clause is the improvement of the property after the policy is issued. In other lines of insurance, periodic renewal premiums are paid, at which time the insurer has the ability to adjust the amount of coverage to match the actual value of the property, and charge the appropriate premium. In title insurance, however, there is no such renewal premium. The insured is not prompted to consider whether or not the policy should be increased to cover the current fair market value of the property. Even if the insured on a title policy did think about getting more coverage as the value of the property was increased, however, he or she would often decide not to increase coverage for the reasons discussed immediately above.

[110] "In some situations, the attorney may want to have this condition [the proportional loss provision] eliminated by endorsement. For example, if consideration is not given in cash or the transfer is a gift, the amount of insurance must be agreed on by some method other than simply using the agreed purchase price. The insurer will request a copy of an appraisal or some other reasonable indication of value. Once the amount of insurance is agreed, the attorney might request deletion of this provision to eliminate the risk of estimating, at the time of a claim, whether the amount of insurance was less than 80 percent of the value of the land on the date of the policy." California Title Insurance Practice, CEB, §6.75(2), p. 165. This provision "…intends to prevent an insured from benefiting from paying for less insurance than the value of the interest in land being acquired." Joyce D. Palomar, Title Insurance Law, 2013-2014 Edition, § 10:31, p. 901, West/Thomson Reuters.

If the property has been improved since the policy date, however, almost any loss will be greater than it would have been before the improvement. In Fohn v. Title Ins. Corp. of St. Louis,[111] for example, the policy was issued for $20,000. Several years later, five percent of the land was found not to be owned by the insureds. Appraisers' testimony put the value of the lost property at time of discovery at policy limits. This dramatic increase in value was the due both to appreciation and to improvements added to the property after the date of policy. The insurer argued that loss should be limited to the value of the lost property as of date of policy, but the court applied the Overholtzer rule that loss is determined as of date of discovery.[112] It granted recovery of policy limits. See §3.2.3.4 regarding the date of loss under an owner's policy.

The coinsurance provision of the NYBTU form of policy was discussed in L. Smirlock Realty Corp. v. Title Guarantee Co.[113] The subsequent improvements were found to be less than 20 percent of the policy amount, so the provision did not apply. The insurer argued that the later-built improvements should not be included in valuing the property. The court disagreed, justifying its conclusion on the language of the coinsurance provision, which the court found to contemplate the consideration of the value of later improvements.[114]

3.2.3.4 Owner's Policy Date Of Loss

When the insurer will resolve a claim by paying the diminution in value caused by a covered matter, the value of the property with and without the covered matter must be established as of the appropriate date of loss. The choice of which date is used to measure the property's value can have a significant effect on the amount of loss that is payable. The date of loss under an owner's policy is different from that under a loan policy.[115] The date of loss on loan policies is discussed at §3.2.4.2.

The 2006 ALTA policies state that the insured is entitled to select the date on which loss will be measured, when the insurer seeks to clear title and is unsuccessful. Conditions 5(b) of the 2006 policies states:

(b) If the Company pursues its rights under Section 5 of these Conditions

(unpublished), in which an insured lender argued that loss under a loan policy should be measured on date of discovery, as is the case for an owner's policy. The court ruled instead that loss under a loan policy is measured on the date on which the insured loses its security, because that is the date on which the lender loses its security in the real estate.

and is unsuccessful in establishing the Title, as insured,

(i) the Amount of Insurance shall be increased by 10%, and

(ii) the Insured Claimant shall have the right to have the loss or damage determined either as of the date the claim was made by the Insured Claimant or as of the date it is settled and paid.

Under a 2006 policy, if the insurer has sought to clear title and was unsuccessful, the insured may make this election. The insurer may give the insured a notice of its right to elect one of the two dates of loss in order to prompt the insured to make the election. The two dates presented in Conditions 5(b) of the 2006 policies apply only when the insurer has sought to clear title and was unsuccessful. The 2006 policies do not specify the date of loss in other circumstances.[116] Earlier policy forms also do not specify the date on which loss will be measured. Neither of the dates provided in Conditions 5(b) have been accepted by courts as the date of loss under other circumstances.

The courts in a number of states have established the date of loss to be used for owner's policy losses. The most influential modern decision is Overholtzer v. Northern Counties Title Ins. Co.[117] That court held that "liability should be measured by diminution in the value of the property caused by the defect in title as of the date of the discovery of the defect, measured by the use to which the property is then being devoted."[118] Most states that have considered the issue follow the Overholtzer date-of-discovery rule.[119] Under most circumstances, the Overholtzer date of loss rule favors the insured by increasing the loss to account for inflation in value from policy date to the date of discovery of the defect, or improvements that the insured has made since the policy date.[120] When property has risen in value, even a partial failure of title can result in a loss equal to policy limits.[121] Conversely, the risk of a decline in value is on the insured, not the insurer:

> A title insurance policy does not insure the value of any particular property. In fact, it does not insure the property at all. If the value of the property appreciates or depreciates, the title policy is not affected.[122]

If the property is worth less than policy limits on the date on which the owner discovers the defect in title, recovery is limited to the fair market value as of that date.[123]

Early decisions in several states declared that loss under an owner's policy is measured on the date of policy. However, only two states, Georgia and Virginia, continue to apply date of policy as the date of loss.[124] Date of discovery favors the insured when values are rising. However, after real [120] This can serve as a judicial "inflation rider." Inflation endorsements, once very common but now rare, increase policy amounts by an inflation index, despite the fact that no annual renewal premium is charged. The use of date of discovery as the loss date causes roughly the same result for partial losses, except that the policy amount is still the absolute limit of coverage. See §9.11.4 for a discussion of inflation endorsements.

Co.*, 27 A.3d 852 (N.H. 2011), the court found loss limited to the fair market value on the date of discovery, which was far less than the price paid by the insureds a short time before. The difference in value was due to market decline and because the insureds assumed at time of purchase that the parcel was a buildable lot but it was not. In Mattson Ridge, LLC v. Clear Rock Title, LLP, 824 N.W.2d 622 (Minn. 2012), however, the insured was permitted to recover policy limits when a resale of the property fell through, even though the minor title defect was cured before the sale failed to close. In U.S. Bank, N.A. v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 2012 WL 2362456 (Mich.App.) (unpublished), which concerned a loan policy, the court rejected the insured's argument that, in order to indemnify the insured for title "as insured," the insurer must pay the insured policy limits, although the property had declined in value since the policy date. It said: "Ticor insures against defects, liens, and encumbrances; it does not insure against changes in valuation due to market fluctuations. We find that the trial court erred in simply awarding the amount of insurance to plaintiff."

[124] The Georgia Supreme court adopted the date-of-policy rule in Beaullieu v. Atlanta Title & Trust Co., 60 Ga.App. 400, 4 S.E.2d 78 (1939). The rule was followed by an appeals court in Security Union Title Ins. Co. v. RC Acres, Inc., 269 Ga.App. 359, 604 S.E.2d 547 (Ga.App. 2004), recons.den. (August 31, 2004), cert.den. (November 22, 2004). Beaullieu was quoted in U.S. Life Title Ins. Co. v. Hutsell, 164 Ga.App. 443, 296 S.E.2d 760 (1982). Courts in a number of other states have declined to adopt the Beaullieu reasoning, which analogizes to a breach of warranty claim, on which a seller is liable as of the date the warranty is given. Virginia first adopted date of policy as the date of loss in The Title Ins. Co. of Richmond, Inc. v. Industrial Bank of Richmond, Inc., 156 Va. 322, 157 S.E. 710 (1931), which involved a special assessment and a loan policy. The insurer argued that the insured suffered no loss, because it sold the property at a profit after taking title through foreclosure. The court said that the insured was entitled to the additional money it estate values declined dramatically during the real estate depression that began in 2007, several courts that considered the issue for the first time adopted the date of policy rather than date of discovery, at the request of insureds who sought to have their claims valued at pre-depression prices.[125] When the property's value has declined since the policy was issued, measuring loss as of the policy date causes the insurer to pay for both the diminution in value caused by the covered matter and the decline in the property's value due to market conditions. As one commentator observed, however, market value decline is a risk properly apportioned to the owner; it is not a risk for which one buys insurance coverage.[126] Further, once a state sets the rule that loss is measured as of the policy date, insureds whose property increased in value from policy date to discovery of the title matter will be paid less than they would be if date of discovery were the standard.

The current Texas T-1 and T-1R policies do not identify date of loss. However, one former version of the Texas T-1 policy said loss was measured as of the date on which a proof of loss was submitted.[127] Earlier forms of the Texas policy had explicitly recited the date of policy as the date of loss.[128] should have received on resale if it had not had to pay off the assessment and, in order to come to that conclusion, it said that the "loss occurred at the time it, relying on the policy, made its purchase, and is not measured by what it might realize at some future time under other conditions." In Bluff Ventures Limited Partnership v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 950 F.2d 139 (4th Cir. 1991), the court rejected the insurer's argument that an insured lender did not suffer a loss due to a judgment lien, and reiterated the Industrial Bank holding concerning the date of loss. In Devereux v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 74 Va. Cir. 217, 2007 WL 5971429 (Va.Cir.Ct. 2007), which involved a claim on an owner's policy, the court said that the distinction between owner's and loan policies had been raised and rejected in Industrial Bank. The court also felt obligated to follow Industrial Bank despite the compelling argument that the issuance of an inflation endorsement clearly suggested that loss would be measured based on the value of the property at a date after the date of policy. The court held that the owner's loss was to be measured as of the date of purchase.

[125] In Whitlock v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 399 S.C. 610, 732 S.E.2d 626 (S.C. 2012), the South Carolina Supreme Court answered the question certified to it by a federal court and announced that loss under an owner's title insurance policy is measured as of the date of policy, not date of discovery, despite prevailing case law and a well-reasoned dissent. Several recent decisions concerning loan policies have also adopted the policy date as the loss date. See §3.2.4.2 for those cases. In Breck v. Moore, 910 P.2d 599 (Alaska 1996), the Alaska Supreme Court, after citing Overholtzer and cases that have followed it, commented that "[d]iminution of value should be estimated as of the time of the transaction. Subsequent market factors are therefore irrelevant in estimating this diminution." 910 P.2d at 608. However, the statement may be dictum. In Marcantel v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2017 WL 5991734 (D. Utah 2017) (unpublished), the insurer rather than the insured proposed to measure the loss on the policy date. The court rejected the policy date as the date of loss, but declined to make a ruling on the correct date of loss.

3.2.3.5 Valuing The Property

The most commonly used measure of loss is the reduction in value of the property resulting from the title defect. Thus, evidence of the value of the property is only one part of the equation. The amount of the loss may not be extrapolated solely from an opinion of the land's worth. For example, evidence of the change in the property's assessed value from the time of purchase to the date the covered matter was discovered was not proof of the diminution in value caused by the title defect:

> The Neighbors attempted to prove their damages by establishing the current assessed values of the properties through their own testimony. The assessed values were lower than the purchase prices and the Neighbors concluded that the amount of the decrease represented their damages. Neither Neighbor, however, established that the decrease in value was based solely on the [title defect]. ... As noted by the trial judge, "[The decrease in value] may have been because of the economy or they paid too much for it. There are a lot of things." We agree.[129]

Several early cases held that, when the claim surfaced while a sale was pending, the loss may be measured as a bona fide reduction in sales price attributable to the defect.[130] Note, however, that the policy terminates on the sale of the property. See §7.3 concerning termination of the owner's policy. Further, any such reduction must be attributable only to the title defect, and negotiated in good faith. A reduction in price combined with an assignment of the title claim itself was found to render the amount of the reduction inherently untrustworthy for fixing the diminution in value.[131] The two primary means for valuing diminution are by the mathematical formula explained at §3.2.3.6 and an appraisal (see §3.2.3.7).

If the insured fails to provide reliable evidence of the difference in value of the property with and without the claimed title defect, it has not proven a loss and may not recover under the policy. Reliable evidence is normally provided by either a bona fide reduction in sale price as a result of the defect, or competent appraisal testimony. Most jurisdictions allow an owner of property to testify as to the value of his or her own property, but such testimony is not expert testimony. Therefore, such lay owner testimony alone is insufficient to establish loss.[132]

The court found this insufficient, ruling that the insured "should have produced the best evidence available for estimating the dollar amount of its loss. ... We uphold the trial court's ruling that [the insured] failed to prove its damages by a preponderance of the evidence." The court affirmed the award of $0 damages. In *Lauritzen v. 3.2.3.6 Calculating Per-Square-Foot Value

Mathematical formula letter

One commonly-used method to value the loss of the title to relatively small portions of the insured parcel is by the use of a mathematical formula. This formula avoids the delay of the appraisal process. It is more objective than an appraisal in the sense that it is formulaic rather than being based on an opinion of value. The use of a formula is not appropriate in every case. However, it can be a helpful aid when the property at issue is negligible in area, a competent appraiser cannot readily be located, or when the insured wants to avoid the delay in obtaining an appraisal.

The formula works as follows: first, determine the total number of square feet in the insured parcel, including the disputed parcel.[133] Then divide the value of the property as of the date of loss by the total square footage. Value can be determined from the purchase price, a recent appraisal, or assessed value. If the property is improved, the per-foot value will be weighted by the value of the improvements. The improvement value should not be considered in determining a loss of unimproved land. A good starting point in such cases is often the assessed value of the land separate from improvements. If the assessed value of the land only is not available for the year as of which the loss is to be measured, first determine the value of the entire property as of the correct time, and then adjust that number according to the ratio of value for the current year between improvements and raw land. The loss value is determined by multiplying the per-foot value by the number of square feet of the affected area.

The above formula is also appropriate in claims involving unexcepted easements. However, in such cases, the land value is discounted to a percentage thereof to reflect the fact that title is not lost, but encumbered. The amount of the discount varies according to the type of easement involved and the use to which the land is put. A commonly-used discount factor is 50%, but the appropriate Co., 424 P.3d 1043, 2018 UT App 58 (Utah App. 2018), the insurer argued that the insured was not competent to testify about diminution in value. The court ruled on summary judgment that the insured could testify, based on the rule developed in condemnation cases that "an owner of real property who is familiar with his property is competent to give evidence on the market value of that property." Utah Dep't of Transp. v. Jones, 694 P.2d 1031, 1036 (Utah 1984). The court gave little guidance as to how the diminution in value should be measured, but did say that all "categories or theories of damages that Lauritzen might articulate... must be linked to the language of the Policy." In Natural Gas Pipeline Co. of Am. v. Justiss, 397 S.W.3d 150 (Tex. 2012), the Texas court said that a property owner may testify about the value of his property. This Property Owner Rule creates "a rebuttable presumption that a landowner is personally familiar with his property and knows its fair market or fair rental value, and thus is qualified to express an opinion about that value." However, the owner’s testimony "does not necessarily provide relevant evidence of value that can support a judgment" because the owner’s testimony must "meet the same requirements as any other opinion evidence."

[133] Square footage is sometimes recited in tax or assessment records. Most surveyors have software that will compute area, and basic software of this type is available on the internet. Area can be computed by hand in most cases, using principles of geometry. The square footage of a rectangular parcel is equal to its length multiplied by its width. If the parcel is not a rectangle, the area can be determined by reducing the parcel to one or more rectangles and triangles. Every triangle has half the area of the rectangle of which it is a subpart.

number can be anywhere from 10% to 90%, depending on the situation.

3.2.3.7 Valuation By Appraisal

Letter of instruction to appraiser

FORM 15, Appendix A
Instruction to insured obtaining own appraisal

FORM 91, Appendix A
Agreement for binding appraisal

The second means of valuing a loss of land, or the effect of an encumbrance on title, is by appraisal. It is the insured's responsibility to provide a proof of loss. When the insured seeks payment for the loss of title to the insured parcel, or its loss in value due to a covered matter, a valuation is part of its proof of loss and the insured should pay for and deliver an appraisal to the insurer. The insurer also has the right to obtain an appraisal.

There are a number of types of appraisals available. The circumstances will dictate which form of appraisal is preferred in each situation. Frequently, in rural areas especially, the choice of appraisers and appraisal types is quite limited. The usual preference is a valuation performed by a person holding accreditation from one or more of the various appraisal associations. The best-known certification is from the Appraisal Institute, whose members carry the designation of MAI (Member, Appraisal Institute). In most locations, the simplest and least expensive valuation is the "broker price opinion" or BPO, which is prepared by a real estate broker based on comparable-sales information, and which is typically delivered as a relatively simple written report. In a lawsuit concerning the amount of loss payable under the policy, the court will allow only a qualified real estate appraiser, using a recognized and reliable appraisal method, to opine about the diminution in value caused by the title issue.[134]

On occasion, the insured and insurer agree to retain an appraiser jointly, sharing the cost. In such cases, the parties will want to work together to find an appraiser who is qualified, independent, and without a conflict of interest. The inquiry may begin with obtaining a list of appraisers in the general locale who meet the educational and certification standards desired by the parties. The insurer and insured should both then review the list and identify in writing which, if any, of the appraisers listed would have a conflict of interest. Conflict of interest is necessarily a flexible standard, depending on the size of the community and the stature of the parties in the local real estate community. However, it might encompass the following: family and marital relationship, business partnerships between the insured and the appraiser, steady or current use of the appraiser by either party, and any relationship of the appraiser to the property to be appraised. From the remaining names on the list, then, the insurer and insured may agree on one person to perform the appraisal. The insurer and insured may also agree in writing to be bound by the opinion given by the appraiser.

3.2.3.8 Appraisal Methodology

The Uniform Standards of Professional Appraisal Practice (USPAP) are considered the most learned set of national standards for appraisal method. USPAP was developed in the 1980s by a joint committee representing the major U.S. and Canadian appraisal organizations, following the savings and loan crisis. The Appraisal Foundation (TAF) was formed by those groups, and took over administration of USPAP in 1987.[135]

The three appraisal methods are comparable sales, capitalization of income, and replacement cost. The comparable sales or "market" method is the most reliable in most instances, but the income method is most appropriate for property which is income-producing. The cost method is typically considered the best measure of value for newly-constructed buildings.[136]

The income method was applied in L. Smirlock Realty Corp. v. Title Guaranty Co.[137] That case illustrates the complexities which can be involved in the use of the income method. The income method was also applied in Gauler v. Solicitors' Loan & Trust Co.,[138] in which the insured paid for a ground lease, but failed to get title to the ground which was leased. The court awarded the full cumulative income from the lease. It failed to discount that cumulative income to present value, however, which is the normal modern appraisal method. In a third case, the income method was used to establish a loss in value caused by a reciprocal parking easement.[139]

A valuation for purposes of determining the diminution in value due to a covered matter under a title insurance policy is different from the method customarily used by an appraiser to value the real estate. The standard appraisal method may be altered by specific written instructions from the client. Such an instruction letter is required for every request for a diminution in value appraisal. The appraiser must be instructed to produce two values, not one—the value of the property without the covered matter, and the value subject to the covered matter. In order to produce a value for the property as if the covered matter did not exist, the appraiser is instructed to make an assumption of commonly referred to as a hypothetical condition, which is defined as an assumed fact that is contrary to known fact, but which is supposed for the particular purpose of the valuation analysis. The appraiser should state in the report that he or she made this hypothetical condition assumption. Also, both values are to be produced as of the same date, which is the date of loss and not the present date. This also is contrary to appraisal industry custom, in which value is determined as of the present.

In addition, the appraiser may need an instruction to value the property according to the use to which it was devoted on the date of loss, which in most jurisdictions is the date of discovery. The seminal modern decision on the measure of loss, Overholtzer v. Northern Counties Title Ins. Co., stated that "liability should be measured [as of date of discovery] by the use to which the property is then being devoted."[140] In Overholtzer, the insured parcel was a farm on the policy date. The insured had invested money to convert it to a sawmill before he discovered the covered matter, which was a pipeline easement that frustrated use of the property as a mill. By measuring the value based on the converted use, the Overholtzer court increased the amount of loss payable to the insured.

Generally used appraisal standards require an appraiser to establish fair market value according to the property's highest and best use. However, that "best use" is hypothetical, and may be different from the use to which the property is devoted when the title defect is discovered. When valuing diminution under an owner's policy, a title insurer typically instructs the appraiser to value the property based on the use to which the property was devoted on the date of discovery, following the Overholtzer formula stated above, whether or not that existing use was the "highest and best use" of the property at that time.

The tension between the insured's actual use and the property's highest and best use is illustrated in Anderson v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co. of California.[141] In that case, as in Overholtzer, the property was subject to an unexcepted underground pipeline easement, and the insured was in the process of developing the property when he discovered the easement. However, unlike Overholtzer, the insured had not built the improvements yet, but had merely drawn plans and sought approvals. The insurer sought to measure loss based on the present use, which was a lot with a boarded-up house on it. The court ruled, however, that the insured was entitled to have loss measured based on the highest and best use of the property, which was as the future site of an approved duplex. The court relied on the patently incorrect statement from Overholtzer that "[t]he policy necessarily looks to the future. It speaks of the future." It also justified its conclusion on the premise that the insured had relied on the "representations" about the state of title found in the policy, a doctrine that California has since rejected.[142]

[140] 116 Cal.App.2d 113, 253 P.2d 116 (Cal.App. 1 Dist. 1953). The popular Overholtzer holding that loss should be measured on a date after the policy date is based on the court's questionable assertion that a title insurance policy necessarily speaks to the future. That statement was later rebutted by Quelimane Co., Inc. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 19 Cal.4th 26, 77 Cal.Rptr.2d 709, 960 P.2d 513 (Cal. 1998), which made the conventional observation that "[t]itle insurance, as opposed to other types of insurance, does not insure against future events. It is not forward looking. It insures against losses resulting from differences between the actual title and the record title as of the date title is insured." Quelimane emphasizes that Overholtzer gives the insured a benefit by setting the loss date after the policy date, including the value of improvements built by the insured.

[142] "In this case, we see no reason why Anderson's recovery should depend upon the fact that, unlike the Overholtzers, he had not already constructed improvements at the time the defect in title was discovered. Anderson relied upon representations by Fidelity in planning improvements on the property and in closing the sale. More importantly, he

Another important factor in determining the correct appraisal method is what assumptions the appraiser is asked to make other than the hypothetical assumption that title is not affected by the defect that is the subject of the claim. An "extraordinary assumption" is an assertion about a physical, legal or economic characteristic of the property that the appraiser has been instructed by the client to presume to be true but which, if not true, "could alter the appraiser's opinions or conclusions."[143] The appraiser will typically list all such extraordinary assumptions that he or she has been told to make in the first section of the appraisal report.

A "hypothetical condition" is a condition that is contrary to what the appraiser knows to be the true physical, legal or economic characteristics of the property, but that is used and is necessary to complete a valuation for the particular purpose of the assignment.[144] When an appraiser is asked to perform a diminution in value appraisal, the appraiser is told to produce two values, with and without the title defect or encumbrance. The "without" value is based on the hypothetical condition that the defect or encumbrance does not exist. The "with" value, of course, does not include the hypothetical condition. It is the difference between the two values that represents the diminution in value.

In most situations, the appraisal should not be based on any extraordinary assumptions. The one hypothetical condition described above is found in almost every appraisal performed for a title insurance loss valuation. However, the title insurer should be vigilant, in reviewing the appraisal report, to verify that the valuation does not rest on any other hypothetical condition. For example, it is possible for a sophisticated or creative appraiser to create a fanciful and exaggerated "diminution" in value by beginning with extraordinary assumptions about improvements that might be built and income that could be derived from those improvements, subtracting from that value the cost of constructing the hypothetical building. The correct method for title insurance claim purposes is to instruct the appraiser to value the property with the improvements that were in place when the title defect was discovered, and not based on hypothetical improvements that the insured might have built but for the covered matter.[145] The correct method for valuing raw land is to establish its value on the relied upon Fidelity's representations in tendering the purchase price to the seller. Anderson's inability to develop the property in the manner expected due to a recorded easement missed by Fidelity may be just as injurious as a property owner's discovery of an easement after development." 17 Cal.Rptr.2d at 542.

[145] In Rakhshani v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2007 WL 1470460 (Minn.App.) (unpublished), the court held that an insured used an incorrect method for valuing loss due to a missed easement, when his appraisal was premised on value ascribed to a hypothetical building that might have been constructed that would have encroached into the area of the easement that was subject of the claim. The appeals court affirmed the holding of the trial court that diminution was not to be measured based on the assumption of the existence of buildings that had not been built. In Gomez v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co. of New York, 34 Misc.3d 1233(A), 950 N.Y.S.2d 608 (Table), 2012 N.Y. Slip Op. 50360(U), 2012 WL 671935 (N.Y.Sup.) (unpublished), the insured claimed that he had intended to add several floors to the existing building on the insured parcel, and was thwarted because the neighboring existing building encroached not one inch but several inches onto the insured parcel. The court held that loss due to the encroachment was not to be measured as the value the open market in its present, undeveloped state, based on sales of comparable parcels of roughly equivalent size, location and zoning classification, not a hypothetical value based on assumed but non-existent improvements.[146] However, when the policy insures the title to condominium units not yet built, the court may allow the appraiser to testify about the value of those proposed units.[147]

The correct method for title insurance claim purposes is to instruct the appraiser to value the property based on all of the facts about the property that existed on the date of valuation, including its then-current zoning classification and applicable building code standards, facts about its physical state including any environmental contamination, tenants, and other facts that affect its value.[148] An appraiser can radically increase or decrease the value of the property, and thus the purported loss, by resting the valuation on other hypothetical conditions, such as that the property is fully leased, properly managed, not in bankruptcy, or that zoning approvals and building permits not yet received will be granted.[149] However, such assumptions and methods turn the appraisal into a hypothetical insured property would have had if the additional stories had been added, minus the cost of the structure, as the insured proposed. Rather, it said, the loss was the difference in the value of the property on the date of discovery, with and without the encroachment. The court cited L. Smirlock Realty Corp. v. Title Guar. Co., 97 A.D.2d 208 (2nd Dept.1983), which quoted with approval from Overholtzer v. Northern Counties Title Ins. Co., 116 Cal.App.2d 113, 253 P.2d 116 (Cal.App. 1 Dist. 1953) that "liability should be measured by diminution in the value of the property caused by the defect in title as of the date of the discovery of the defect, measured by the use to which the property is then being devoted."

[146] In Weber Estates Investments, LLC v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2014 IL App (4th) 130892-U, 2014 WL 4793008 (Ill.App. 4 Dist. 2014) (unpublished), the court affirmed that the loss due to an underground gas pipeline was the $4,200 reduction in the property's value as undeveloped land, not the $521,578.76 the insureds spent to move the gas line or the $574,000 claimed effect on the value of the land as if it were already developed. The court granted the insurer's motion to exclude the testimony of the insured's appraiser, because he had based his opinions on assumptions that are not valid in measuring a title insurance policy loss. In Rakhshani v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2007 WL 1470460 (Minn.App.) (unpublished), the diminution effect of a municipal sewer easement was properly measured based on the land as vacant, not based on an assumption of a building that might have been built over the easement area.

[147] In IDC Properties, Inc. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2017 WL 5151347 (D.R.I.) (unpublished), the court denied the insurer's motion to exclude the testimony of an appraiser who set a value on three condominium units not built. The court said the policy insured the title to those units. The insurer's main objection was that the appraiser assumed that other unit owners would have approved the building of the units, although he considered it unlikely that the unit owners would give their consent. The court allowed the testimony because the insured asserted that the policy protected against the risk of unit owner approval.

[148] In Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co. v. OMG Americas, Inc., 2013 WL 5435716 (D. Utah) (unpublished), the court held that a title insurer was entitled to receive through discovery information about environmental contamination on the property and its cleanup cost, to be used by the insurer to determine if the loss of the insured lease was a net loss or gain to the insured.

[149] In Spalding v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 463 S.W.3d 770 (Mo. 2015), the court refused to overturn a jury verdict that accepted the valuation performed by the insured's appraiser, who testified that the 419 acres purchased by the insured for $1.5 million was worth $5.7 million if it included the one acre whose title failed, but had a value of only $1.6 million without the one acre, yielding a "diminution" of $4.1 million. This appraiser assumed that the vacant land had already been transformed into a subdivision of 385 lots and that all necessary permits and approvals had been issued. Also, the hypothetical subdivision included parcels that were not insured in the policy and never owned by the insured. The court said that the insurer's arguments about the method went to the appraiser's credibility, and said it was not error to refuse to bar his testimony at trial. Similarly, in Mattson Ridge, LLC v. Clear Rock Title, LLP, 824 N.W.2d 622 (Minn.

rather than a way of measuring the insured's actual loss.

A property's valuation may also be wildly distorted if the appraiser uses speculative assumptions or methods in valuing the effect of the title issue, such as an assumed percentage reduction in the value of property due to its allegedly unmarketable title, the loss of privacy at an exclusive residential development due to an access easement, the fear of stray voltage when the claim is about a power line easement, or the fear of an explosion or contamination caused by a pipeline easement that is the subject of the claim.[150]

In some circumstances, land or interests in property have a greater value in the aggregate 2012), the insured's appraiser valued the property as if it had already been converted from farm land to a large residential subdivision, and that all necessary permits and approvals had been issued. In Helms v. Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 2018 WL 708123 (D.Neb. 2018) (unpublished), the appraiser asserted that a fifty percent diminution in value to farm land was due to his contention that, without the land at issue, the farm could not be irrigated by a sprinkler running from a center pivot. The court refused to exclude the testimony of the insured's appraiser, because he had the requisite credentials, but the insurer would be entitled to cross-examine him to develop its assertion that he used an unsupported assumption in creating an assumed diminution in value.

[150] Some appraisals include factors that are in the category of inadmissible junk science. See, for example, First American Title Ins. Co. v. 273 Water Street, LLC, 2013 WL 3871443 (Conn.Super.) (unpublished), in which the diminution in value to a parcel caused by a pedestrian easement would have been $40,000 if the property had been owned by someone other than a celebrity, but a real estate broker opined, with little or no supporting data, that the effect on value to that property was more than $2 million because it had been the long-time residence of Katharine Hepburn. Also, in Mattson Ridge, LLC v. Clear Rock Title, LLP, 824 N.W.2d 622 (Minn. 2012), the court accepted an appraiser's unfounded opinion that the value of property with "unmarketable" title is reduced by up to 90%, as if there was a scientific formula for the effect of unmarketability of title. It is relatively common for an appraiser to make an assumption that the property owner could obtain a permit for building or land division, or that the property could be rezoned, or that certain uses would be allowed despite the terms of encumbrances that burden the property and are excepted in the policy. All such assumptions change the property's value due to speculative assumptions about actions that might occur that had not occurred on the date of loss. Such assumptions should not be accepted for valuations to set diminution in value. In Gaviota Holdings, LLC v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 7334429 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), the court of appeals refused to overturn a jury verdict that accepted an appraiser's opinion that a property subject to an underground gas pipeline easement was worth four percent less due to the possibility of an explosion. This "diminution" percentage was derived from a study of the reduction in values of property in the vicinity of two actual gas pipeline explosions. The appraiser also reduced the value of the property by another four percent due to the loss of "privacy" at an exclusive residential vacant home site if the owner shared a driveway already built and used by oil company personnel under an excepted lease. The appraiser admitted, however, that anyone who would build a home on the 38-acre parcel would not use the existing driveway but would build a new one far away from the existing drive. The combined alleged reduction in value due to these speculative factors was $1,510,000. In Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. RM Kids, LLC, 337 Ga.App. 638, 788 S.E.2d 542 (Ga.App. 2016), the appeals court refused to find that the trial court had erred in allowing the jury to hear appraiser testimony about how the average consumer's view of "environmental stigma" on the property would affect its planned development. The appraiser who testified gave opinions that were a cross between traditional appraisal science and consumer focus group testing. He opined, based mainly on a focus group test, that "potential buyers of homes in a dense residential subdivision—such as the one BBC planned to develop on the subject property—would be 'scared off' by the environmental stigma [but that the land] could be developed for large-acreage estate parcels because potential buyers would be less likely to view the environmental issues as a deterrent." The court thus allowed the loss payable due to an encumbrance on title to be distorted by subjective opinions about contamination. In a second appeal after trial, the court refused to overturn the substantial jury verdict that was based on the appraiser's stigma opinions. Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. RM Kids, LLC, ___ Ga.App. ___, 835 S.E.2d 21 (Ga.App. 2019).

than separately, which is commonly known as the assemblage value factor.[151] The title insurer does not dispute this as a principle sometimes applied in valuing property for other purposes. Assemblage is an assumption, however, and one not consistent with the particular valuation method required to determine the diminution in value to the insured parcel due to a covered matter. If the insured owned several adjoining parcels, all of which parcels are insured in the same policy, the appraiser may appropriately consider the assembled value of the combined parcels in measuring a policy loss. However, for title insurance purposes, the appraiser may not value the insured parcel based on the assumption that the insured could acquire separate parcels or interests owned by other parties. The appraiser also may not disregard the ownership regime to which the property was subject when the policy was issued. In American Title Ins. Co. v. East West Financial,[152] a number of insureds made claims on their units in a condominium project. The insured's expert appraised the property not as separate units owned by different people, but as one combined resort complex under a new ownership regime. The East West court said this appraisal method was flawed, because it did not value the interests insured, which were units in an existing condominium regime:

> Although it might be that the "highest and best" use for the individual condominium units would be as rooms in an operating motel, this is not what was insured. As the district court pointed out, what was insured was "title to and the validity of ... mortgage liens on individual condominium units." Id. While it is true that a number of these units were located in the same motel, the insurance was not issued on this basis and did not insure the condominium units as potential rooms in a motel.
> ... Even though the "proportionate share" of the motel's value (i.e., the value of the motel divided by the number of individual condominium units), might be the best evidence of the value of the unit, it is not necessarily so. See Allison v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 907 F.2d 645 (7th Cir. 1990). A given unit might be worth more or less than the value of the motel divided by the number of units. It was Bay Loan's responsibility to introduce evidence as to the value of each unit... .[153]

In Bohr v. First American Title Ins. Co.,[154] the insured bought all three units in a condominium, obtaining title insurance policies for each unit from a different insurer. All of the policies missed a recorded amendment stating that an excepted easement did not expire when the existing building was demolished, which the insured said frustrated her plans to tear down the small condominium and build a much larger one. The court held that the insured was not permitted to value the entire property as one parcel, but the appraiser could consider the assemblage value of the units in determining highest and best use:

> Nothing in the policies or the case law cited or located by the Court prohibits the expert appraiser from considering the recognized doctrine of assemblage as a relevant factor in determining diminution of value so long as it is in the context of appraising each unit individually. … This is not to say that use of assemblage is required here, but only that an expert appraiser is not precluded from utilizing it if consistent with proper standards for professional appraisal practice.[155]

Thus, Bohr says that, if the insured owns more than one condominium unit or all of them, the appraiser may consider and include any increase in value that results from the fact that the insured has assembled the units into one person's hands, but must value the units in their present regime and physical structure, not as a proposed or hypothetical regime or project. However, in Allison v. Ticor Title Ins. Co.,[156] involving a 200-unit condominium, the appraiser valued the resort as a whole, and then divided that value by the number of units. The resort had been structured as a quasi-time-share, with 75-year unit leases, a rental pooling agreement, and a hotel services management contract. Because the web of contracts was so complicated, and the entities holding the contract rights were in bankruptcy so that the court would have the power to extinguish the contracts, the court found it acceptable to assume that the entire regime would be extinguished and replaced. This ruling violated the principle that the title insurer indemnifies the insureds based on the interests that they bought.

It is imperative that the insurer understand valuation method well enough to identify the specific ways in which an appraisal report deviates from the appropriate method. A claim administrator must carefully analyze an appraisal submitted by an insured to verify that it was performed based on the appropriate assumptions, using the method that is correct for the specialized purpose of ascribing a diminution in value under the policy's terms. The administrator must verify that the valuation date is correct and that the appraiser did not include false or speculative opinions or assumptions that skewed the value opinion.

If there is litigation over the amount of the diminution, the testimony of an appraiser should be excluded under a motion in limine if his or her valuations are based on a method or assumptions that are inconsistent with the policy's terms.[157] In many cases, the motion in limine is limited to an explanation as to why the appraiser's method is incorrect for purposes of valuing an insurance loss.[158] The appraiser may have excellent qualifications. The insurer need not attack the qualifications or credentials of the appraiser, and may typically concede that the assumptions and conditions used by the appraiser would be permissible in a different kind of valuation. In many cases, the valuation must be excluded simply because it rests on a method, or on assumptions and conditions, that are inappropriate for this type of valuation.

3.2.3.9 Consequential Damages

There are a variety of elements of damage that insured owners sometimes claim as loss in addition to the loss as described in the policy. Most of these subjects are addressed under §3.4.9, in the context of damages incurred while title is being cleared. Some consequential damage claims are brought as tort claims, which are discussed in Chapter 15.

However, the diminution in value measure of loss as stated in the policy is not merely one type of loss payable under the policy, but the sole measure of the loss that is payable under this contract of indemnity. Thus, most courts have refused to grant damages to insureds that go beyond the measure of loss stated in the policy.[159] However, certain classes of damage are not explicitly barred by the terms of the policy.[160] For example, one court refused to dismiss a claim against an insurer for the "tax consequences" of its claimed breach of contract. The Ninth Circuit admitted that on a value that was based on incorrect assumptions that greatly affected the claimed diminution, ruling that those issues went to the witness's credibility only. In Helms v. Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 2018 WL 708123 (D.Neb. 2018) (unpublished), the court refused to exclude the testimony of the insured's appraiser, because he had the requisite credentials and valued the real estate, but the insurer would be entitled to cross-examine him to develop its assertion that he used the wrong method to establish diminution in value. The appraiser asserted that a fifty percent diminution in value to farm land was due to his contention that, without the land at issue, the farm could not be irrigated by a sprinkler running from a center pivot.

[158] The Appraisal of Real Estate, Twelfth Edition, Appraisal Institute, acknowledges that the appraiser should be forthcoming in the report as to the assumptions and limitations on which the valuation opinion is based: "The use of extraordinary assumptions, hypothetical conditions, or general limiting conditions and assumptions may result in a circumstance in which an appraiser cannot render an unqualified opinion of value. Proper disclosure and explanations directly associated with citations of value estimates help avoid misunderstandings or abuses of appraisals." The Appraisal of Real Estate, Twelfth Edition, Chapter 4, The Valuation Process, at p. 56.

[159] In Gray v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 27 A.3d 852 (N.H. 2011), the court rejected the insured owner's claim for building costs she had incurred on the property before she discovered that her title was bad, because the policy limits compensable loss to the diminution in value to the property up to the land's value. In Granelli v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2012 WL 2072648 (D.N.J.) (unpublished), the court dismissed the insureds' claims that they had lost the capital gains tax deferral on the sale of a residence because the title defect held up its sale, in addition to their carrying costs for the house, lost use of the sale proceeds and the depreciation in the home's value from 2008 to 2012. The Third Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the summary judgment in favor of the insurer because it found a question of fact as to whether or not the insurer had cleared title diligently, but did not address the lower court's findings on the additional elements of loss claimed by the insured. Granelli v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 569 Fed.Appx. 125, 2014 WL 2724459 (3rd Cir. (N.J.)) (unpublished).

neither party had cited any state law holding that a party may recover losses due to tax consequences caused by a breach of contract, but "Hawai'i courts generally allow plaintiffs to recover any loss that can be shown with reasonable certainty, and have rejected a per se rule that certain types of losses are too speculative as a matter of law."[161] On remand, however, the district court ruled that the insurer was not required to pay any taxes, because the money received by the insured was in payment for substantive rights rather than damages incurred because of defective title.[162]

3.2.4 Determining Amount Of Loss On A Loan Policy

Once a lender has come into title to the insured parcel, a claim is resolved under a loan policy in the same manner as it would be under an owner's policy, except as noted throughout this chapter. Thus, the reader may follow the practices described throughout this chapter that address claims concerning title defects, access and encumbrances if the claim has been made under a loan policy and the lender is in title when the claim is made.

However, loan policy claims are not resolved in the same manner as owner's policy claims while the lender holds its mortgage and its borrower owns the land whose title is insured. An owner's policy insures the owner's title to the land. However, the primary purpose of a loan policy is to insure the validity, priority and enforceability of the insured lender's security interest in the land. Not every defect in title impairs the lender's security position. Also, a claim concerning a lien is resolved differently under a loan policy, as explained in §3.2.4.1.

Thus, while an owner has the right to seek a resolution of a claim as soon as he or she discovers that title is defective,[163] a lender does not suffer a loss unless three events occur. These three events are sometimes referred to as the "three Ds": a defect in title, a default by the borrower, and a diminution in property value that causes the lender's collateral to be worth less than the amount of its loan. This truism has been phrased in various ways:

> The broad rule set forth in these cases is that a secured lender suffers an indemnifiable "loss" under a title policy only if the lender fails to recoup the debt because of the insured-against senior lien.[164]

Defining and measuring actual loss under a title insurance policy is not the same for > the owner who has title to property, and a mortgagee who holds only a security interest in the borrower's title. The fee interest of an owner is immediately diminished by the presence of a lien since resale value will always reflect the cost of removing the lien. A mortgagee's loss cannot be measured unless the underlying debt is not repaid and the security for the mortgage proves inadequate. Green v. Evesham Corp., 179 N.J.Super. 105, 109, 430 A.2d 944, 946 (1981). For a mortgagee, title insurance undertakes to indemnify against loss or damage sustained by reason of defects of title or liens upon the land, but does not guarantee either that the mortgaged premises are worth the amount of the mortgage or that the mortgage debt will be paid.[165]

> [W]hile a title insurance policy insuring the interest of a real estate owner and a title insurance policy insuring the interest of a mortgagee are both contracts of indemnity, ... nevertheless, substantive differences between the insured interest of an owner and that of a mortgagee results [sic] in a significant difference in what constitutes 'loss or damage' under each type of title policy. Title defects and liens directly and adversely affect the property owner because the owner is entitled to the full market value of the property and that value is immediately reduced by outstanding title defects and liens. A mortgagee's loss is measured by the extent to which the insured debt is not repaid because the value of security property is diminished or impaired by outstanding lien encumbrances or title defects covered by the title insurance. Therefore, superior liens or title defects in claims may exist which reduce the market value of the security property (the value to the owner) yet result in no loss or damage to the insured mortgagee because the effect of the title problems does not reduce the value of security property below the amount of an indebtedness secured or because the indebtedness is otherwise secured or paid.[166]

> [The insurer's] liability is limited to the lesser of: (1) Bay Loan's actual loss; (2) the amount of insurance; or (3) the indebtedness secured by the insured mortgage at the time of the loss. ... [The lender's] actual loss under each policy would be the lesser of (1) the amount uncollectible from the defaulting borrower, or (2) the fair market value of the unit at the time the prior mortgagee foreclosed.[167]

The Blackhawk analysis was also adopted in Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. RM Kids, LLC, 337 Ga.App. 638, 788 S.E.2d 542 (Ga.App. 2016).

A lender that has not proven that the loan is in default and that its security had been impaired "has not yet proven that it incurred any loss."[168]

Because a lender does not immediately suffer a loss due to an encumbrance on or defect in title, it is customary for a title insurer to adopt watchful waiting in response to a claim under a loan policy when the claim concerns a matter affecting title, and not the validity, priority or enforceability of the insured mortgage, when the lender insured has not yet taken title to the property. For example, the existence of an easement on the property that is not excepted in the policy does not cause the lender a loss payable under the policy unless and until the lender becomes the owner of the property. See §3.1 for a complete discussion of watchful waiting. Also see §7.9, which discusses how, under Condition 2, the loan policy continues in effect if the lender takes title to the property.

Once the lender does take title to the property, the insurer may assume that all conditions for payment of a claim under the loan policy have been fulfilled. The insurer will then resolve a covered claim made by the insured lender in essentially the same manner as it would under an owner's policy.

When the validity, priority or enforceability of the insured mortgage are attacked, the insurer will not respond to the claim by adopting a watchful waiting posture. Instead, the title insurer will promptly address a loan policy claim made before the lender takes title that attacks the insured mortgage and invokes a Covered Risk. For example, the insurer will act to protect or preserve the priority of the insured mortgage versus another lien or interest that claims priority over the mortgage. The insurer will also defend the insured mortgage's validity, such as against the assertion that the borrower's signature was forged. If a party holding a senior lien that is not excepted in the policy threatens to extinguish the insured mortgage, the insurer will defend the insured against that threat.

The Kimberly court put the matter this way: "The lending institution is only interested to the extent of its loan. The ultimate validity of the title, for other purposes, is simply not relevant to the lender." In First Citizens Bank & Trust Co. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 320 P.3d 406 (Colo.App. 1 Div. 2014), the court quoted 2 Gregory J. Notarianni, Colorado Practice Series: Methods of Practice § 63:3, at 271 (Cathy S. Krendl ed., 6th ed., 2012), which says: "An insured mortgagee has not suffered an identifiable loss unless and until it forecloses its insured deed of trust and a title defect reduces the value of the property, thereby preventing the mortgagee from recouping its loan amount upon resale. If a title defect exists, but the value of the property is nevertheless sufficient to pay the mortgagee its loan amount, then there is no damage compensable under the loan policy." However, the court found that the insured lender was not premature in bringing suit against the insurer for payment based on its defective lien, although it was still litigating with the defaulted borrower and might obtain some payment from it. The court held that the final determination clause did not stay the coverage suit, since the insurer was not paying for the lawsuit against the borrower, and that action will not clear title. In First American Title Ins. Co. of Texas v. Willard, 949 S.W.2d 342 (Tex.App.-Tyler 1997), even though the borrower was not in default, the insurer was found liable for the reduction in the lender's security caused by the undisclosed easement. The court also had bad news for the lender, however: it upheld a judgment in favor of the easement holder against the lender for trespass. The court reasoned that, when the construction lender discovered the trespass, it could have ordered the half-built house moved, but instead took an indemnity from the borrower and continued funding the loan. This fact supported the jury's verdict that the lender "aided and assisted" the borrower's trespass. The conditions to payment of loss under a loan policy are examined in Pedowitz, Title Insurance in New York Today, New York State Bar Journal, Vol. 68, No. 2, p. 12 (Feb. 1996). The article is a thorough analysis of the coverage of the title insurance policies.

One caveat to the above principle is that the insurer may elect to conduct watchful waiting and take no action due to the existence of a senior lien for which there is policy coverage, when there is no imminent threat that the insured's lien will be extinguished by the other lien holder. This response is especially common if the insured mortgage also has not yet been foreclosed, because there is no ready forum in which to litigate the priority issue and the amount of loss, if any, is typically not calculable until the insured takes title or is foreclosed out.[169]

However, a senior lien will threaten the insured if the borrower defaults and the senior lien holder forecloses. If the insurer conducts watchful waiting, it will typically inform the insured that it should give notice immediately if the senior lender starts a foreclosure action or gives notice of a non-judicial sale. The risks in the watchful waiting approach are that the insured lender will not receive notice of the foreclosure sale or will fail to inform the insurer in time to permit redemption of the senior lien, and that the amount of the senior debt may increase and magnify the amount of the loss paid at a later time. If a foreclosure action is brought by the holder of a senior lien for which there is policy coverage, the insured is not required to bid at that sale to protect its lien,[170] and the insured's failure to bid has been held not to be a violation of a duty to mitigate loss or of the policy requirement that the insured provide all reasonable aid to the insurer in clearing title.[171]

A shorthand statement of these principles is that the insurer will immediately respond to a claim made by an insured lender under Covered Risks 9 through 13 of the 2006 ALTA Loan policy, whether or not the insured is in title, because those risks concern the insured mortgage. However, the insurer will respond with watchful waiting as to any claim by a lender insured under Covered Risks 1 through 8 or 14 unless and until the lender takes title to the property. As with all general rules, there can be exceptions to this simple dichotomy.

This section began with the statement that there are three predicate conditions before a lender's loss will become "immediate." The second condition is proof that the borrower has defaulted on the loan. The borrower's default has been established if the lender has obtained a foreclosure judgment.[172] If the borrower has defaulted but the lender has elected not to foreclose the mortgage, the lender may establish default by showing the insurer that the borrower has been sued under the note and has not paid the money judgment.[173]

The third condition to payment of loss is proof that the lender's security position has been reduced due to the existence of the covered matter. In order to make this determination, the insurer and insured must consider all of the loan collateral, not just the land whose title is insured.[174] If the value of the collateral is sufficient to fully secure the lender, even subject to the covered matter, no loss is payable:

> A title insurer only undertakes to indemnify the insured lien holder if a defect causes a loss; without a loss there is no obligation to pay benefits. In other contexts it has been noted that a secured lender's interest in the security is limited to repayment of its loan; if the loan is fully satisfied a lender ordinarily suffers no damage. Regarding secured lenders, if the loan is fully secured as of the date of foreclosure notwithstanding the contractual default, the lender suffers no damage from such default. Here, plaintiffs were solely interested in the property as a security for their loan, and if they fully recouped all amounts due them the fact that title to the property was not as represented did not cause any cognizable loss.[175]

The subject of the proper means of determining the real estate's value is discussed beginning at §3.2.4.3.

The three conditions to payment of a loan policy loss (default, defect in title and diminished security) need not always occur in a particular order. In Atlanta Title & Trust Co. v. Allied Mortgage Co.,[176] the lender paid a superior lien before its loan went into default. Later, the lender sold the loan at a loss. Later still, the loan went into default. The court held that the lender had made a sufficient showing that its security had been impaired.

If the insured lender elects to pay off a lien without the insurer's written consent, the voluntary settlement provision of the policy bars recovery from the insurer for the amount paid.[177]

[177] For example, in Diversified Mortgage Investors v. U.S. Life Title Insurance Co. of New York, 544 F.2d 571 (2nd Cir. 1976), a construction lender wished to settle with lien claimants before it made additional advances. The lender was

Similarly, the insurer is not obligated to bond off or pay a lien which is claimed to be prior to the insured mortgage, rather than exercising its right to establish the priority of the mortgage in litigation.[178]

A loan title insurance policy insures title, not the loan itself or any aspect of it. The policy does not insure that the debt underlying the security interest is itself valid, as fully discussed at §9.10. The policy insures the validity, enforceability and priority of the lender's lien on the real estate which serves as collateral, or partial collateral, for the loan. However, as one court put it, "a title insurance contract insures only the title to the land securing the debt and not the debt itself."[179] The policy does not insure against the possibility that the mortgage cannot be enforced because the loan funds were never advanced by the loan assignor.[180]

Also, the policy does not protect the lender against any representations it might make to others about the loan or its collateral, including the state of title. For example, in National Title Ins. Co. v. Safeco Title Ins. Co.,[181] a purchase money mortgage policy did not except a junior mortgage. The junior lien secured money the buyer borrowed in lieu of what was to have been cash equity. The borrower defaulted, and the lender made a claim on a mortgage insurance policy. The mortgage insurance company declared its policy void because the lender did not disclose the fact that the borrower had also borrowed the equity money. The lender was forced to repurchase the loan from the mortgage investor. The court found that the title insurer was not responsible for the insured's expenses:

> In this case, National did not allege, nor could it have, that its security was impaired by the second mortgage, which was satisfied two years after the closing, and four years before the owners defaulted on the first mortgage. ... In short, National's loss denied an injunction that would have prohibited the insurer from raising the voluntary settlement defense if it paid off the liens. See §2.14 for a complete discussion of the voluntary settlement provision.

[178] In National Loan Investors, L.P. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 1999 WL 195819 (Conn.Super.) (unpublished), the lender claimed that the insurer had a duty to pay or bond off a construction lien rather than litigate over priority for seven years, during which time back taxes and other liens stacked up. The court refused to find such a duty, saying: "[t]he court agrees with the defendant that it did not have any contractual obligation under section 3(c) of its policy to settle the case or bond off the lien. It had a clear and unambiguous obligation to defend the claim of a superior lien by McDonald-Sharpe. This lien, as noted previously, was ultimately discharged and priority of title upheld in the defendant's insured." The court also relied on the final determination clause. See §3.4.6 for a complete discussion of the insurer's right to clear title for a lender.

Also, 12 Couch on Insurance § 185.88 (3d. ed.1995) says that "if the value of the mortgaged property is less than the amount due on the mortgage, it has generally been held or recognized that the mortgagee can recover only the value of the property, not the amount due on the mortgage."

3.2.4.1 Loan Policy Loss Caused By Prior Lien

Under a loan policy, the insurer often protects an insured against a lien by establishing that the lien is subordinate to the insured mortgage. See §3.4.7 on the subject of establishing priority over existing liens, and §3.4.7.1 concerning federal tax lien issues. See §3.4.7.3 for a complete discussion of the doctrine of equitable subrogation, which is used to subordinate mortgages and other liens to later-recorded mortgages.

Once a lender has come into title to the insured parcel, a claim is resolved under a loan policy in the same manner as it would be under an owner's policy, except as noted throughout this chapter. Thus, the reader may follow the practices described in those sections of this chapter that address claims concerning title defects, access and encumbrances if the claim has been made under a loan policy and the lender is now in title.

One situation in which the loss paid to a lender is different from what is paid under an owner's policy is that of a senior lien not excepted in the loan policy. Under an owner's policy, the insurer is required to remove a lien that is not excepted in the policy by paying whatever amount is necessary, up to the policy amount or the value of the property, as explained in §3.2.3.1.4. Under a loan policy, however, loss is the lesser of the cost to remove the prior lien or the amount by which the insured lender's security is impaired by the lien, which may be substantially less, as explained below in this section.

Because a lender's loss is limited to the amount by which its security is impaired by a lien, an insured lender may not simply pay off a lien and expect the title insurer to reimburse it in full, or demand that the insurer pay the lien in full. Thus, if the insured lender elects to pay off a lien without the insurer's written consent, the voluntary settlement provision of the policy bars recovery from the insurer for the amount paid.[183] Also, the insurer is not obligated to bond off or pay a lien which is claimed to be prior to the insured mortgage, rather than exercising its right to establish the priority of the mortgage in litigation.[184] When the insured brings a lawsuit against the insurer for alleged breach [183] For example, in Diversified Mortgage Investors v. U.S. Life Title Insurance Co. of New York, 544 F.2d 571 (2nd Cir. 1976), a construction lender wished to settle with lien claimants before it made additional advances. The lender was denied an injunction that would have prohibited the insurer from raising the voluntary settlement defense if it paid off the liens. See §2.14 for a complete discussion of the voluntary settlement provision. In Atlanta Title & Trust Co. v. Allied Mortgage Co., 60 Ga.App. 114, 3 S.E.2d 127 (1939); aff'd 64 Ga.App. 38, 12 S.E.2d 147 (1940), the lender paid a superior lien before its loan went into default. Later, the lender sold the loan at a loss. Later still, the loan went into default. The court held that the insurer was required to reimburse the lender, but only because it proved that its security had been impaired by the lien.

[184] In National Loan Investors, L.P. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 1999 WL 195819 (Conn.Super.) (unpublished), the lender claimed that the insurer had a duty to pay or bond off a construction lien rather than litigate over priority for seven years, during which time back taxes and other liens stacked up. The court refused to find such a duty, saying: "[t]he court agrees with the defendant that it did not have any contractual obligation under section 3(c) of its policy to settle the case or bond off the lien. of the policy before the relative priority of the insured mortgage and the adverse lien has been decided, the coverage action is premature and should be dismissed without prejudice or stayed.[185]

An insured lender's loss due to a covered lien that is superior to the insured lien, or another covered title defect or encumbrance, is equal to the amount by which the covered matter reduces its security to less than the loan amount.[186] The value of all of the collateral held by the lender as Sharpe. This lien, as noted previously, was ultimately discharged and priority of title upheld in the defendant's insured." The court also relied on the final determination clause. See §3.4.6 for a complete discussion of the insurer's right to clear title for a lender.

[185] In Johnson v. North Dakota Guar. and Title Co., ___ F.Supp.3d ___, 2018 WL 6706672 (D.N.D. 2018) (permanent citation not yet available), a lawsuit by the lender seeking payment from the title insurer of a loss caused by another lien was stayed until the relative priority of the two liens had been established in a separate action filed before the coverage suit was brought. The court reasoned that the amount of loss, if any, could not yet be fixed, because "the amount that Johnson stands recover in the instant action should he prevail on the issue of NDG&T's liability is largely dependent upon the priority of his mortgage on the Subject Property and thus the outcome of the State litigation." In Falmouth National Bank v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 920 F.2d 1058 (1st Cir. 1990), the court held the insured's suit against the insurer was premature because the lien dispute was not yet resolved. In Centrum Financial Services, Inc. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2010 WL 936201 (D.N.J.) (unpublished), the court dismissed the lender insured's lawsuit seeking payment of loss as being premature, because the insurer was still litigating the priority of the insured mortgage versus the competing lien. For additional authorities, see § 3.4.5 concerning the final determination clause. However, in First Citizens Bank & Trust Co. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 320 P.3d 406 (Colo.App. 1 Div. 2014), the court quoted 2 Gregory J. Notarianni, Colorado Practice Series: Methods of Practice § 63:3, at 271 (Cathy S. Krendl ed., 6th ed., 2012), which says: "An insured mortgagee has not suffered an identifiable loss unless and until it forecloses its insured deed of trust and a title defect reduces the value of the property, thereby preventing the mortgagee from recouping its loan amount upon resale. If a title defect exists, but the value of the property is nevertheless sufficient to pay the mortgagee its loan amount, then there is no damage compensable under the loan policy." However, the court found that the insured lender was not premature in bringing suit against the insurer for payment based on its defective lien, although it was still litigating with the defaulted borrower and might obtain some payment from it. The court held that the final determination clause did not stay the coverage suit, since the insurer was not paying for the lawsuit against the borrower, and that action will not clear title.

[186] National Title Ins. Co. v. Safeco Title Ins. Co., 661 So.2d 1234, 1236 (Fla.App.3 Dist. 1995); 60 A.L.R.2d 972. In First American Bank v. First American Transp. Title Ins. Co., 759 F.3d 427 (5th Cir. (La.) 2014), the court held that the "policy provides for indemnity 'only to the extent that [the insured's] security is impaired and to the extent of the resulting loss that it sustains.' It does not 'guarantee either that the mortgaged premises are worth the amount of the mortgage or that the mortgage debt will be paid.'" In Levi v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 2011 WL 4542904 (S.D.N.Y.) (unpublished), the court found that the insured would have been fully secured if the insured mortgage had been valid, and thus had established a loss in the full amount of the loan. In First Tennessee Bank, N.A. v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 282 F.R.D. 423 (N.D.Ill. 2012), the court held that loss under an ALTA Residential Limited Liability Junior Loan policy is limited to the amount, if any, by which the lender's security interest in the property is reduced due to an undisclosed senior lien. In First American Title Ins. Co. v. Patriot Bank, 2015 WL 2228549 (Tex.App.-Houston 2015) (unpublished), the court held that, because a title insurer is not a guarantor of the loan, the loss payable due to total failure of title was not the loan amount but the value of the land, up to policy limits. See also Southwest Title Ins. Co. v. Northland Bldg. Corp., 552 S.W.2d 425 (Tex. 1977), which held that "the payment of the note is not insured. The insurer underwrites only against loss due to a defect in the security." In RCN Capital, LLC v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2018 WL 1459437 (Conn.Super.) (unpublished), the insured lender came into title by making a cash bid at a tax foreclosure sale of the property. The lender took title free of an unexcepted prior lien. However, the insurer did not receive summary judgment on the lender's policy claim because the lien holder received some of the insured's cash bid amount, which the court said might represent lost "equity" in the property. In Johnson v. North Dakota Guar. and Title Co., ___ F.Supp.3d security is combined to determine if the lender is fully secured, even after considering the reduction in value due to the covered lien or encumbrance.[187] The lender's loss may not exceed the least of the policy amount, the insured's loan balance, the value of the insured parcel or the cost to remove the covered lien or encumbrance.[188] An important factor in determining the property's value is the date on which the real estate is valued. See §3.2.4.2 regarding the date on which loss is measured under a loan policy.

When the claim involves a senior lien in an amount greater than the property's value, the insured lender loses all of its security in the property. Its loss is usually the least of the insured's indebtedness, the value of the real estate, or the cost to obtain a release of the prior lien.[189] See §3.2.3.1.4 and §3.2.4.4 regarding release of liens.

Conversely, in some cases, the lien or other matter for which there is coverage is minor in relation to the value of the property, and the property's value is equal to or greater than the loan amount plus the amount of the lien for which there is coverage. When the property value is enough to fully secure the loan even subject to the covered lien or encumbrance, the insured does not suffer a loss, and the insurer is not required to remove the lien or encumbrance.[190] Also, the insured lender is

___, 2018 WL 6706672 (D.N.D. 2018) (permanent citation not yet available), the court rejected the insured lender's claim that his loss due to a competing lien should be calculated based on two North Dakota statutes, N.D.C.C. §§ 32-03-13 and 32-03-32, that define the damages that flow from the breach of an agreement to convey real estate as being the market value of equivalent property. The court said that there was no authority for the proposition that a law addressing damages for a breach of an agreement to convey real property "is applicable in the context of a claim for damage flowing from an alleged breach of a service agreement."

[187] For example, see the formulae used by the courts in *Blackhawk Production Credit Ass'n v. Chicago Title Ins. Co.*135 Wis.2d 324, 400 N.W.2d 287 (App. 1986), rev'd and rem. 144 Wis.2d 68, 423 N.W.2d 521 (1988), in which the lender held as collateral both real and personal property, securing a farm loan.

[189] In First Community Bank v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 4720153 (M.D.La. 2014) (unpublished), the insured lender had been insured as having a first lien but there was an unexcepted first lien and the senior debt was for than the property's value. The senior's lender foreclosure extinguished the insured lien. The court held that loss was the least of the insured's debt, the property's value or policy limits. In First American Title Ins. Co. v. Patriot Bank, 2015 WL 2228549 (Tex.App.-Houston 2015) (unpublished), the court held that, because a title insurer is not a guarantor of the loan, the loss payable due to total failure of title was not the loan amount but the value of the land, up to policy limits. Also, 12 Couch on Insurance § 185.88 (3d. ed.1995) says that "if the value of the mortgaged property is less than the amount due on the mortgage, it has generally been held or recognized that the mortgagee can recover only the value of the property, not the amount due on the mortgage."

[190] First Commerce Realty Investors v. Peninsular Title Ins. Co., 355 So.2d 510 (Fla.App.1978) (no loss payable when property was worth more than insured's debt plus prior unexcepted lien); CMEI Inc. v. American Title Ins. Co., 447 So.2d 427 (Fla.App.1984) (no loss suffered due to two easements not excepted, when value of property subject to the easements was more than loan amount). In Wedgewood Square Center Ltd. Ptnshp. v. Lincoln Land Title Co., Inc., 347 S.W.3d 582 (Mo.App. S.D. 2011), the policy failed to except a deed of trust senior to the insured deed of trust. The insured argued that it need not prove a loss due to the senior lien. The court disagreed, saying: "[t]he mere existence of the Allison deed of trust did not establish actual loss under this lender's title insurance; defects, liens, encumbrances or other matters resulting in no loss or damage to the injured claimant are unambiguously excluded from coverage under the White Pine Policy." However, a bankruptcy court held that an insurer was liable for policy limits after it put the lender in title to the insured parcels, because those parcels were the product of a land division without a permit. The court excused not affected by a defect in title if the loan is repaid in full or in an amount that is equal to the property's value. Thus, when the insured lender receives money from the borrower or third parties that is equal to or more than the value of the property, it does not suffer a loss payable by the title insurer for a title defect.[191]

A lender that has paid a lien but is unable to show that its security was impaired by it has not proven a loss.[192] In Green v. Evesham Corp.,[193] a $60,000 prior mortgage was not excepted in a policy insuring a $15 million mortgage. Rather than foreclose, the lender purchased the property and bought out all other lien interests. It resold the property at a profit, but then demanded from the insurer the amount paid to the prior missed mortgagee. The court found no loss because, once it owned the entire property, the lender had collateral of $4 million more than its debt.

The loss measurement for a junior mortgage depends largely on the amount of equity in the property above the amount of the senior lien. Whenever the policy makes exception for a senior lien, the insured's loss is the least of the equity in the property to which the insured's lien should attach, the policy limits, the amount of the lien for which there is coverage, or the amount of the insured's loan. The amount of equity in the property, subject to the senior excepted lien, may be less than the amount of the lien for which there is coverage. In that case, the insurer is not required to pay off the covered lien in full, but only to pay the amount of the equity that should have existed.

In some cases, the policy makes exception for a lien securing a loan in an amount greater than the value of the property. In such cases, the insured has no security in the real estate due to prior excepted lien. The existence of a second, covered lien or encumbrance does not cause the lender to suffer a loss.[194] However, when the insured would have had partial security in the property but the [191] In Associated Bank, N.A. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 881 F.Supp.2d 1058 (D.Minn. 2012), the bank made a loan of $450,000. The borrower later claimed that his identity had been stolen and that the mortgage was void. The bank settled with the borrower for $175,000. An appraisal valued the property at $126,000. The court found that the bank suffered no loss, since it received through settlement "an amount considerably in excess of the value of the insured Mortgage." In Wedgewood Square Center Ltd. Ptnshp. v. Lincoln Land Title Co., Inc., 347 S.W.3d 582 (Mo.App. S.D. 2011), the court found that the insured had not proven a loss after electing to release its lien on payment from the borrowers of all of the money they had. The amount the lender received was about the same as the value of the property at that time, which was less than its value when the loan was made.

[192] See Ring v. Home Title Guar. Co., 168 So.2d 580 (Fla.App. 1964). In Karl v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 20 Cal.App. 4th 972, 24 Cal.Rptr.2d 912 (1993), the lender resold the property for slightly more than the combined amount of the debt and the money it had paid to remove the unexcepted tax lien. The court rejected the lender's argument that the lien reduced its profit on resale, and was thus payable as a loss, which would be contrary to the indemnity nature of the title insurance policy: "an insured lender who receives full value in discharge of his note does not suffer a compensable 'loss' under his title policy merely because an insured-against lien reduced the equity cushion seized on the foreclosure." 20 Cal.App. 4th at 982-3, 24 Cal.Rptr.2d at 919. In Citibank v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 214 A.D.2d 212, 632 N.Y.S.2d 779 (A.D. 1 Dept. 1995), the court held that a lender suffered no loss because it took title to the property free of the junior liens that were the covered matter.

[194] In Blackhawk Production Credit Ass'n v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 144 Wis.2d 68, 423 N.W.2d 521 (1988), the court stated: "If the interest held by [the insured] was valueless without the superior lien, it cannot claim any lost value because lien for which there was policy coverage wiped out that equity, the lender is entitled to payment of a loss equal to the amount of the equity to which its lien would have attached if it had been in the position as stated in the policy.[195]

When the policy makes exception for a senior mortgage and that lien is foreclosed, extinguishing the insured's junior lien and all equity to which it attaches, the insured suffers no covered loss; the extinguishment of the insured's lien renders any policy claim moot.[196] When the foreclosure of the senior lien occurs while the insurer is clearing title or asserting the (junior) priority of the insured lien, however, the insured may not be obligated to bid at the foreclosure sale to protect its lien.[197]

When the policy insures a lender's mortgage covering more than one parcel, loss equals the amount, if any, of the impairment of the lender's security on the combined collateral, although courts have disagreed about how to apply the pro tanto reduction clause of the 1992 ALTA Loan policy.[198]

the lien existed. Conversely, if the security interest held by [the insured] had established value, the greatest amount it can recover as a mortgagee for the title defect under its policy of title insurance is the value of the interest held in the land up to the stated policy limits of the insurance." In First United Bank of Bellevue v. First American Title Ins. Co., 496 N.W.2d 474 (Neb. 1993), the insured held a second mortgage, and the property was worth less than the excepted first mortgage. The court found that the insured second mortgagee never had any security in the property, and suffered no loss because of a title defect. Likewise, when the insured lender held a fourth lien rather than a third as insured, but the prior lender's foreclosure sale would not have netted the insured any proceeds if it had had a third lien, the insured did not suffer a loss under the policy, in Grunberger v. Iseson, 75 App.Div.2d 329, 429 N.Y.S.2d 209 (1980). Similarly, in Twin Cities Metro-Certified Development Co. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 868 N.W.2d 713 (Minn.App. 2015), the court held that, in order for an insured junior mortgagee to be entitled to be reimbursed by the insurer for mechanics' liens it had paid off, the lender was required to prove that the property had a value greater than the excepted first mortgage. If it did not, the mechanics' liens could not have caused a loss to the insured because the insured mortgage did not attach to any equity in the property. Twin Cities relied in part on the holding in Blackhawk that is quoted in this footnote.

[197] In Trigiani v. American Title Ins. Co., 392 Pa.Super. 427, 573 A.2d 230 (1990), the title insurer attempted to defeat mechanic's liens in litigation and was unsuccessful. While that action was pending, the holder of the first mortgage (excepted in the policy) foreclosed, extinguishing the insured's lien. The court ruled that the insured was entitled to policy limits, because there would have been sufficient equity in the property to fully secure the insured if the mechanic's liens had not been filed.

[198] See Blackhawk Production Credit Ass'n v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 144 Wis.2d 68, 423 N.W.2d 521 (1988). A lender does not suffer a loss if it recovers the full amount of the loan from the sale of the collateral. See CMEI, Inc. v. American Title Ins. Co., 447 So.2d 427 (Fla.App. 1984) and other cases discussed at §9.10. This general principle was codified in Conditions 9(b) of the 1992 ALTA Loan policy, which states that "[p]ayment in part by any person of the principal of the indebtedness, or any other obligation secured by the insured mortgage, or any voluntary partial satisfaction or release of the insured mortgage, to the extent of the payment, satisfaction or release, shall reduce the amount of insurance pro tanto." Two courts refused to apply Condition 9(b) when there were still loan balances owed and the insureds failed to collect on insured collateral. In Doss & Associates v. First American Title Ins. Co., 325 Ga.App. 448, 754 S.E.2d 85 (Ga.App. 2013), the insured lender had a valid lien on six parcels and resold them for more than its loan amount. Its lien on a seventh parcel was extinguished by foreclosure of a senior lien not excepted in the policy. The lender claimed that it was still owed money because it applied the proceeds from the sale of the six parcels to

The measure of loss is not necessarily the cost of removing the lien or encumbrance from the one affected parcel, and the loss is not fixed until the lender disposes of all of its collateral.[199] The reduction in a lender's security position on one parcel of real estate due to the covered lien or encumbrance may be fully offset by the value of other collateral.

In many situations, the amount of a lender's loss, if any, is determined by a formula. The first step in the formula is to subtract the amounts of the liens excepted in the policy from the fair market value of the parcel or parcels that serve as security for the insured's loan. This establishes the amount of the net equity to which the insured lien would attach but for the lien or encumbrance for which there is policy coverage. If there is no net equity because the superior, excepted lien amounts are more than the property is worth, the insured has not suffered a loss due to the lien or encumbrance for which there is coverage. Rather, there was no equity in the real estate to which the insured's lien could attach, even if the matter for which there is policy coverage had not existed.

If there are no senior excepted liens, or if there is positive net equity in the property after subtracting excepted lien amounts, loss is the least of the equity amount, the cost to remove the covered matter, or the indebtedness held by the insured. The insurer will typically either pay to remove the covered matter, or pay the insured the lesser of the equity amount or the debt. No loss is payable to the insured lender for that portion of its debt that is above the amount of the net equity, because that amount was not secured by the insured real estate. However, if the equity amount is more than the amount of the indebtedness, the insured lender would have been fully secured by the real estate if title had been as insured, and its loss is equal to the amount by which the covered matter reduces its security, if at all.

The next step is to subtract the amount of the lien or encumbrance for which there is policy coverage from the net equity in the property. If this net, net equity amount is less than the amount of the insured lender's indebtedness, the loss equals the amount of the insured's debt that is not secured due to the existence of the covered matter. Loss equals the amount of the insured's debt that is not interest and penalties first, leaving a small principal balance. The insurer argued that the policy had been reduced to zero by Conditions 9(b). The court refused to grant the insurer summary judgment. Similarly, in Preservation Capital Consultants, LLC v. First American Title Ins. Co., 406 S.C. 309, 751 S.E.2d 256 (S.C. 2013), the loan policy amount was $3,075,000. The loan was secured by three parcels, including a defective lien on a small parcel that the lender knew would be in second position. The lender foreclosed on the main parcel, making a credit bid of $3,250,000. By the time of that sale, the debt with interest was $3,641,190. After subtracting the bid amount, the loan balance was $391,190, just over the amount of the lost equity in the second-lien parcel. The court held that the credit bid did not extinguish the policy, saying simply that it was unfair to reduce the policy amount dollar-for-dollar based on the credit bid amount. In Equity Income Partners LP v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 241 Ariz. 334, 387 P.3d 1263 (Ariz. 2017), the Arizona Supreme Court held that a lender's credit bid did not constitute a "payment" under Condition 9(b).

[199] See Blackhawk Production Credit Ass'n v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 144 Wis.2d 68, 423 N.W.2d 521 (1988) (on farm loan secured by personal and real property, loss measured as the amount of security lost by the lender due to the covered matter after it sold all of the collateral, including the personal property not insured by the policy). In Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. The Huntington National Bank, 1998 WL 548959 (Ohio App. 5 Dist.) (unpublished), modified by 719 N.E.2d 955, 87 Ohio St.3d 270 (1999), the insured lender obtained mortgages on two houses owned by the borrower. A prior mortgage on one parcel was not excepted in the policy. The measure of loss was the extent to which the lender's combined security in the two mortgaged properties was reduced by the prior mortgage. The court rejected the lender's argument that the cost to remove the lien was the measure of loss.

secured by the insured parcel due to the existence of the covered matter. Sometimes, that reduction in security is the full amount of the covered lien or encumbrance; in other cases, the covered matter does not leave the insured with less security than its loan amount. The following examples illustrate the loss equation.

Example 1—No loss because of insufficient security even without title defect. Assume a property value of $100,000, a first lien of $110,000 that is excepted in the policy, and a second lien that is not excepted in the policy (in any amount). There is no impairment of security, and thus no loss payable to the insured, because the insured would have no security in the property even if the covered matter did not exist, due to the amount of the excepted prior lien.

Example 2—No loss because insured is fully secured. Assume a property value of $100,000, a first lien of $10,000 not excepted in the policy, and that the insured mortgage loan has a balance of $60,000. There is no impairment of security, and thus no loss payable to the insured, because there is sufficient equity in the property to fully secure the insured even subject to the first lien that was not excepted. An insurer could elect to remove the first lien, but any such payment may be deemed premature, as explained above. If the first lender brings a foreclosure or notices a sale, the insurer should pay off the senior debt and take an assignment of the note. If it does not and the insured mortgage is extinguished, loss is limited to the loan balance of $60,000.

Example 3—Loss limited to partial impairment of security. Assume a property value of $100,000, a first lien of $50,000 that is not excepted in the policy, and that the insured mortgage loan has a balance of $60,000. Unless and until the first lien is foreclosed, the only effect of the first lien is to impair the insured's security by $10,000. The insurer could elect to remove the first lien or pay a loss to the insured of $10,000. However, any such payment may be deemed premature, as explained above. If the first lender brings a foreclosure or notices a sale, the insurer should pay off the senior debt and take an assignment of the note. If it does not and the insured mortgage is extinguished, loss is limited to the loan balance of $60,000.

Example 4—Loss limited to amount of prior lien. Assume a property value of $100,000, a first lien of $10,000 that is not excepted in the policy, and that the insured mortgage loan has a balance of $150,000. The lender's security in the property would be limited to its value of $100,000 even if the first lien did not exist. The existence of the first lien for which there is policy coverage causes the insured's security to be reduced by the amount of the lien. The insurer will typically pay $10,000 or whatever amount is required to pay to obtain a release of the senior lien. If the first lender brings a foreclosure or notices a sale, the insurer should pay off the debt and take an assignment of the note. If it does not and the insured mortgage is extinguished, loss is limited to the value of the property. No loss is payable for the portion of the insured's debt that was more than the value of the property.

Example 5—Loss equals amount of insured's debt. Assume a property value of $100,000, a first lien of $100,000 that is not excepted in the policy, a policy amount of $50,000, and that the current indebtedness on the insured mortgage is $40,000. There is a complete impairment of the insured lender's security, due to the existence of the prior lien for which there is policy coverage. However, loss is limited to the insured's indebtedness of $40,000, which is less than either the policy limits or the amount of the prior lien.

Example 6—No loss on loan secured by several parcels. Assume that the insured mortgage encumbers three parcels, each of them worth $100,000; that the amount of the indebtedness secured by the mortgage is $150,000; and that one of the three parcels is encumbered by a first lien of $100,000 that is not excepted in the policy. The insured has no security in the parcel subject to the first lien for which it has coverage. However, it has no loss, because the remaining two parcels have a combined value of more than the amount of the indebtedness, so that the loan will be repaid in full on the sale of the other collateral.

3.2.4.2 Loan Policy Date Of Loss

The loan policy does not expressly state the date on which loss is to be measured. The rationale adopted by most courts as to the proper date of loss under an owner's policy does not apply in the same way to a loan policy. One early case measured loss under a loan policy as of the date on which the insured lender discovered the title defect, treating a loan policy as operating under the same principles that apply to an owner's policy.[200] However, as a number of courts have stated, an owner suffers an "immediate" loss when the insured discovers a defect in title, whereas a lender does not suffer a loss due to a title defect until it loses its loan collateral or becomes the owner of the property. See the full discussion of this distinction between the two types of policies at §3.2.4. Because of this difference in the nature of the two forms of policy, modern decisions acknowledge that the date of loss is different under the owner's policy and the loan policy, and that the date of discovery is not appropriate for a loan policy because the lender does not suffer a loss on that date.[201]

[201] Associated Bank, N.A. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 881 F.Supp.2d 1058 (D.Minn. 2012) stated that "the majority of courts considering the issue have held that such loss cannot be measured until the note has not been repaid and the security for the mortgage is shown to be inadequate," and cited Falmouth Nat'l Bank v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 920 F.2d 1058 (1st Cir.1990). The courts reached the same conclusion in Marble Bank v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 914 F.Supp. 1252 (E.D.N.C.1996); and Blackhawk Prod. Credit Ass'n v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 144 Wis.2d 68, 423 N.W.2d 521, 525 (1988); and Demopoulos v. Title Ins. Co., 61 N.M. 254, 298 P.2d 938, 939 (1956). The difference between the two types of policies has been acknowledged by almost all courts. See Wedgewood Square Center Ltd. Ptnshp. v. Lincoln Land Title Co., Inc., 347 S.W.3d 582 (Mo.App. S.D. 2011) (acknowledging that loss is measured differently under the two types of policies); Equity Income Partners LP v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2012 WL 3871505 (D.Ariz.) (unpublished) (date of discovery rule appropriate for owner's policies; date of policy used as date of loss on loan policies). In First Internet Bank of Indiana v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 2009 WL 2092782 (S.D.Ind.) (unpublished), the insured argued, based on Overholtzer, that loss should be measured on date of discovery for both owner's and loan policies. The court relied on Karl to find that loss under a loan policy is measured on the date on which the insured loses its security: "[t]he better reasoned cases have instead determined loss in a lender's title insurance policy at the date of foreclosure. Using an earlier date would necessarily require speculation and estimation about the value of the property before it is even certain whether the lender will suffer a loss, while the date of foreclosure provides a value and loss amount based on a real transaction. This rule to use the date of foreclosure does not systematically favor the insurer or the lender. Market conditions determine which party benefits from the date-of-foreclosure rule. This court predicts that Indiana would follow the consensus view that the loss in a title insurance policy for a mortgage holder is determined at the date of foreclosure." Id. at *6. The reasoning of First Internet Bank was adopted in First American Bank v. First American Transp. Title Ins. Co., 759 F.3d 427 (5th Cir. (La.) 2014). That court explained that measuring loss on the date of the foreclosure of a senior lien that extinguishes the insured lien "is appropriate because the foreclosure is when the insured actually incurs a covered loss." In Associated Bank, N.A. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 881 F.Supp.2d 1058 (D.Minn. 2012), likewise, the court held that, because a lender does not know it will ever suffer a loss due to a covered matter, loss cannot be measured or paid until the adverse, covered lien is enforced by foreclosure. In Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. RM Kids, LLC, 337 Ga.App. 638, 788 S.E.2d 542 (Ga.App. 2016), the court acknowledged that Georgia uses the policy date as the loss date for owner's policies, under U.S. Life Title Ins. Co. of Dallas v. Hutsell, 164 Ga.App.

Thus, although the jurisdictions are not unanimous as to the date of loss under a loan policy, there is a very strong consensus amongst the modern decisions that the date of loss is one of two dates, depending on the circumstances. Loss is measured either on the date on which the lender takes title to the property, or the date on which the insured mortgage is extinguished by a covered event, such as the foreclosure of a superior lien for which there is policy coverage.[202] Conversely, if the insured elects to release the insured lien or allows it to be extinguished due to an event that is not covered, the policy terminates and no loss is payable, rendering moot the issue of the loss date.

Most covered title issues concern defects in or encumbrances on title. A lender does not suffer a loss due to such an issue unless and until it takes title to the property, because only when it takes title to the real estate collateral does the value of the real estate affect the lender's ability to get back the amount of its loan. Thus, when the insured forecloses the insured mortgage and takes title, most courts hold that loss payable to the insured is measured based on the covered matter's effect on the value of the property as of that date.[203] The seminal modern decision of Karl v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co.[204] so held:

> At [foreclosure sale], the lender's note is extinguished and replaced by assets recovered on foreclosure: either cash as paid by a third party bidder or the realty as bought in by the foreclosing lender. It is now possible to measure the value of the recovery by the lender, and we believe the loss which is insured by the title policy should be recognized as of that time.
> …The "fair market value as of foreclosure" approach also eliminates other concerns raised by the plaintiffs which otherwise are inherent in a delayed determination of > loss. For example, following foreclosure lenders may invest cash or their own time and effort in renovation of the property. An increase in market value as a result of such contribution should not redound to the benefit of the insurer. Similarly, a lender's expertise in marketing which results in a sale at higher than market value should not profit the insurer [citation omitted]. Finally, it seems unfair to measure damage by a market sale which may occur at a time distant from the date of foreclosure, during which period inflation or deflation may have altered the value of the property.[205]

Co*., 914 F.Supp. 1252 (E.D.N.C. 1996) (citing Karl and adopting date of foreclosure because "[o]nly the completion of foreclosure signifies that a lender will not collect on its note"). The Karl and Cale decisions are discussed in Carollo, Do Title Insurance Policies Protect Lenders?, Real Estate Review, Summer, 1995, p. 57. In Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. RM Kids, LLC, 337 Ga.App. 638, 788 S.E.2d 542 (Ga.App. 2016), the court adopted the statement from First American Transportation that "a majority of courts from other jurisdictions have held that, in the absence of specific policy language, a title insurer's liability to a mortgagee should be measured using the foreclosure date," reasoning that the foreclosure date is "appropriate because the foreclosure is when the insured actually incurs a covered loss."

Similarly, if the insured lender takes a deed in lieu of foreclosure, most states value the property as of the date of the delivery of that deed.[206] Conversely, when the insured elects not to foreclose on the insured deed of trust after the borrower defaults, the insurer may properly respond that the amount of the loss will not be fixed unless and until the insured forecloses and comes into title.[207] Similarly, no loss is payable due to a covered title risk if the validity and priority of the insured mortgage have not been challenged and the borrower has not yet defaulted. See §3.2.4 for a complete discussion of the borrower's default as a predicate to loss under a loan policy.

In other cases, the title issue concerns the priority of the insured mortgage versus a competing lien or property interest, or something that renders the insured mortgage invalid. In such cases, the threat posed to the insured is that the insured mortgage may be extinguished by the foreclosure of the competing, covered lien or other action. When the insured mortgage is extinguished, which is typically by a court order, due to an issue for which the policy provides coverage, most courts have held that the date of loss is the day on which the insured mortgage is extinguished.[208]

[205] Karl v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 20 Cal.App. 4th 972, 984, 24 Cal.Rptr.2d 912, 920 (Cal.App. 4 Dist. 1993). The Karl court recognized that Cale v. Transamerica Title Ins. Co., 225 Cal.App.3d 422, 275 Cal.Rptr. 107 (1990), had adopted a seemingly inconsistent position, and the court adopted the reasoning of the dissent in Cale rather than the majority position. The Karl case was remanded and refined on appeal. In Karl v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 60 Cal.App.4th 858, 70 Cal.Rptr.2d 374 (Cal.App. 4 Dist. 1997), the court rejected the insured's argument that fair market value should be reduced by the costs of resale to thus measure the insured's actual net recovery after resale. In U.S. Bank, N.A. v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2012 WL 1080876 (M.D.Fla.) (unpublished), the court used the appraised value of the property at about the time of the senior lender's sheriff's sale and, because the borrower had attempted to conduct a short sale, the court also subtracted 7.4% as the costs of sale.

[206] Goode v. Federal Title Ins. Co., 162 So.2d 269 (Fla.App. 1964).

[207] In Stewart Title Ins. Co. v. Credit Suisse, 2013 WL 4710264 (D. Idaho) (unpublished), the insurer defended the insured lender against construction liens. That litigation was resolved, but the insured kept putting off the sheriff's sale on its foreclosure. The court held that loss could not be determined until there was a final determination in the form of a foreclosure sale. In Wedgewood Square Center Ltd. Ptnshp. v. Lincoln Land Title Co., Inc., 347 S.W.3d 582 (Mo.App. S.D. 2011), the policy failed to except a lien senior to the insured deed of trust. Because the insured lender had not foreclosed, the insurer responded that no loss would be suffered or calculable until it did so. The insured then settled with the borrower by accepting a compromise amount that "was supposedly the last dollars he had," and released its deed of trust. The court determined that the insured had not proven that it suffered a loss due to the unexcepted prior deed of trust.

[208] Chrysler Financial Services Corp. of America v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 641 N.Y.S.2d 13, 14 (A.D. 1st Dept.

Notwithstanding the numerous decisions that have developed the above rules in many jurisdictions, several courts have held that loss under a loan policy is to be measured on the date of policy.[209] The usual rationale for this interpretation is that the policy date is the proper loss date in a claim in which the insured mortgage was invalid when granted. The insured mortgage cannot be foreclosed if it is void or invalid. However, in many cases, the insurer is able to cure the claimed infirmity in the insured mortgage, either by litigation or otherwise. The insurer's right to clear title may not be abridged, and no loss is payable to the insured lender if the insurer delivers either title or a valid and enforceable mortgage to the insured.[210] When the insured mortgage is invalid, the insurer often takes action to clear title or to establish the lien of the mortgage as insured. In such cases, the policy provides that no loss is payable until there has been a final determination adverse to the insured (and that no loss is payable if the insurer succeeds). See §3.4.5 regarding the final determination clause, and §3.4.6, discussing the clearing of title for an insured lender.

Unfortunately, however, the policy date has been adopted as the loan policy loss date in several cases even when there was no defect in the insured mortgage.[211] Those courts have admitted 1996) (adopting date of foreclosure sale and allowing interest on amount payable to accrue from that date). Footnote 11 of the Karl decision anticipated this type of claim, and said that "our opinion in this case should not be construed as imposing upon the insured lender, who discovers a prior undisclosed lien, the unconditional obligation of curing the lien and then foreclosing, in order to cause maturation of the title company's liability." 20 Cal.App. 4th 972, 984, 24 Cal.Rptr.2d 912, 919 (Cal.App. 4 Dist. 1993). See also, First Tennessee Bank, N.A. v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 282 F.R.D. 423 (N.D.Ill. 2012) (loss "caused by a surprise, more-senior lien can be measured only after the foreclosure sale of the secured property" because "[o]nly then can the parties know whether the seniority of the lien actually caused a loss."). In U.S. Bank, N.A. v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2012 WL 1080876 (M.D.Fla.) (unpublished), the insured deed of trust was extinguished by the foreclosure of a senior deed of trust. The court used the appraised value of the property at about the time of the sheriff's sale to value the property. However, because the borrower had attempted to conduct a short sale, the court also subtracted 7.4% as the costs of sale. In Morris v. Chelsea Title & Guaranty Co., 12 N.J.Misc. 428, 171 A. 819 (N.J. 1934), the court held that loss was to be measured as of the date on which a decree was entered that declared the mortgage invalid.

[209] The Title Ins. Co. of Richmond, Inc. v. Industrial Bank of Richmond, Inc., 156 Va. 322, 157 S.E. 710 (1931), the Virginia Supreme Court held that loss under a loan policy is measured on the date of policy. Citicorp Svgs. of Illinois v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 840 F.2d 526 (7th Cir.1988), used date of policy on the premise that the insured mortgage was void at inception, even though the mortgage was replaced by an equitable lien that the lender foreclosed in order to take title. Citicorp has since been rejected by a number of other courts. However, in each of those decisions, the insurer admittedly took action to establish title as insured, or to impose an equitable lien on behalf of the insured lender. See the discussion of those cases at §3.4.6.2. This rule applies even where an insured mortgage has been wholly invalidated, because "[i]f the plaintiff had received a valid mortgage and foreclosed it, all he would have been able to realize would have been the value of the property." Demopoulos v. Title Ins. Co., 61 N.M. 254, 298 P.2d 938, 939 (1956).

[210] See §3.4.6 concerning the clearing of title for a lender, §3.4.6.1 regarding the insurer's right to tender title to the insured lender in lieu of establishing the validity of the insured mortgage, and §3.4.6.2 concerning the insurer's right to establish an equitable lien as a means of clearing title. Also, see §3.4.7.3 concerning the doctrine of equitable subrogation, which is frequently used to establish an equitable lien in favor of the insured with priority over competing liens. In G&B Investments, Inc. v. Henderson (In re Evans), 460 B.R. 848, 899 (Bkcy.S.D.Miss. 2011), the insured mortgage was invalid and the title insurer was found not to have attempted to cure its invalidity. The court used the date of the loan as the loss date, relying on Citicorp Svgs. of Illinois v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 840 F.2d 526 (7th Cir.1988), which used date of policy because the insured mortgage was void at inception.

[211] In Equity Income Partners LP v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2012 WL 3871505 (D.Ariz.) (unpublished), the court held that they adopted the policy date simply because the real estate was worth more at that time than when the lender took title to it. This use of the policy date as the loss date when the insured mortgage was not defective when granted has since been rejected, because it has the effect of causing the insurer to pay the insured for a decline in market value, which is not a loss caused by defective title.[212] One court explained:

that loss was to be measured on the date the loan was made, because according to the court that is when the lender suffered its loss. It cited Citicorp as its authority for selecting that loss date. However, in Equity Income, the court's reliance on Citicorp was misplaced, because the insured deed of trust was not defective. The lender conducted a successful trustee's sale and took title to the property. The claim issue was access, not the validity of the insured lien. The Equity Income court also relied on G&B Investments, 460 B.R. 848 (Bkcy.S.D. Miss. 2011), which skipped the pretext of Citicorp and flatly held that "[a]llowing the insurer to wait to value the [insured interest] in a falling real estate market works to the insurer's benefit, a result that does not construe an ambiguity in the policy in favor of the insured." In First American Title Ins. Co. v. Johnson Bank, 353 P.3d 370, 237 Ariz. 490 (Ariz.App. 1 Div. 2015), the insured deed of trust was not defective. The claim concerned a use restriction. The facts were thus similar to those in Equity Income. The Arizona appeals court adopted the reasoning of Equity Income, and set the policy date as the loss date. The Arizona Supreme Court accepted review, however. The high court significantly modified the appeals court rulings and rejected the reasoning of Equity Income. 239 Ariz. 348, 372 P.3d 292 (Ariz. 2016). In Johnson Bank, the Supreme Court adopted the date of policy as the loss date, but only as to the facts of that claim. The court said that, "[w]hen the title defect is an undisclosed lien, the foreclosure date might well be the appropriate valuation date because the lender's damage results from not having priority in the foreclosure proceeds." One of the authorities that supported that limited rule, the court said, was the criticism of Equity Income found in Christopher B. Frantze, Equity Income Partners LP v. Chicago Title Insurance Co. and Recovery Under A Lender's Title Insurance Policy in A Falling Real Estate Market, 48 Real Prop. Tr. & Est. L.J. 391 (2013). Also, the Supreme Court rejected the ruling of the appeals court, which had assumed that the title defect caused the borrowers to default in order to grant summary judgment to the lender. The high court said that, "[o]n remand, Johnson Bank will have to prove that the title defect caused the borrowers' default and subsequent foreclosure to justify using the date of the policies as the valuation date. If Johnson Bank fails to satisfy this burden, then the proper valuation date is the foreclosure date." The Johnson Bank court also said: "[u]nder the policies, First American did not expressly agree to indemnify or otherwise insure against the risk of a drop in the real estate market." This is a commonly-accepted principle. However, in Whitlock v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 399 S.C. 610, 732 S.E.2d 626 (S.C. 2012), the South Carolina Supreme Court held that loss under an owner's policy is measured as of the date of policy. The court seemed to indicate that the date of loss could change depending on whether the property has depreciated or appreciated in value since the policy date. The Whitlock ruling may also apply to loan policies. It does not make sense to have different rules about the date of loss that are applied based on whether property is depreciating or appreciating in value, because the policy does not insure the risk of a change in the market value, as the Arizona court recognized. See §3.2.3.4 for a complete discussion of the date of loss under an owner's policy. In Bank of Sacramento v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2011 WL 6396533 (9th Cir. (Cal.)) (unpublished), vacating 2010 WL 3784096 (E.D.Cal.), the Ninth Circuit vacated a district court ruling that definitively stated that a bank may not collect as loss the depreciation in the property's value during the time in which the insurer is clearing title. However, the appeals court held only that the bank "has alleged legally cognizable damages caused by the claimed breach in the form of increased carrying costs for any additional time title was unmarketable due to the alleged lack of reasonable diligence." It said it did "not reach the validity of any of the other damages theories asserted by the Bank." The decision is unpublished. Decisions on owner's policies that have addressed the question of whether or not depreciation in the value of the land can be claimed as loss under the policy are discussed at §3.2.3.4 and §3.4.9.5.

[212] Premier Community Bank v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2015 WL 3949327 (W.D.Wash. 2015) (unpublished); Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co. v. Sun Valley Credit, LLC, 2015 WL 807055 (unpublished). In Premier Community Bank, the insurer obtained an equitable lien on the property and converted it to title, which it tendered to the lender insured. The lender demanded to be paid the amount by which the property had declined in value from the policy date to the day on which title was tendered to it. The court rejected that claim, and found that the insurer owed no money to the

> Having reviewed the arguments of the parties and the relevant case law, and construing those in favor of the insured, the Court finds that the loss to a lender under a title insurance policy is determined at the date of foreclosure. This is the majority approach to valuing the lender's loss. See Joyce D. Palomar, 1 Title Insurance Law § 10:16, Paying the insured's loss—Date value is to be measured (2014–2015 ed.). The risk allocation discussion supporting this view is applicable in this case because the Policy provides indemnity only to the extent a loss suffered by Credit resulting from a title defect thereby compromising its security interest in the Property. The title insurance policy does not place the risk of a decreasing real estate market upon the insurer. The Policy does not guarantee that the Property was worth the amount of the loan used to purchase it nor that the loan will be repaid. Based on the reasoning in these cases, the Court concludes that the proper valuation date is as of the date the loss is realized by the insured—the date of the foreclosure sale.[213]

The above quote is merely a restatement of long-established twin principles. First, a title insurance policy does not insure that the property now has or ever had any particular value.[214] Second, the insurer does not indemnify the insured lender against depreciation in the land value that is not caused by a title defect.[215] When a property's value increases, the insured receives a benefit from the fact lender for the decline in value. It rejected the Citicorp analysis, because Citicorp had ignored the insurer's right to tender title to the insured in full satisfaction of its policy duties. See §3.4.6.1 for a complete discussion of that principle.

Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 905 F.2d 1203, 1205 (8th Cir.1990) (quotation marks and citations omitted). Chicago Title Ins. Co., 144 Wis.2d 68, 423 N.W.2d 521 (1988) (the "insurable value of a mortgage on real estate is the fair market value of the realty which secures the mortgage, and is not controlled by the original purchase-price of the mortgage"); Associated Bank, N.A. v. RM Kids, LLC, 337 Ga.App. 638, 788 S.E.2d 542 (Ga.App. 2016), the court said that the policy does not "guarantee either that the mortgaged premises are worth the amount of the mortgage or that the mortgage debt will be paid."

[215] In U.S. Bank, N.A. v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 2012 WL 2362456 (Mich.App.) (unpublished), the court rejected the insured's argument that, in order to indemnify the insured for title "as insured," the insurer must pay the insured policy limits, although the property had declined in value since the policy date. It said: "Ticor insures against defects, liens, and encumbrances; it does not insure against changes in valuation due to market fluctuations. We find that the trial court erred in simply awarding the amount of insurance to plaintiff." The court rejected the insured's claim for a decline in property value during the time in which the successful title clearance action was pending, in First Federal Savings Bank v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 451 S.E.2d 916 (S.C.App. 1994). In Yesilevich v. Republic Title Co., 2011 WL 10068810 (Ill.App. 1 Dist.) (unpublished), the court held that "[a] title insurance policy is unaffected by a change in the property's value, such as depreciation or appreciation." Likewise, in First American Bank v. First American Transp. Title Ins. Co., 759 F.3d 427 (5th Cir. (La.) 2014), the court rejected the insured's attempts to value its loan collateral based on old and suspect appraisals rather than actual sale prices after foreclosure. The court also rejected the insured's argument that the

that loss is measured as of a date well past the policy date, because that appreciation increases the amount by which a title defects reduces the land value.

Most courts have held that the policy is not ambiguous due to the lack of an express statement as to the date on which loss is measured.[216] However, several courts have found that the lack of a policy term creates an ambiguity in the policy, because that lack of a provision is what has allowed the courts to split in interpreting the policy.[217] Nonetheless, even some of those courts have held that the majority view is the more rational of the two.[218]

3.2.4.3 Valuing The Property

Once the loss date is determined, the property's value may be established by one of several methods. Several courts have accepted the foreclosure sale price as establishing the value of the property.[219] However, a credit bid by the lender is not a very accurate test of value, especially when the lender is the only bidder. Thus, the majority view is that a bid by a third party at the foreclosure sale establishes fair market value, while a bid by the lender of its own debt does not.[220] Some courts have used the price at which the lender resold the property as the best evidence of its value, although such sales are often at distressed prices.[221] earlier appraisal date should be used because the insurer delayed foreclosure by defending against the adverse lien claims. In First American Title Ins. Co. v. Johnson Bank, 239 Ariz. 348, 372 P.3d 292 (Ariz. 2016), the Arizona Supreme Court said that, "[u]nder the policies, First American did not expressly agree to indemnify or otherwise insure against the risk of a drop in the real estate market." One of the authorities it relied on for that statement was Christopher B. Frantze, Equity Income Partners LP v. Chicago Title Insurance Co. and Recovery Under A Lender's Title Insurance Policy in A Falling Real Estate Market, 48 Real Prop. Tr. & Est. L.J. 391 (2013).

[216] See, for example, First Internet Bank of Indiana v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 2009 WL 2092782 (S.D.Ind.) (unpublished); Karl v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 20 Cal.App. 4th 972, 24 Cal.Rptr.2d 912 (Cal.App. 4 Dist. 1993); First American Bank v. First Am. Transp. Title Ins. Co., 759 F.3d 427 (5th Cir. 2014); and Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. RM Kids, LLC, 337 Ga.App. 638, 788 S.E.2d 542 (Ga.App. 2016).

[217] In Equity Income Partners LP v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2012 WL 3871505 (D.Ariz.) (unpublished), the court held that the lack of a policy loss date provision rendered the policy ambiguous, and accepted the insured's contention that loss should be measured as of the policy date rather than the date on which the insured took title through foreclosure or had its lien extinguished. In First American Title Ins. Co. v. Johnson Bank, 239 Ariz. 348, 372 P.3d 292 (Ariz. 2016), the Arizona Supreme Court rejected the reasoning of Equity Income, but did agree that the policy was ambiguous due to its lack of a provision declaring the date of loss. The Johnson Bank decision is fully discussed above, this section. In Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co. v. Sun Valley Credit, LLC, 2015 WL 807055 (unpublished), the court found that the loan policy was ambiguous because the date of loss is not defined and jurisdictions have developed two competing rules on the date of loss—date of the policy and the date on which the insured takes title through foreclosure sale. The court went on to hold that the foreclosure sale date is the more reasonable of the two rules to apply when the insured mortgage is foreclosed and the insured takes title.

When the lender makes a credit bid, the value may be established by an appraisal[222] or a stipulation between the insured and the senior mortgagee.[223] However, appraisals from the time the loan was made are inherently unreliable when they were prepared long before the foreclosure date and are based on facts that have changed or optimistic assumptions that are no longer valid.[224] See §3.2.3.7 regarding the use of appraisals for valuation of loss. Construction loans raise a special problem in establishing value, because partially built improvements are difficult to value. One method is to use the value of the property when finished, less the cost to complete.[225]

In some circumstances, the measure of loss is the amount paid by the lender to clear title. For example, when the lender held a mortgage on a land contract vendee's interest, but the vendee's interest had already been assigned, the loss was found to equal what the lender paid to obtain the vendee's interest in the course of its foreclosure.[226]

For title defects other than liens, one possible measure of diminution in value is proof of a reduction in the resale price. In Hodas v. First American Title Ins. Co.,[227] the lender discovered an undisclosed title interest when it attempted to resell the property after foreclosure. That sale fell apart and the property was later sold at a lower price. The court accepted the reduction in sale price as evidence of the diminution in value and allowed recovery in that amount. One scholar has pointed out, however, that the "loss of benefit of bargain" measure of loss adopted in Hodas is contrary to settled authority, since it implicitly incorporates not only compensation for diminution in value but also the loss of resale profit.[228] Further, it is incumbent on the insured to establish that a reduction in sale price was due solely to the title defect. Finally, a sale price reduction may invoke the voluntary settlement clause of the policy (see §2.14) or terminate the policy (see §7.9) or both.

First American Transp. Title Ins. Co*., 759 F.3d 427 (5th Cir. (La.) 2014), the court used resale prices. 3.2.4.4 Amount Of Omitted Prior Liens And Insured's Indebtedness

Once the property's value is determined, the insurer must determine the dollar amount or value of the covered matter. When the covered matter is a lien, this is ordinarily readily determined by ordering a payoff statement. When the matter is something other than a lien, the value is determined by appraisal or a reasonable alternate method. In CMEI Inc. v. American Title Ins. Co.,[229] the title claim was based on two unexcepted easements. The insured admitted, however, that the value of the property was more than the loan amount even subject to the encumbrances. Therefore, the court ruled that there was no loss, and found it unnecessary to make a diminution calculation. The same rule was applied in Madison National Bank v. St. Paul Title Ins. Co.,[230] in which the diminution in value caused by the covered matter did not cause the lender's security to be impaired.

To analyze the amount of the loss, the insurer must also determine the amount of the debt. Under a 2006 ALTA Loan policy, "Indebtedness" is a defined term, and includes principal, interest, penalties, late fees and a host of other charges.[231] Under the 1992 and earlier ALTA policy forms, there is no definition of "indebtedness," but the debt includes principal and interest to the date of discovery.[232] It may also include additional advances made by the lender to protect the lien of the mortgage.[233] Under policies other than the 2006 ALTA Loan policy, all payments of principal reduce the policy amount dollar for dollar. The 1992 loan policy states, at Conditions and Stipulations 2(c), that the policy amount may not exceed the amount of the principal "reduced by the amount of all payments made." In turn, Conditions and Stipulations 2(c) is tied to ¶¶ 7(a)(ii) and 9, which state, respectively, that liability is limited to "the amount of the unpaid principal indebtedness," and that all payments "by any person of the principal of the indebtedness ... shall reduce the amount of insurance pro tanto." The parties may agree to use the amount of the foreclosure judgment.[234] See a further discussion of those policy provisions at §3.8.

Case law confirms that the lender insured does not suffer a loss if the entire principal is repaid. In The Cadle Co. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co.,[235] a senior lien caused the insured mortgagee no loss when the insured received payments from the borrower, the federal government and a loan assignee that totaled more than either the policy amount or the value of the property. The Cadle court ruled without discussion that the money received by the insured lender from an assignee of the loan could be counted as a repayment of the debt. However, in the typical assignment situation, the sale of the loan secured by the insured mortgage does not extinguish the debt. Rather, the new owner of the debt becomes the insured. In C.A.M. Affiliates, Inc. v. First American Title Ins. Co.,[236] the original insured sold the loan while suing the insurer for a claimed policy loss. The insurer argued that the sum paid for the loan was a full repayment of the loan which terminated the policy under Conditions and Stipulations 9(b). The court disagreed, saying:

> C.A.M.'s payment was not a repayment of the principal of the indebtedness. Rather, it was simply a transfer of the indebtedness from one entity to another for a premium. Consequently, this section of the insurance policy does not apply, and First American is responsible for the claims made by plaintiffs against their policies. The loan balance should be reduced by amounts recovered on other collateral securing the same loan.[237]

However, one court found that the lender was permitted to apply the proceeds of a credit life insurance policy to interest first, and then principal, thus increasing the loss payable under the policy.[238] This ruling was based on the fact that the policy was found not to have an "other insurance" clause requiring a dollar-for-dollar offset of another insurance payment against the loss payable under the title insurance policy.

Once the value of the property, the amount of the Indebtedness and the amount of the lien or encumbrance for which there is coverage have been determined, the amount of the insured lender's loss of security is calculated as explained in §3.2.4.1.

3.3 Defense Of Insured

The second method by which the insurer may respond to a covered claim is to accept the insured's defense in an action affecting title.[239] Defense of the insured is not, strictly, an alternative to the other options which the insurer normally possesses, because it is an independent policy obligation. The defense duty is the subject of Chapter 4.

FORM 13, Appendix A
Notice of insurer's intent to clear title—Residential policy

The policy gives the insurer the "right at its own cost to institute and without undue delay" to bring suit or "do any other act" which in the insurer's opinion "may be necessary or desirable to establish the title to the estate or interest as insured."[240] This right is one of the several options the insurer holds for resolving a covered claim under the policy. The insurer has no duty to purchase for the insured a right in property whose title is not insured by the policy.[241]

[239] See DAFCO LLC v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 156 Idaho 749, 331 P.3d 491 (Idaho 2014), which rejected the insured lender's position that the insurer should have written a check to the insured for policy limits rather than defend the insured in litigation against a claim that its lien was void as a violation of the state homestead law. The insurer successfully defended the insured. The court dismissed the lender's lawsuit against the insurer, holding that the insurer was entitled to resolve the claim by defending the insured deed of trust. It said that the policy clearly permits the insurer to defend title as "a contractual alternative to payment of an insured's claim," which right "was available to Stewart at its discretion."

[240] Condition 5(b) of the 2006 ALTA policies states: "The Company shall have the right, in addition to the options contained in Section 7 of these Conditions, at its own cost, to institute and prosecute any action or proceeding or to do any other act that in its opinion may be necessary or desirable to establish the Title, as insured, or to prevent or reduce loss or damage to the Insured. The Company may take any appropriate action under the terms of this policy, whether or not it shall be liable to the Insured. The exercise of these rights shall not be an admission of liability or waiver of any provision of this policy. If the Company exercises its rights under this subsection, it must do so diligently." Also see Conditions and Stipulations 4(b), 1992 ALTA Owner's and Loan policies; Conditions 4(e), ALTA Residential policy; and Conditions 4.a.(8), ALTA Homeowner's policy.

[241] In Geo Finance, LLC v. University Square 2751, LLC, 2014 WL 7369940 (E.D.Mich. 2014) (unpublished), the policy insured the title to real estate the insured purchased at a mortgage foreclosure sale. The insured later learned that there was a geothermal water supply system hooked up to the building, including pipes and other equipment, that was

The insured may not preclude the insurer from exercising the option to clear title by insisting that the insurer pay the insured or the adverse party.[242] As one court noted, a requirement that the insurer honor such a demand would limit the remedies for which the insurer contracted in the policy:

> By clear and unambiguous language, then, Stewart Title had the option to establish by litigation the title as Stewart Title insured it in each case and Stewart Title had no liability for loss or damage where litigation ensued until a court determined the title was not as it was insured to be. ... Absent a finding adverse to the title or to the lien [of the mortgage insured], as the case may be, no claim arose or loss occurred for which Stewart Title could be held responsible under its policies. ... Indeed, to hold otherwise would rob Stewart Title of its right under each policy to institute litigation to cure a defect in a title or lien and thus would convert each policy from one that indemnifies the insured's state of title into one that guarantees it.[243]

The right to clear title includes action taken to mitigate the insured's damages caused by the title defect ("to prevent or reduce loss or damage").

When an insurer elects to clear title, the insured may later argue that the insurer is estopped from asserting that there is no coverage for the matter.[244] However, the more correct view is that there can be no such estoppel or waiver.[245] The policy says that, by clearing title, the insurer "shall not thereby concede liability or waive any provision of this policy." Further, most states follow the rule that an insured cannot obtain coverage by waiver or estoppel. To avoid any such claim, the insurer may wish to explain before clearing title that it does not thereby admit coverage for the matter being cleared.

Most often, a title insurer clears title by filing suit in the insured's name, but some jurisdictions have approved the clearing of title in the insurer's name.[246] However, the insurer may owned by the party that sold metered water to the property under an unrecorded contract. The court held that the title insurer was not required to buy the water system for the insured, because the policy did not insure the title to that equipment.

Waiver requires proof of the intentional relinquishment of a known right. California follows the rule that an insured may not expand policy coverage by estoppel or waiver.

also clear title by other means. These include the defense of a suit against the insured, when the effect of winning the suit will be to confirm the insured's title.[247]

The insurer may also clear title by action short of litigation, such as to remove an encumbrance, obtain a curative deed or release a lien.[248] If the insurer files an action to clear title, it may clear title and resolve the suit by purchasing the property for the insured.[249] If the insured rejects the tender of title to the property or money equal to its fair market value, the insurer has the right to withdraw from prosecution of the suit.[250]

The policy also permits the insurer to clear title without litigation or the retention of counsel for the insured. Condition 7(b)(i) of the 2006 ALTA Owner's policy states that the insurer has the right to "pay or otherwise settle with other parties for or in the name of an Insured Claimant any claim insured against under this policy." Other versions of the standard coverage ALTA policies contain the same provision. This provision is invoked when a title insurance claim administrator resolves a claim by removing a lien, buying an access right or taking other action to make title as insured. See §3.6 for a discussion of resolving a claim by paying an adverse party. Also see §3.7 on obtaining title for the insured without litigation.

Insureds have argued that the failure to disclose a defect in title is a breach of the policy by the insurer, for which its sole remedy is to indemnify the insured. Courts have rejected this theory as being contrary to the indemnity contract nature of title insurance.[251] See §9.1.2 regarding the characterization of the policy as indemnification rather than warranty. One decision rejected the warranty theory, because it would erase the insurer's right to clear title:

> We conclude that the latter view of what constitutes a "breach"--that the insurer is not immediately in breach simply because title is defective on the day the policy is

The appeals court considered the tender of title to resolve the defect, but reversed summary judgment in favor of the insurer because the insured might be able to prove consequential damages: "Inherent in fee simple ownership is the right to quiet enjoyment and possession. … Defendant did not provide Plaintiff with possession for several months, the result of which ended in the property falling into foreclosure. It was foreseeable that the Property would go into foreclosure, and Plaintiff alleges that Defendant delayed curing the defect in title to secure a more desirable purchase price. … Because Defendant's actions to cure the title defect may have been too little too late, and did not make Plaintiff whole, Defendant is not entitled to Summary Judgment… ."

> issued--is more in line with both title insurance law and the standard form title insurance policy that we have before us. As we have observed, a title insurer does not guarantee the state of the title. Instead, a title insurance policy is a contract of indemnity. The view that a title insurer is in breach simply because there are defects in the title at the time the policy is issued would turn the title insurer into the guarantor of the grantee's title.[252]

In keeping with the policy's system of creating alternate means of resolving a claim, the clearing of title is an option rather than a duty.[253] The oft-quoted maxim in this regard is that the policy is a policy of indemnity rather than of guaranty. In some cases, the insured simply cannot be proven to have good title. In other cases, the insurer has no duty to clear title because no affirmative action is required.[254] The policy also does not obligate the insurer to bring an action for the insured to enforce the insured's rights.[255] See §3.1 regarding the insurer's right to respond to certain claims by "watchful waiting."

The insurer also is not required to indemnify the insured or prosecute a lawsuit on its behalf to fix a defect in title that no third party is asserting, and that the insurer does not believe requires a curative lawsuit.[256] In such situations, the insurer is typically entitled to take the approach of Jul 23, 2009) (no duty to enforce excepted restrictions against violating neighbor). Also, in Thurlow v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 2009 WL 2358307 (Conn.Super.) (unpublished), the insureds alleged that a neighbor physically blocked their access, and sued their insurer to require it to prosecute a lawsuit to enjoin the blockage. The court ruled that the policy does not require the insurer to bring such an action. It noted that, when "a defect exists but there is no adverse action brought against its insured, the title insurer may elect not to bring affirmative litigation, but rather to pay the amount of the insured's loss."

[256] In Castin, LLC v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 576269 (Ohio App. 9 Dist.) (unpublished), the court held that a title insurer was not liable for the loss the insured owned claimed to have suffered due to a technical defect in the vesting deed, which defect was not asserted by any party other than the insured. Further, the insured asserted that it had been unable to close on a loan due to the deed issue, despite the fact that the insurer had agreed to insure the lender against the issue. The insurer had also issued a letter of indemnity to another insurer, which the insured told that insurer watchful waiting as described in §3.1. For example, in Schwartz v. Stewart Title Guar. Co.,[257] the insured sued the developer-declarant, claiming, among other things, that the condominium declaration was defective because it was not signed by the record owner. The title insurer cured the defect with an affidavit and deed. No third party challenged the validity of the declaration. The insured sued the insurer for the attorney fees he incurred in prosecuting the action. The court found that there was no duty to clear title:

> Under the Policy, whether to take action to cure alleged title defects is a matter committed to the sole discretion of the insurer. … That an insurer may take certain action does not mean that it must do so. ... To trigger the duty to indemnify, the insured must have a claim asserted against the title by a third party because an "indemnity is a… collateral promise to make good a loss or injury suffered by a policyholder in consequence of the act of a third party." ... In the case herein, we find no loss was actually sustained by the plaintiff. …Without an adverse claim contending the title is unmarketable, the defendant has no duty to provide the plaintiff's attorney fees and costs.
> The wording is important--the policy's coverage here is not of the marketability of title, but of an "unmarketable" one. The negative wording is consistent with the indemnity nature of the policy. To cover marketability of the title insured would be to guarantee the title; to cover its unmarketability is to provide an indemnity against adverse claims asserted against it.[258]

However, an insurer may become obligated to clear title if it volunteers to do so, and the insured relies on that offer.[259]

The insurer is not required to attempt to clear title when, according to its best judgment, the

not to accept. The court said: "The undisputed facts in this case establish that no party had made a claim against Castin's title. All of the damages alleged by Castin arose from its own actions in challenging its title, and from its own representations to Chase regarding the state of the title." The court said further that the insurer's right to bring a title clearance action was not a duty. In Chorches v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 48 F.Supp.3d 151 (D.Conn. 2014), the court said that the policy did not obligate the insurer to pay to prosecute a lawsuit on behalf of its insured, the prosecution of which he tendered years after having filed it. The insured had sued his neighbors for alleged trespass; they claimed that he had consented to the placement of utility cables on his land. The court said that the lawsuit did not attack title, and "the title policy does not oblige defendant to bring suit on Coughlin's behalf, much less to compensate him years after the fact for costs of litigation that he unilaterally chose to pursue."

attempt does not have a reasonable likelihood of success.[260] Sometimes the insurer believes there is not a sufficient legal basis for a successful attempt to clear title, but the insured is more optimistic and wants the attempt made. In such a case, the insurer is not obligated to accept the insured's view. The insurer may abandon an attempt to clear title when it learns of facts that suggest that the defense is not meritorious, and in fact may have a duty to do so.[261] The insured is required to come forward with information that will aid the insurer in clearing title, and especially when the insured seeks to convince the insurer of the likelihood of success in such an action. The insured's duty to cooperate in the clearing of title is discussed at §3.4.1.2.

A forced removal coverage does not convert the title clearance provision from an option to a duty. Thus, the insurer is not obligated to take affirmative action to clear title when the policy protects against the forced removal of structures and the insured learns that structures on the insured parcel encroach onto neighboring land.[262]

The insurer typically brings a title clearance action in the name of the insured. However, courts have found that the insurer or its agent have standing to bring litigation to clear title on behalf of the insured.[263] This approach can provide a solution for the insurer when the insured resists having [260] In Regan v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2016 WL 97899 (Cal.App. 4 Dist. 2016) (unpublished), a title insurer paid for a quiet title suit seeking to impose an easement over property owned by a neighbor. The neighbor went on the offensive, suing First American for having "slandered" his title by paying for the quiet title suit. The court dismissed the slander of title claim, saying that the suit was protected free speech under California's anti-SLAPP and litigation privilege statutes. However, the decision illustrates the fact that even a good faith title clearance action can create exposure for the title insurer, which is one reason why title insurers carefully evaluate the legitimacy of such actions before they are filed.

[261] In Anastasi v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 137 Hawai'i 104, 366 P.3d 160 (Hawaii 2016), the Hawaiian Supreme Court ruled that a title insurer defending under a reservation of rights has an "enhanced" duty of good faith, which it can breach if it continues to defend the insured in litigation after it determines there is no meritorious defense, and that defense delays payment to the insured. The court did not find that Fidelity acted in bad faith, but only that there was a genuine issue of material fact "as to whether Fidelity met the enhanced standard of good faith." Thus, it sent the case back down to the trial court.

[262] In Manneck v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 28 Cal.App.4th 1294, 33 Cal.Rptr.2d 771, 777 (1994), the insured obtained an ALTA Residential owner's policy that insured against enforced removal of encroaching structures. The court rejected the argument that the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing required the insurer to take affirmative action when notified that some of the insured's structures encroached, saying: "to hold that the insurer here was required to act under notions of an implied covenant of good faith, even in the absence of forced removal of the improvements encroaching on the adjacent property, would improperly add a new obligation to the title insurance policy. … It is not the role of the courts effectively to make new agreements for the parties by creating coverage where none was intended by the clear and explicit language of the contract."

[263] In Thorntons, Inc. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2009 WL 175044 (C.D.Ill.) (unpublished), the insured sued the insurer to demand payment for the loss caused by the existence of an unexcepted lease. The insurer joined the lessee in the action, to quiet title for the insured. The lessee objected, arguing that the insurer had no standing. The court said: "Chicago Title contracted for the right to bring a quiet title action on [insured] Thorntons' behalf. The Court is aware of no authority prohibiting such a contractual agreement. Pursuant to Chicago Title's contractual right to bring a quiet title action on Thorntons' behalf, the Court finds that Chicago Title has standing here--as Thorntons--to bring its Count I and Count II claims to declare the parties' rights to Tract 2." However, the court ruled that Chicago Title had no standing to sue the seller for misrepresentation, because that claim belonged only to the insured. In In re County Treasurer, 2013 IL its title cleared.

One court ruled that an insurer had no duty to defend an insured in a lawsuit the insured provoked after the insurer had informed the insured that it would resolve the covered matter without litigation. In Sabatino v. First American Title Ins. Co.,[264] the title insurer was found not to be obligated to defend insureds' alleged "deliberate, wrongful and intentional" disruption of an easement by necessity. Before the tender was made, the insurer had notified the insureds of its election to settle the dispute with the plaintiff neighbor or, in the alternative, pay the insureds the diminution in value resulting from the claimed easement. The court found the lawsuit excluded by the post-policy exclusion. It went on, however:

> Finally, even if we were to find defendant had a duty to defend, the title insurance policy provides alternatives in lieu of accepting a tender of defense. The policy provides that defendant's duty to defend is subject to the option "to pay or otherwise settle with other parties for or in the name of an insured claimant any claim insured against under this policy" or "to pay or otherwise settle with the insured claimant the loss or damage provided for under the policy." Here, the facts reveal that defendant first elected to settle the underlying litigation. When it failed to settle, defendant then offered plaintiffs the alternative option to establish a value for their property reflecting the impact of the unrecorded easement on the property. The policy further provides that it limits the extent of the damage to title according to the difference between the value of the insured estate or interest as insured and the value of the insured estate or interest subject to the defect, lien, or encumbrance insured by the policy. Therefore, in this case, defendant's liability is limited to only those claims against plaintiffs that reflect the diminished value of the unrecorded easement on plaintiffs' property. Defendant had the right to elect this option according to the terms of the policy.
> Plaintiffs contend that, by exercising its option to establish a value for their property, defendant unilaterally established a dollar amount for an unrecorded easement that has not yet been determined by the trial court to exist. ... [T]he amount that defendant tendered ... has no bearing on the trial court's ruling regarding whether defendant has a duty to defend.

The court at least impliedly found that the insureds refused to accept a diminution payment, either of which would have avoided the filing of the lawsuit that the insurer was asked to defend.

rights under this subsection [to clear title], it must do so diligently."[265] The diligence statement has been viewed by some courts as a covenant made by the insurer, the breach of which can lead to damages not based on diminution in value.[266] Some courts have interpreted the diligence statement as meaning that the insurer must elect to clear title within a reasonable time, and must prosecute that action with reasonable diligence.[267] However, other states have said that the diligence statement means only that the title insurer must be diligent in making the election to clear title, and that its [265] Condition 5(b). The 1970, 1987, 1990 and 1992 ALTA policy forms used nearly identical language. The Residential and Homeowner's policies do not contain a similar mandate, however.

[266] Jarchow v. Transamerica Title Insurance Co., 48 Cal.App.3d 917, 122 Cal.Rptr. 470 (Cal.App. 1 Dist. 1975), held that an earlier form of California Land Title Association policy created an affirmative duty to clear title, and that the insurer's slow response to the claim supported an award of punitive damages for emotional distress. Jarchow has been distinguished and at least partially overruled by later California decisions (see §16.1.4.1). A later court held that Jarchow did not create a duty to establish title diligently when the issue was encroachments of the insured's improvements and the Residential owner's policy insured only against forced removal of those encroachments, in Manneck v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 28 Cal.App.4th 1294, 33 Cal.Rptr.2d 771 (1994). Further, in Childs v. Mississippi Valley Title Ins. Co., 359 So.2d 1146 (Ala. 1978), the court reviewed the Jarchow policy provision and distinguished it from the 1970 ALTA Owner's policy form at issue in that case. The Childs court said the 1970 ALTA policy created an option to clear title, not a duty: "Here, no such affirmative duty [to clear title] was required of Mississippi Valley. A careful reading of [the policy provision] reveals Mississippi Valley was not required to take any action to establish the title as insured." 359 So.2d at 1152. However, Premier Tierra Holdings, Inc. v. Ticor Title Ins. Co. of Fla., Inc., 2011 WL 2313206 (S.D.Tex.) (unpublished) held that the final determination provision and the diligent title clearance statement are "conflicting." The court said that the insurer had a duty to make the election to clear title promptly, and that the insurer was liable for the decline in the property's market value during the year between the claim submittal and the date on which the insurer elected to clear title, which it did successfully. In First Alliance Bank v. Mississippi Valley Title Ins. Co. (In re Evans), 2012 WL 2374237 (Bkcy.S.D.Miss.) (unpublished), the court found that the obligation to act diligently was a separate contractual undertaking, and that the insurer violated that duty and the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing by delivering title to the insured lender without first obtaining approval for the subdivision of the larger parcel from which it was derived. In Bank of Sacramento v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2011 WL 6396533 (9th Cir. (Cal.)) (unpublished), the court held that "[t]he obligation imposed in section 8(a) for the title insurer to proceed in 'a reasonably diligent manner' applies even when litigation is filed," and was not negated or limited by the final determination clause. Thus, it said, the insurer has a duty to prosecute a title clearance action diligently, the breach of which duty can result in loss payable. In this case, the court said, the loss payable was the carrying cost on the property during the time the lien issues were being litigated. The Premier Tierra and Bank of Sacramento decisions were very similar in their holdings that there is a tension between the diligence covenant and the final determination provision.

Cambridge Chase, Inc*., 725 A.2d 757 (Pa.Super. 1999) (fact question as to whether or not three years was a reasonable time to cure). In Bridgeview Bank Group v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2011 WL 3022307 (N.D.Ill.) (unpublished), the court said that the policy "does not explicitly give Stewart Guaranty a 'reasonable time' to act, but that term is implicit. Otherwise, Stewart Guaranty's 'right' would be meaningless." It held that three weeks was not enough time to clear title. In Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. West, 110 Md.App. 114, 676 A.2d 953 (1996), the insured sued the insurer claiming that the policy was breached by the fact that the land had no right of access. The insurer was in the act of obtaining an access agreement when suit was filed. The court found that the policy was not breached by the existence of a title defect, and that the insurer had a reasonable time in which to clear title. However, the trial court was instructed to find a breach if it determined that a reasonable time had already expired before the insurer sought the easement.

The provision permitting the insurer to clear title is closely linked to the policy term stating that no loss is payable until there is a final determination in the title clearance action, and that no loss is payable if the insurer succeeds in clearing title. See §3.4.5 for a discussion of the final determination clause.

The courts agree that the diligence statement means that an insurer must make the election to clear title within a reasonable time after the completion of its claim investigation, and that it loses that right if it does not make the election within a reasonable period of time.[269] The policy does not prescribe a specific time period for making that election. As a result, some courts have set a deadline for clearing title based on Condition 12 of the 2006 ALTA Owner's policy, which states that the insurer will make a claim payment within 30 days "[w]hen liability and the extent of loss or damage have been definitely fixed in accordance with these Conditions... ."[270] One court gave this rationale

[268] In Kahama VI, LLC v. HJH, LLC, 2016 WL 7104175 (M.D.Fla.) (unpublished), the court said that Florida has long accepted the principle that, "if a final determination by a court cures title defects, the claim [for lack of diligence] is precluded as a matter of law." It relied on Cocoa Properties, Inc. v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 590 So.2d 989 (Fla.App. 2 Dist. 1991) and Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. Synergism One Corp., 572 So.2d 517 (Fla.App. 4 Dist. 1990), which both so held. Kahama also said that Florida has adopted the principle that the ALTA policy bars any claim that the title insurer that clears title may still be sued for its supposed failure to do so "diligently," because the final determination clause has been construed to mean that, when the insurer succeeds in clearing title to a final determination, "the claim only lies once a court speaks, and not before, and not if the court's judgment is favorable." In Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. Machado Family Limited Partnership No. 1, 2018 WL 1877465 (M.D.Fla. 2018) (unpublished), relying on Kahama, the court held that no loss was payable for an error in a legal description that was fixed in a lawsuit filed by the insured but for which the insurer reimbursed the legal fees paid, and that in Florida there is no valid cause of action for lack of diligence when a title clearance action is successful. The court rejected the insured's argument that Kahama should be distinguished on the grounds that, in that case, the title insurer filed the title clearance action and controlled that litigation, while in Machado the insured filed the action and did not ask Stewart Title to get involved until it was finished. The court said: "But the relevant Policy provision does not require that Stewart Title itself conduct the litigation. It also allows for litigation conducted with the title insurer's 'consent.' ... Stewart Title had no opportunity to express its consent (or lack thereof) at the outset of this litigation, which had been underway for several years before Stewart Title was notified. But the fact that Stewart Title promptly paid for that litigation is sufficient, for present purposes, to show (at least) implicit consent."

[269] Ticor Title Ins. Co. v. University Creek, Inc., 767 F.Supp. 1127 (M.D.Fla. 1991). See Granelli v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2012 WL 6096583 (D.N.J.) (unpublished) (finding that insurer cleared title diligently and did not breach the covenant to do so). In Granelli, through several successive claim administrators, the company spent considerable time negotiating with the neighbors to try to resolve the boundary disputes, which did not work. Then it assigned an in-house litigator to bring a quiet title action, and that litigator also tried to resolve the disputes before filing suit. The lawsuit was resolved several years after the claim was submitted. Chicago Title twice offered to pay diminution, which the insured rejected. On appeal, the Third Circuit reversed the grant of summary judgment to the insurer, because the insured had presented some evidence that the insurer had taken longer than was reasonable to file the quiet title suit. Granelli v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 569 Fed.Appx. 125, 2014 WL 2724459 (3rd Cir. (N.J.)) (unpublished). The Third Circuit relied primarily on Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. Greenlands Realty, L.L.C., 58 F.Supp.2d 370 (D.N.J. 1999), in which the court found a lack of reasonable diligence because the insurer took about 16 months after the claim notice was received before it filed a quiet title action. In Granelli, however, the insurer was not doing nothing before it filed suit; it was seeking to clear title without litigation, and resorted to litigation when those efforts failed.

for its use of the claim payment provision to set a deadline for making the title clearance election:

> Indeed ... two alternatives are open to the insurer under the policy when presented with a claim of an adverse interest to an insured property: (1) to pursue a quiet title action without unreasonable delay, or (2) to pay damages within thirty days after determination.[271]

If the insurer is found to have unreasonably delayed in making the election to clear title, some courts have permitted the insured to sue for breach of contract or bad faith conduct, and to seek the damages resulting from the delay.[272] When an insurer cleared title only after being sued by the insured for breach, and after having refused to defend or clear the title when the insured was sued, the insurer was found not to have acted within a reasonable time.[273]

Several courts have addressed whether or not an insurer is liable to the insured for a decline in the property's value or for carrying costs for the time in which the insurer was investigating the claim but had not yet taken action to clear title, or while it was clearing title.[274] A title insurance [271] Davis v. Stewart Title Guaranty Co., 726 S.W.2d 839, 845 (Mo.App. 1987).

[272] See, for example, Caro v. Sharp, 2003 WL 21023933 (Tex.App.-Austin) (unpublished), in which an appellate court upheld a jury verdict finding bad faith delay in clearing title, based on expert testimony that an heirship suit could have been started earlier. In Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. Tilden, 110 P.3d 865, 2005 WY 53 (Wyo. 2005), an arbitrator determined that the insurer took too long to clear title, but also held that the insured had suffered no damages, because the action had been successful. The state supreme court nonetheless held that the insured was entitled to attorney fees under a state penalty statute, based on the arbitrator's determination that the time spent in clearing title was "unreasonable." However, Premier Tierra Holdings, Inc. v. Ticor Title Ins. Co. of Fla., Inc., 2011 WL 2313206 (S.D.Tex.) (unpublished) held that the final determination provision and the diligent title clearance statement are "conflicting." The court said that the insurer had a duty to make the election to clear title promptly, and that the insurer was liable for the decline in the property's market value during the year between the claim submittal and the date on which the insurer elected to clear title, which it did successfully. In Bank of Sacramento v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2011 WL 6396533 (9th Cir. (Cal.)) (unpublished), the court held that "[t]he obligation imposed in section 8(a) for the title insurer to proceed in 'a reasonably diligent manner' applies even when litigation is filed," and was not negated or limited by the final determination clause. Thus, it said, the insurer has a duty to prosecute a title clearance action diligently, the breach of which duty can result in loss payable. In this case, the court said, the loss payable was the carrying cost on the property during the time the lien issues were being litigated. The Premier Tierra and Bank of Sacramento decisions were very similar in their holdings that there is a tension between the diligence covenant and the final determination provision.

[273] McFarland v. First American Title Ins. Co., 595 F.Supp. 630 (D.Mont. 1984). The court said: "[t]he insurer stubbornly refused every request by the insured to bring an action to quiet title, despite the protestations that the subsistent cloud rendered the property unmarketable. The insurer responded, merely, with the opinion of counsel that the recorded easement was invalid and with the assurance: "we will, of course, stand behind our policy as written." In Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. Goldome Credit Corp., 494 So.2d 10 (Ala. 1986), the court held that the insurer's penalty for not having cleared title after it promised to do so was to pay policy limits. Goldome has been criticized in several subsequent decisions. Youngblood v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 923 F.2d 161 (11th Cir. 1991); Mississippi Valley Title Ins. Co. v. Odom, 624 So.2d 1012 (Ala. 1993).

[274] In Wade v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 82 N.E.3d 763, 2017 IL App (1st) 161765, 415 Ill.Dec. 559 (Ill.App. 1 Dist. 2017), the court refused to award the insured the decline in value of the property or the insured's carrying costs while the policy does not insure the value of the property, or protect against the market risk of a decrease in its value, as fully discussed at §3.2.4.2 and §3.4.9.5.

Some courts also apply the "reasonable diligence" provision to analyze the insurer's conduct in seeking to clear title after it makes the election to resolve the claim in that manner.[275] The amount of time it takes to clear title depends on a variety of factors, and each situation is different. Thus, diligence in the clearing of title cannot be measured based on the passage of some uniform period of time.[276] Also, the insurer's diligence in the clearing of title can be judged only by those matters insurer was clearing title without litigation. It relied on prior Illinois decisions in saying that "... title insurance does not provide coverage of the loss of value to the land itself. Rackouski v. Dobson, 261 Ill.App.3d 315, 318, 199 Ill.Dec. 875, 634 N.E.2d 1229 (1994). 'If the value of the property appreciates or depreciates, the title policy is not affected.' McLaughlin v. Attorneys' Title Guaranty Fund, Inc., 61 Ill.App.3d 911, 916, 18 Ill.Dec. 891, 378 N.E.2d 355 (1978)." The Wade court said that the policy itself "evinces an intent by the parties to preclude defendant from liability from the loss in value to plaintiff's property," citing the final determination provision, which says the insurer owes no loss payment if it clears title. In De Paz v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2010 WL 2856089 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), which involved an owner's policy, the court said that market decline may be compensable: "[f]urthermore, plaintiff presented evidence the property lost all its value until the defect was actually removed. … [T]here is no evidence plaintiffs suffered no losses because defendant acted with reasonable diligence to remove the title defect." In Premier Tierra Holdings, Inc. v. Ticor Title Ins. Co. of Fla., Inc., 2011 WL 2313206 (S.D.Tex.) (unpublished), the court ruled that the insurer was liable for the decline in the property's market value during the year or so after the claim was submitted but before the insurer took action to clear title, although it was not responsible for market value decline during the time in which it was clearing title. The court said: "if a title insurer diligently establishes the title (or insured mortgage) as insured, then it has fully performed its duty in Paragraph 4(b), and is not liable for breach under Paragraph 8(a). However, if the insurer establishes the title (or insured mortgage) as insured without diligence, it has breached its self-imposed duty in Paragraph 4(b), and Paragraph 8(a) does not shield it from liability." 2011 WL at *5. In Bank of Sacramento v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2010 WL 3784096 (E.D.Cal.) (unpublished), the insured bank claimed that the property's value declined by more than half, or $6.5 million, while the insurer was clearing title. It argued that the insurer should be tagged with the market loss because it did not clear title with sufficient diligence. The court rejected the bank's theory. The decision was vacated by the Ninth Circuit, which found that the complaint survived the motion to dismiss. However, the appeals court said it did not reach the validity of the damage theories asserted by the bank. 2011 WL 6396533 (C.A.9 (Cal.)) (unpublished). In Neikes v. Ticor Title Company of Oregon, 291 Or.App. 720, 423 P.3d 102 (Or.App. 2018), the title insurer obtained the release of a deed of trust, after which the insured suffered no loss, including a claimed lost sale, lost rent or an alleged decline in the property's value while its title was in jeopardy.

[275] In DAFCO LLC v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 156 Idaho 749, 331 P.3d 491 (Idaho 2014), the court held that the insurer had been diligent in defending the insured lender and defeating the attack on its deed of trust. In Bar-K, Inc. v. Security Title Corp., 2010 WL 3333391 (Cal.App. 1 Dist.) (unpublished), the court found that the insurer had cleared title by dogged determination, although it took several years, and thus was not required to pay the insured any amount in addition to what it had paid to clear title.

[276] In Nebo v. Transamerica Title Ins. Co., 21 Cal.App.3d 222, 98 Cal.Rptr. 237 (1971), the court said: "[w]hat constitutes a reasonable time is a question of fact, depending upon the situation of the parties, the nature of the transaction, and the facts of the particular case." 98 Cal.Rptr. at 241. In National Loan Investors, L.P. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 1999 WL 195819 (Conn.Super.) (unpublished), a title insurer successfully defended the lien of the insured mortgage against a mechanic's lien claimant which had alleged superiority. The action took seven years to finish. In the meantime, back taxes and other liens piled up on the property. The court found that the insurer had performed its contractual obligations, quoting the final determination clause, and refused to award any "delay" damages to the lender. In Michigan Properties, L.L.C. v. Chirco Title Co., 2012 WL 11000 (Mich.App.) (unpublished), the insured bought the property to flip it but it took two years for the insurer to clear a prior mortgage in litigation. The court held that the insured was not entitled to delay damages, stating that "[w]hile the policy requires defendants to provide legal defense within its control; the slow pace of the court system may not be counted against the insurer.[277] Delays imposed by the insured's own failure to cooperate in the clearing of title must be offset in the

'without unreasonable delay,' it does not dictate a reasonable length for the litigation." See also, 9 Appleman, Insurance Law and Practice, §§5213-5214. In Wade v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 82 N.E.3d 763, 2017 IL App (1st) 161765, 415 Ill.Dec. 559 (Ill.App. 1 Dist. 2017), the court found that the insurer was diligent in removing a mortgage from the property when the lien was paid off and released about 18 months after the claim notice was submitted. The court said there was no bright line test for diligence. It rejected the insured's argument that the insurer lacked diligence because it refused to immediately pay the lienholder "the full face value of the lien." During the intervening time, the lender did not threaten the insured's title, and the insured did not prove that she was hampered in selling or using the property. The building was condemned and razed, but not due to the mortgage. The court also rejected the insured's claim based on Section 155 of the Insurance Code, which allows for the recovery of punitive damages in the event an insurance company is liable for the unreasonable delay in settling a claim where the court deems the delay "vexatious and unreasonable." 215 ILCS 5/155 (West 2012). The court said the law does not apply to the clearing of title.

[277] For example, in Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. Synergism One Corp., 572 So.2d 517 (Fla.App. 1990), a lawsuit which took 33 months was found to be a reasonable time for the clearing of title. Synergism was applied in the later Florida case of Huntleigh Park, Inc. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 717 So.2d 1037 (5 Dist. 1998), in which the insurer brought suit to remove restrictions about eight months after the claim was tendered, and the action was completed successfully in about six more months. The case, which resulted in a per curiam decision, is discussed in Rader, The Interpretation of §§7(a) and 7(b) of Title Policies Under Florida Law: Synergism Revisited, The Florida Bar Journal, January, 1999, p. 46. In National Loan Investors, L.P. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 1999 WL 195819 (Conn.Super.) (unpublished), a title insurer successfully defended the lien of the insured mortgage against a mechanic's lien claimant which had alleged superiority. The action took seven years to finish. In the meantime, back taxes and other liens piled up on the property. The court found that the insurer had performed its contractual obligations, quoting the final determination clause, and refused to award any "delay" damages to the lender. In Michigan Properties, L.L.C. v. Chirco Title Co., 2012 WL 11000 (Mich.App.) (unpublished), the insured bought the property to flip it but it took two years for the insurer to clear a prior mortgage in litigation. The court held that the insured was not entitled to delay damages, stating that "[w]hile the policy requires defendants to provide legal defense 'without unreasonable delay,' it does not dictate a reasonable length for the litigation." In Hatch v. First American Title Ins. Co., 895 F.Supp. 10 (D.Mass. 1995), an insured owner claimed policy limits damages even though title had been cleared by the insurer. The title clearance action took five years to conclude. The insurer was denied summary judgment on its argument that there could be no loss because title had been cured. The trial court was instructed that the insureds "may prevail on their claim if they can demonstrate that First American failed to cure the title defect in question within a reasonable time after its discovery." In Hodas v. First American Title Ins. Co., 696 A.2d 1095 (Maine 1997), a judgment was obtained clearing title after 18 months. The foreclosing lender resold the property at a loss while the lawsuit was pending. The trial court permitted the lender to recover the reduction in sale price claimed to result from the title defect, which was upheld as not being "clearly erroneous." In Baker v. Cambridge Chase, Inc., 725 A.2d 757 (Pa.Super. 1999), the appellate court sent the matter back for trial on the question of whether or not three years was a reasonable time in which to procure a limited warranty deed vesting title in the insured. The decision is based on the false premise that the insurer was required to get a warranty deed to the insured, and did not cure title when it got a quit claim deed from the adverse party within a short time after receiving the claim. In First American Bank v. First American Transportation Title Ins. Co., 759 F.3d 427 (5th Cir. (La.) 2014), the court found that the insurer had acted with reasonable diligence. There were delays. Still, the court found that "FATTIC fulfilled most of its obligations under the policies to the Bank, and …did so in as timely a fashion as could be expected in a case as complex as this." The appeals court especially noted that FATTIC promptly hired counsel to represent the bank, that the counsel negotiated to reduce the lien claims and the insurer paid that amount to the bank. The payments on two pieces of collateral "took longer, but that delay was due to the greater factual and legal uncertainty regarding the extent of coverage." In Captiva Lake Investments, LLC v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 883 F.3d 1038 (8th Cir. (Mo.) 2018), the court held that the insurer had removed mechanic's liens diligently, and that a claimed lack of diligence did not support a claim for tortious interference with a business expectancy.

insurer's favor.[278] It is not uncommon for an insured to obdurately delay or impede the insurer's effort to clear title, particularly when the insured wants to shunt the insurer toward the alternative of paying money to the insured.

When the title insurer clears title without litigation, the insurer's diligence is evaluated based on the number of tasks undertaken by the insurer and their complexity. The diligence statement does not impose on the insurer a duty to clear title in the shortest possible time, regardless of the cost. Rather, the insurer is permitted to investigate and negotiate, and is not penalized for time the insurer spends waiting for others to respond.[279]

See § 3.4.1.2 on the subject of the insured's duty to cooperate in the clearing of title. Also, if the counsel performing the clearance action is the insured's privately-retained counsel, operating at the direction of the insured, that counsel's delays should not be held as penalty against the insurer. Finally, the insured's desire to sell or otherwise use the property quickly should not impose a special limitation on the insurer's time period for clearing title.[280]

3.4.1.1 Choice Of Counsel To Clear Title

When the insurer elects to clear title on behalf of the insured, by bringing a lawsuit or otherwise employing counsel, it has the right to select and control that counsel. This right to control counsel is found in Condition 5 of the 2006 ALTA policies.[281]

Although the insurer's election to clear title is not the defense of the insured in litigation, the same tripartite relationship exists between counsel, insurer and insured.[282] If the insurer makes a [278] See Bar-K, Inc. v. Security Title Corp., 2010 WL 3333391 (Cal.App. 1 Dist.) (unpublished) for an example of an insured that sought to block and frustrate the insurer in its efforts to clear title.

[279] See Wade v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 82 N.E.3d 763, 2017 IL App (1st) 161765, 415 Ill.Dec. 559 (Ill.App. 1 Dist. 2017), in which the insurer cleared title by obtaining the release of a mortgage. The court rejected the insured's suggestion that the insurer should have paid off the loan in full in order to immediately obtain a release of the mortgage. The insurer spent about 18 months negotiating for the release of the lien in exchange for payment based on the property's value. The court found that the insurer had cleared title diligently.

[280] See First Federal Savings Bank v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 451 S.E.2d 916 (S.C.App. 1994), quoted and discussed in §3.4. In Granelli v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2012 WL 6096583 (D.N.J.) (unpublished), the court refused to award damages based on two sales the insured allegedly lost while title was being cleared. However, in Mattson Ridge, LLC v. Clear Rock Title, LLP, 824 N.W.2d 622 (Minn. 2012), when the insurer declined to take action to clarify a legal description, the court awarded damages to the insured of policy limits, based partly on the profit the insured would have earned from a claimed lost sale. In Hodas v. First American Title Ins. Co., 696 A.2d 1095 (Maine 1997), the foreclosing lender resold the property at a loss while title was being cleared. The court permitted the lender to recover the reduction in sale price claimed to result from the title defect even though title was cleared 18 months after the claim was tendered.

[281] Conditions 5(a) of the 2006 ALTA policies says: "[t]he Company shall have the right to select counsel of its choice (subject to the right of the Insured to object for reasonable cause) to represent the Insured as to those stated causes of action. It shall not be liable for and will not pay the fees of any other counsel." Conditions 5(b) states: "The Company shall have the right, in addition to the options contained in Section 7 of these Conditions, at its own cost, to institute and prosecute any action or proceeding or to do any other act that in its opinion may be necessary or desirable to establish the Title, as insured, or to prevent or reduce loss or damage to the Insured."

[282] The attorney-client privilege for communication between the insurer and retained counsel that applies when the insurer hires counsel to defend an insured also applies when the title insurer retains a lawyer to prosecute a lawsuit to reservation of rights in retaining counsel to clear title, the same rules regarding selection of counsel to defend an insured under a reservation of rights apply.[283] See §4.9 regarding defense under a reservation of rights. An insurer will normally specify the actions that it agrees to take in order to clear title. However, such a limitation is not normally a reservation of rights but a statement of the scope of the appointed counsel's representation of the insured.

By retaining counsel to clear title, the insurer does not assume a duty to pay fees incurred by the insured for the same purpose or to monitor that retained counsel's actions.[284] An insurer seeking to clear title does not owe duties to parties other than its insured.[285]

3.4.1.2 Insured's Duty To Cooperate In Clearing Of Title

When the insurer brings an action to clear title, the insured has a duty to cooperate in the action. This obligation is laid out in some detail in the policy.[286] The insured is obligated to consent clear title. Bank of America, N.A. v. Superior Court of Orange County, 212 Cal.App.4th 1076, 151 Cal.Rptr.3d 526 (Cal.App. 4 Dist. 2013).

[283] Bank of America, N.A. v. Superior Court of Orange County, 212 Cal.App.4th 1076, 151 Cal.Rptr.3d 526 (Cal.App. 4 Dist. 2013). In Captiva Lake Investments, LLC v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 883 F.3d 1038 (8th Cir. (Mo.) 2018), the court held that the insurer had the right to manage the defense of mechanic lien litigation conducted under a reservation of rights, and that the insured had failed to prove its claim that the insurer tortuously interfered in the relationship between insurer-appointed counsel and the insured, when the coverage issue had no bearing on the way the mechanic lien defense should be conducted.

[284] In Halfmoon Professional Offices v. American Title Ins. Co., 652 N.Y.S.2d 390 (A.D. 3 Dept. 1997), an insured instructed its counsel to clear title, but also notified the insurer of the defect in title. The insurer retained new counsel, who cleared title. The insurer was not responsible for fees incurred by the insured's separate counsel. The Halfmoon decision is premised in part on language in the New York policy which stated that the insurer "shall not be liable for and will not pay the fees of any counsel or attorney employed by the insured." In Breaux v. Cozy Cottages, LLC, 151 So.3d 183 (La.App. 3 Cir. 2014), the court found that the insured's election to retain counsel of its own choice after the insurer cleared title and reached a settlement with the adverse party did not violate its duty to cooperate with the insurer. The court accepted the insured's assertion that the insurer-retained counsel had a "substantial" conflict of interest, which it did not identify. However, the court did not hold directly that the insurer was required to pay for the new counsel. In Marcantel v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2017 WL 5991734 (D. Utah 2017) (unpublished), the insured sought payment of the attorney fees incurred in submitting the claim. The court held that the insurer did not owe those fees, because they were not incurred in the clearing of title or defense of the insured in litigation.

[285] U.S. Bank, N.A. v. McBride, 2017 IL App (1st) 152341-U, 2017 WL 2218861 (Ill.App. 1 Dist.) (unpublished) held that a title insurer seeking to cure a claimed defect in a mortgage was not a debt collector, and no claim could be brought against it by the borrower premised on the federal Fair Debt Collection Practices Act.

[286] Condition 6(a) of the 2006 ALTA policies states: "In all cases where this policy permits or requires the Company to prosecute or provide for the defense of any action or proceeding and any appeals, the Insured shall secure to the Company the right to so prosecute or provide defense in the action or proceeding, including the right to use, at its option, the name of the Insured for this purpose. Whenever requested by the Company, the Insured, at the Company's expense, shall give the Company all reasonable aid (i) in securing evidence, obtaining witnesses, prosecuting or defending the action or proceeding, or effecting settlement, and (ii) in any other lawful act that in the opinion of the Company may be necessary or desirable to establish the Title or any other matter as insured. If the Company is prejudiced by the failure of the Insured to furnish the required cooperation, the Company's obligations to the Insured under the policy shall terminate, including any liability or obligation to defend, prosecute, or continue any litigation, with regard to the matter to be named as a party in an action to clear title, and to assist the company in quieting title to the insured property.[287]

Policy coverage terminates if the insurer is harmed by the insured's failure to cooperate. Harm is measured as the extent to which the insured limits or frustrates the insurer in its efforts to cure the title defect on the insured's behalf .[288] The insured's failure to cooperate in the clearing of or matters requiring such cooperation."

[287] In Elliott v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 123 Ill.App.3d 226, 462 N.E.2d 640 (1984), the court found the insured's lawsuit for damages premature because the insurer was prosecuting an action to clear title. In Mortensen v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 149 Idaho 437, 235 P.3d 387 (Idaho 2010), the insured accused the insurer of jeopardizing his access rights by contacting the neighbor to seek a quit claim deed that would assure those rights. The neighbor refused to give the deed. The insured argued that the insurer acted in bad faith by failing to warn him in advance that it would contact the neighbor. The court found no such duty. "The policy language permits Stewart Title to do whatever it deems necessary to protect Mortensen's easement provided it acts diligently. Acting diligently does not require infallibility. 'Diligence' is defined as '[c]are; caution; the attention and care required from a person in a given situation.' … Although it might have been advantageous for Stewart Title to inform Mortensen that it intended to contact the Akerses about the easement, it had no obligation to do so under the contract, which permitted Stewart Title to take any actions it deemed necessary. There is no reason to believe that contacting the Akerses to seek an amicable settlement was an inappropriate response to Mortensen's demand that Stewart Title obtain access to his land." Emigrant Mortgage Co., Inc. v. Washington Title Ins. Co., 78 A.D.3d 1112, 913 N.Y.S.2d 251 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept. 2010) held that the mere filing of a lawsuit by the insured against the insurer was not a failure to cooperate with the insurer. However, when an insured sued the title insurer for breach and to quiet its title a month after submitting a claim and before the insurer had determined how to resolve the claim, its failure to cooperate breached the policy and terminated coverage. In All State Properties, LLC v. Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 95 A.D.3d 1049, 944 N.Y.S.2d 310, 2012 N.Y. Slip Op. 03790 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept. 2012), the court distinguished Emigrant, saying "the plaintiff's noncooperation was established by the fact that it also precipitously brought its own action on the claim, instead of affording Old Republic a reasonable time within which to investigate the claim and determine how to proceed."

[288] In Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. Bristol Heights Associates, LLC, 142 Conn.App. 390, 70 A.3d 74 (Conn.App. 2013), cert.den. 309 Conn. 909, 68 A.3d 662 (Conn. June 20, 2013), the court ruled that an insured lost its policy coverage for a real estate tax issue by paying the taxes after submitting a claim but without the insurer's written consent, and then refusing to turn over requested documents about that decision and refusing for seven months to allow its representatives to sit for examinations under oath. The court found that the insurer was within its rights to examine the insured's representatives about possible policy defenses, not just its claimed losses, and that the insured delaying the insurer in forming a conclusion as to coverage and adjusting the claim if covered. In Insured Titles, Inc. v. McDonald, 275 Mont. 111, 911 P.2d 209, 212 (1996), an insurer agreed to pay for a quiet title suit. It later purchased the property for the insured, but the insured rejected title. The insurer then tendered a diminution payment, which the insured also refused. Then the insurer withdrew from prosecution of the quiet title action and sued for a declaratory judgment. The court found that the insurer had fully performed its obligations. "TRW presented McDonald with the offer of two acres, or the fair market value of the two acres. However, McDonald refused TRW's offer. Once TRW tendered this offer and McDonald refused, TRW determined that it had satisfied its obligations under the policy." The court agreed with the insurer. An extreme example is found in James v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2014 MT 325, 339 P.3d 420 (Mont. 2014), in which the insureds claimed that they had no right to travel over their neighbors' land to a public street despite an easement grant, because the easement did not set the path of the private drive. The insurer obtained and recorded acknowledgments signed by the neighbors agreeing that the easement was valid and that the path was at the location of the existing drive. The insureds retorted, in their lawsuit asserting that they had no right of access, that "Chicago Title unfairly changed the legal status of their access rights without consulting them" by obtaining the neighbors' statements, that the insurer's actions only "minimally complied" with its policy duty, and also, inconsistently, that the statements did nothing to cure the supposed lack of access. The court found that the insurer had properly confirmed the access right, which had never title typically results in the forfeiture of all policy rights, an extreme penalty. Not every refusal or delay by the insured in assisting the insurer triggers the voiding of coverage under the cooperation clause.[289]

Measure of loss payable if title clearance unsuccessful

The type of action that the insurer takes to clear title varies widely from case to case. In general, title may be considered cleared when the defect or lien has been removed. The ALTA title insurance policies all clearly state that the insurer has cleared title and satisfied all of its obligations when the insured receives title to the property as insured.[290] Title is fully cleared when it is restored to the status as described in the policy.[291]

A Pennsylvania court incorrectly ruled that a title insurer had not cleared title until it obtained a deed from the adverse claimed owner containing the same warranties of title as the seller had contracted to provide. In Baker v. Cambridge Chase, Inc.,[292] the seller conveyed defective title by been lacking. However, in James, the insurer did not seek to void coverage due to a lack of cooperation.

[289] In Breaux v. Cozy Cottages, LLC, 151 So.3d 183 (La.App. 3 Cir. 2014), the insured hired new counsel after the lawyer hired by the insurer worked out a settlement with the adverse neighbor. The new lawyer said the insured did not like the settlement because the payment would reduce the policy amount, leaving less coverage available to resolve other potential title defects. The court said that the insured's refusal to consent to the settlement did not void coverage because the insurer was not required to seek the insured's consent. The court said that the policy permitted Chicago Title to defend the lawsuit, pay the insured or cure the title dispute, and that "[a]ll of these options are still available to Chicago Title."

[291] In Kahama VI, LLC v. HJH, LLC, 2016 WL 7104175 (M.D.Fla.) (unpublished), the court held that title had been cleared to the state in which it had been insured. In that case, the court in the title curative lawsuit held that the property was burdened by a "common law" right of the public to walk along that portion of the property that was on the shore of the Atlantic Ocean. The court in the coverage action said that this common law right did not make title less than as insured, however, because the public rights are not an interest in the title and do not disrupt the economic value of the property. The public rights also fell under Exclusion 1.

the contracted-for limited warranty deed. The title insurer obtained a quit claim deed from the true owner to the insureds, but they insisted that the insurer get a limited warranty deed from the true owner. The insurer eventually obtained that deed. The court found that title was not cured until the limited warranty deed was tendered. The Baker decision was based on the notion that the insurer was required to get the insureds "the benefit of the bargain into which they entered"—that is, a warranty deed rather than a quit claim deed. However, the title insurance policy is an indemnity contract and not a guarantee of the seller's performance under the purchase contract. Full title was conveyed by the quit claim deed. The policy terms do not require the insurer to obtain warranties of title running to the insured.

The Utah Supreme Court made the appropriate analysis under similar facts, in Holmes Development, LLC v. Cook.[293] In that case, a title insurer discovered that the deed to its insured was executed by the wrong party. It obtained a corrective special warranty deed from the true owner. The true owner gave a second deed to a speculator shortly thereafter, who brought suit seeking to divest the insured of title. The insurer successfully defended the insured. The insured made a claim against the insurer for delay damages, bolstered by the argument that the curative action would not have been necessary had the insurer obtained a full warranty deed rather than a limited warranty deed. The insured argued that the special warranty deed was not "appropriate action" under the title clearance provision. The court rejected the argument, holding that the use of the word "appropriate" in the title clearance provision does not set a standard of conduct to which the insurer is bound.[294]

3.4.3 Clearing Of Title Negates Abstractor Liability Claim

When an insurer has established the insured's title as insured, the insurer negates both policy liability and any extra-contractual claims.[295] However, an older Alabama decision permitted an insured to pursue an abstractor liability claim against the insurer even though the insurer had cured the lack of access to the property.[296]

[293] 2002 UT 38, 48 P.3d 895 (Utah 2002).

[294] "We need not address whether First American took 'appropriate action' because the policy did not require 'appropriate action.' The plain language of section 4(b) of the policy provides that First American 'may take any appropriate action under the terms of this policy.' (Emphasis added.) The plain, ordinary, and accepted meaning of the word 'may' is 'permissive' or 'discretionary,' generally indicating that an individual is either 'permitted' or '[h]as a possibility' to do something. Black's Law Dictionary 993 (7th Ed.1999). The parties use the word 'may' in section 4(b) of the policy to set forth their intention that First American has the option to take appropriate action, but is not required to do so. … Inasmuch as 'appropriate action' is not mandated by the policy, the need to determine if First American took appropriate action is obviated." 48 P.3d at 902-3.

[295] In Tri-Legends Corp. v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 889 S.W.2d 432, 443 (Tex.App.--Houston [14th Dist.] 1994), a cause of action based on the Texas Deceptive Trade Practices Act was struck on summary judgment, because the insurer had cleared title. "Tri-Legends' claims against appellees [insurer] must fail based on the court's holding in McDaniel. The only duty imposed on appellees was the duty to indemnify Tri-Legends against losses caused by defects in title. ... First, there was no title defect and second, appellees successfully defended Tri-Legends' title... ."

[296] Soutullo v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 646 So.2d 1352 (Ala. 1994). Claims for abstractor liability under title insurance policies were later negated by statute in Alabama, as discussed at §15.12.

3.4.4 Insuring Title And Other Measures While Title Is Being Cleared

In certain cases, an insurer that has elected to take action to clear title is also willing to insure a purchaser or a mortgage granted by the insured, or to take other action to preserve the insured's position in the property.[297] By taking such measures, the insurer may help the insured avoid delay or lost profit or income. Still, such losses are not compensable under the policy except in very limited circumstances, as discussed at §3.4.9.

The insurer will typically encourage or require the insured to take certain actions to preserve its interest. For example, in many states, a construction lien may be bonded off to permit the sale of land while the validity or amount of the lien is being contested.[298] The insurer may also wish to assist the insured. For example, it may wish to avoid having a prior mortgagee's lien foreclose out the insured lender while the insurer is trying to remedy the defect. The insurer could elect to cure a default on the senior lien holder's loan, or help to arrange the purchase of the senior lien by the insured.[299]

On rental property, the insurer may wish to assist the insured in getting or preserving rental income. The insurer may agree to pay for a request to have a receiver or property manager appointed by a court, or for an escrow of the rentals if there is a dispute over who is entitled to them. If the property is losing rental income because of some needed capital expenditure which the owner is not making, the insurer may consider assisting in arranging or financing such a purchase so that there is a rental stream while the project is in litigation or negotiation.

When the title defect is discovered in the course of a pending sale or mortgage, the insurer may elect to issue a policy for the new party protecting against the covered matter.[300] The insurer

[297] The policy does not state that the insurer has any duty to take such actions, whether or not it is clearing title. However, one unpublished decision said that the insurer should make certain accommodations to the insured when it elects to clear title by litigation that will tie up the property for months or years. Without any authority to back the statement, the court said that "the right to establish the title as insured 'is a right coupled with a duty—that is, a duty to provide some form of suitable relief to an insured, using prudent judgment and reasonable diligence.'" Premier Tierra Holdings, Inc. v. Ticor Title Ins. Co. of Florida, Inc., 2011 WL 2313206 (S.D. Tex.) (unpublished). In another unpublished decision, Feduniak v. Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 6603253 (N.D.Cal.) (unpublished), the court relied on that statement from Premier Tierra as the primary basis for its ruling that an insurer that elected to clear title for the insured in a dispute over a California Coastal Commission easement might be liable for fines assessed by the government for the insured's failure to remove their golf course from the coastal dunes while the dispute was in progress.

[298] See Gram v. Davis, 128 N.C.App. 484, 495 S.E.2d 384 (N.C.App. 1998), for example, which is not a case about title insurance. There, the court found that a construction lien did not render title unmarketable, and property could have been sold despite its existence, because the lien could have been bonded off or paid.

[299] In Nalker v. Transamerica Title Ins. Co., 65 Wash.App. 399, 828 P.2d 621 (1992), the insured second deed of trust contained no legal description. The first deed of trust was foreclosed, and the insured did not bid at sale, thereby losing her interest in the property. The issue before the court was framed as whether or not the insured had a duty to mitigate damages by making a bid. The court found she did not, since the insurer had an equal opportunity to do so, and bidding in would not have preserved an invalid lien. The court rejected the insurer's argument that the title defect was not the proximate cause of the loss, since the insured would have lost her lien in any event.

[300] See Granelli v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 569 Fed.Appx. 125, 2014 WL 2724459 (3rd Cir. (N.J.)) (unpublished), in which the insurer offered to issue a policy to a lender to the insured owner and also issued a letter of indemnity to another insurer while it cleared title, both of which measures the insured refused to accept. The court found that there may also be willing to indemnify another insurer to induce it to issue a policy to a buyer or lender.[301] An insurer's agreement to omit the item on a current policy may be appropriate and a service to the insured. The issuance of a new policy may or may not be coupled with actions to seek to remove the defect, lien or encumbrance. One court found that an insurer's agreement to issue a policy for a purchaser extended the insurer additional time to remove the matter pursuant to its obligation to the seller-insured.[302] An insured may not make a claim based on the alleged loss of a sale or loan due to a title issue, while the insurer is clearing title, when the insured failed to request insurance or an indemnity to a new title insurer.[303]

An insurer's willingness to insure over an enforceable or valid title defect, lien or encumbrance does not, by itself, clear title of the matter.[304] In some cases at least, a lien is not deemed to have been cured by an opinion of counsel that it may be considered discharged.[305]

The insurer is not obligated to issue a new policy or a letter of indemnity, and in many circumstances it would be imprudent to do so.[306] There can be a risk factor in the new transaction was still a question of fact as to whether or not the insurer had cleared title with reasonable diligence.

[301] See Granelli v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 569 Fed.Appx. 125, 2014 WL 2724459 (3rd Cir. (N.J.)) (unpublished), in which the insurer issued a letter of indemnity to another insurer while it cleared title, which the insured refused to accept. Also, in Wade v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 82 N.E.3d 763, 2017 IL App (1st) 161765, 415 Ill.Dec. 559 (Ill.App. 1 Dist. 2017), the insurer said it would have issued an indemnity to another insurer but the insured did not ask for one.

Co*., 82 N.E.3d 763, 2017 IL App (1st) 161765, 415 Ill.Dec. 559 (Ill.App. 1 Dist. 2017), the insured asserted that she was prevented from obtaining a loan secured by the property while the title insurer was seeking a release of an existing lien. The court rejected the argument, crediting testimony by the title insurer that it had not been asked to insure, and would have issued an indemnity to another insurer if it had been asked.

Rep. 7 (Ariz.App. 1 Div. 2015), the insureds contracted to sell the parcel while a complicated, high-stakes mechanic's lien foreclosure action was pending that the insurer was paying to defend, and demanded that the insurer issue a policy to the buyer. The insurer balked at insuring over the liens after losing a summary judgment motion that would have disposed of most of the lien risk. The insureds settled the lien claims without the insurer's written consent. The court found that the insurer was not obligated to insure the buyer's title, and that the insureds negated policy coverage by making the voluntary settlement. The court also rejected the insureds' argument that they had to sell the property to avoid suffering the loss caused by any further decline in the property's value due to general market conditions, saying: "... Fidelity's title policies insured only against loss stemming from the priority of the mechanics' liens over ML Investors' interest in Centerpoint. The policies did not otherwise guaranty the value of the property or that the insureds could complete the sale of Centerpoint in February 2011 (even accepting that it was in the insureds' interests generally to do so)." In Captiva Lake Investments, LLC v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 883 F.3d 1038 (8th Cir. (Mo.) 2018), the insured sought to sell property while the insurer was paying to resolve filed mechanic's liens. The insured asked the insurer to insure over those liens, despite the seeming lack of coverage for them. The insured terminated the purchase contract before the insurer made a decision on the request. The court refused to find that title was rendered that would cause the new policy liability to be materially greater than for the existing policy. For example, if the new policy would be in a larger amount, the risk would be greater. Also, if the proposed insured wanted an affirmative coverage, that specific assurance might create a greater risk than is found in the existing policy. Further, the existing insured may have the status of a bona fide purchaser without knowledge of the defect, a status that the new insured almost certainly would not possess. Also, events that have occurred since the first policy date might have made the title rights less defensible, or the insured might already have failed in an attempt to clear title. When there has been such a change in circumstances or risk factors, the insurer is not required to issue a new policy in order to honor its existing policy obligations.

Also, the insurer may not be doing a service to a purchaser in agreeing to insure over the title issue. For example, one court stated:

> By the time they first notified the Title Company of the problem concerning the easement, the Enrights were already aware of it for some six weeks; yet they expected the Title Company to evaluate the situation and rectify it or to issue a title policy after being made aware of the problem with the Bailey survey. They would have the Title Company compound the error with the Lubows by issuance of a title insurance policy for $182,000 to the Lubows and thereby increasing a known risk from $137,000 after it had been alerted to a probable error in the location of the easement. The Title Company owed a duty to the Lubows to apprise them of the actual facts which it was investigating rather than perpetuating and compounding the error by placing the Lubows in the same predicament as the Enrights found themselves.[307]

Thus, in many cases, the insurer acts appropriately by declining to issue a policy to a purchaser while it is clearing title.

When a title defect is purely technical, the real question is whether or not title is defective or unmarketable at all. See §§3.1 and 3.4.7 for a discussion of those instances in which purported defects in title are not valid or have been cured, such as by passage of time. In such cases, the insurer will typically inform the proposed insured that it is willing to issue a policy with no exception for the claimed title defect because the matter is extinguished, terminated, barred by a statute of limitations or otherwise unenforceable, not because the insurer views itself as "insuring over" the matter.

unmarketable due to the fact that the insurer did not instantly agree to insure over the liens, or that the insurer had breached a duty to the insured.

3.4.5 No Loss Payable Until Final Determination; No Loss If Title Cleared

When the insurer accepts a tender of defense or elects to cure title, whether by litigation or otherwise, there is no loss payable until the litigation is concluded or the title clearance effort has been completed. This policy provision is fundamental to the preservation of the insurer's options in solving a covered claim. If the insurer could be made to pay a loss to the insured before the title clearance action was concluded, the insurer would be precluded from exercising its option to clear title, or to present valid defenses on the insured's behalf in litigation. As explained further below, no loss is payable if the title clearance establishes title as insured.[308] Only if the insured loses the lawsuit or the insurer is unable to otherwise clear title does the loss become fixed and ripe for payment.

The final determination provision is clearly spelled out in two places in the policy. It is stated first in Conditions 5(c) of the 2006 ALTA policies:

> Whenever the Company brings an action or asserts a defense as required or permitted by this policy, the Company may pursue the litigation to a final determination by a court of competent jurisdiction, and it expressly reserves the right, in its sole discretion, to appeal any adverse judgment or order.[309]

Also, Conditions 9(a) and (b) of the 2006 ALTA policies state that no loss is payable if title is cleared, and that in any event loss is not payable until the title clearance action is concluded:

> (a) If the Company establishes the Title, or removes the alleged defect, lien, or encumbrance, or cures the lack of a right of access to or from the Land, or cures the claim of Unmarketable Title, all as insured, in a reasonably diligent manner by any method, including litigation and the completion of any appeals, it shall have fully performed its obligations with respect to that matter and shall not be liable for any loss or damage caused to the Insured.
> (b) In the event of any litigation, including litigation by the Company or with the Company's consent, the Company shall have no liability for loss or damage until there has been a final determination by a court of competent jurisdiction, and disposition of all appeals, adverse to the Title, as insured.[310]

[308] E.C.I. Financial Corp. v. First American Title Ins. Co. of New York, 121 A.D.3d 833, 995 N.Y.S.2d 100, 2014 N.Y. Slip Op. 06937 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept. 2014) (insurer owed no loss payment to insured after defending insured mortgage and settling lien claims, giving insured first lien as assured in policy).

[309] Conditions & Stipulations 4(c) of the 1992 ALTA Owner's policy, similarly, states: "Whenever the Company shall have brought an action or interposed a defense as required or permitted by the provisions of this policy, the Company may pursue any litigation to final determination by a court of competent jurisdiction and expressly reserves the right, in its sole discretion, to appeal from any adverse judgment or order."

[310] Conditions & Stipulations 9(a) and (b) of the 1992 ALTA Owner's policy [¶¶ 9(a) and (b) of the 1992 ALTA Loan policy] contain very similar language, and similar provisions are found in Conditions 6(c)1 of the ALTA Homeowner's policy and Conditions 6(b) of the ALTA Residential policy.

The final determination clause applies both when the insurer brings an action to clear title and when it is defending the insured, as explained by one court:

> No final, nonappealable judgment has been entered in the BMB litigation. Thus, under the express terms of the Stewart policy, no claim has arisen. [footnote omitted] The fact that Stewart has undertaken defense of the BMB litigation, as is its right under the policy, does not alter this determination. Stewart's assumption of defense does not, by the terms of the policy, transform an unmatured claim into a compensable insurance claim.[311]

The final determination clause also applies when the insured has brought an action to clear its own title. In Cohn v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co.,[312] the insured sued to quiet title and also sued the insurer for indemnity. The court found that the insurer's duty to indemnify would not be triggered until there was a final determination that title was in fact defective:

> there is no evidence showing that a court of competent jurisdiction issued a "final determination" as defined in the insurance policy such as would trigger the insured's obligation to pay for a loss for a defect which is not excluded from coverage under the terms of the policy. Accordingly, any summary determination with respect to the [duty to indemnify] is premature... .

Thus, the final determination clause applies whenever there is litigation pending regarding the status of title, and does not apply only to actions brought by the insurer to clear title.

A lawsuit by the insured for breach of contract or for declaration of the insured's rights under the policy is premature if brought before the underlying title clearance action has been brought to its final determination.[313] In American Title Ins. Co. v. East West Financial,[314] a lender-insured chose to

The lender argued that it was not required to prove a loss because the other suit had not been finally determined. The insured was found not to be excused from proving a loss, however, which it could not do until the title clearance action was completed:

> Falmouth was not intended to afford an insured-mortgagee second and third opportunities to prove something that it had otherwise been unable to prove. Once Bay Loan made its position clear and proceeded full steam ahead on all of its claims, it was incumbent upon the district court to adjudicate each claim on the merits.[315]

The court found that the insurer had the right to waive the final determination condition. Once it did so, the clause was moot.[316]

No loss is payable to the insured if the insurer succeeds in clearing title.[317] For example, in

However, in CitiMortgage, Inc. v. Absolute Title Services, Inc., 2012 WL 1108249 (N.D.Ill.) (unpublished), although the court allowed that "[t]he title insurance defendants' interpretation of the 'definitely fixed' language is plausible and finds some support in" the Falmouth decision, it ruled that the clause was ambiguous (without identifying the ambiguity), and refused to dismiss the lender's action on the policy brought while the insurer was defending its lien priority in a separate action. The court said it was relying on Citicorp Savings of Illinois v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 840 F.2d 526 (7th Cir.1988), even though that case did not interpret the final determination clause. The court also did not address or distinguish the Elliott case, also from Illinois, which barred a premature suit based on the final determination provision. In JFK Enterprises, LLC v. Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 2015 WL 556952 (M.D.Fla. 2015) (unpublished), the court held that an action brought by the insured claiming that the title insurer breached the policy because it has taken too long to clear title was premature, because the title clearance action was ongoing and the final determination provision barred the filing of an action until that suit was finished.

Stewart Title of Louisiana (In re West Feliciana Acquisition, L.L.C.)*, 744 F.3d 352 (5th Cir. (La.) 2014) (insured mortgage recorded without legal description but corrected by insurer caused no loss payable by insurer, including large business operation losses suffered by lender). The Amzak court relied on First State Bank v. American Title Ins. Co., 91 F.3d 141, 1996 WL 400322 (5th Cir. 1996) (per curiam) (unpublished), which held that, when the insured's title was cleared, "it is impossible for any loss to be attributed to a failure of title and thus be covered by the policy." The Amzak court specifically rejected the rationale of Citicorp Savings of Illinois v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 840 F.2d 526 (7th Cir. (Ill.) 1988), which held that a void lien could not be cured by the tender of title to the lender, and that the insurer owed the lender policy limits because the insured mortgage was defective when recorded, despite the insurer's tender of title to the insured. In Kahama VI, LLC v. HJH, LLC, 2016 WL 7104175 (M.D.Fla.)

First Federal Savings Bank v. Stewart Title Guar. Co.,[318] the title insurer brought a successful action to clear title shortly after the insured submitted a claim notice, but the insured sued the insurer for a claimed reduction in the value of the land during the pendency of the title clearance action. The appeals court reversed an award of attorney fees and for the reduction in land value, saying:

> Stewart Title did what it was permitted to do under the insurance contract, namely, it elected to pursue litigation to clear the title defects in issue. The litigation resulted in both title problems being cured. ... Having cleared the title defects in question, Stewart Title fulfilled its contractual obligations to the policy holders.[319]

The court confirmed that, when title is cured, the insurer has fulfilled its policy obligations. Citing Conditions 9(b) and Falmouth, the court stated:

> By clear and unambiguous language, then, Stewart Title had the option to establish by litigation the title as Stewart Title insured it in each case and Stewart Title had no liability for loss or damage where litigation ensued until a court determined the title was not as it was insured to be. … Absent a finding adverse to the title or to the lien [of the mortgage insured], as the case may be, no claim arose or loss occurred for which Stewart Title could be held responsible under its policies. ... Indeed, to hold otherwise would rob Stewart Title of its right under each policy to institute litigation to cure a defect in a title or lien and thus would convert each policy from one that indemnifies the insured's state of title into one that guarantees it.[320]

(unpublished), the court said that Florida has long accepted the principle that, "if a final determination by a court cures title defects, the claim is precluded as a matter of law." It relied on Cocoa Properties, Inc. v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 590 So.2d 989 (Fla.App. 2 Dist. 1991) and Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. Synergism One Corp., 572 So.2d 517 (Fla.App. 4 Dist. 1990), which both so held. Kahama also said that Florida has adopted the principle that the ALTA policy bars any claim that the title insurer that clears title may still be sued for its supposed failure to do so "diligently," because when the insurer takes action to clear title "the claim only lies once a court speaks, and not before, and not if the court's judgment is favorable." In RA Southeast Land Company LLC v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2016 WL 4591740 (D.Nev.) (unpublished), the court held that a title insurer that successfully defended the insured's title fully performed its policy duties, and the insured had no basis for claims based on the loss of the ability to construct a shopping center while title was being confirmed. Also, the court held that the fact that coverage emanated from an endorsement rather than a covered risk did not negate the application of the final determination clause. In Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. Machado Family Limited Partnership No. 1, 2018 WL 1877465 (M.D.Fla. 2018) (unpublished), the court held that no loss was payable for an error in a legal description that was fixed in a lawsuit filed by the insured but for which the insurer reimbursed the legal fees paid. The court also held that, in Florida, there is no valid cause of action for lack of diligence in clearing title when the title clearance action is successful.

insured for payment of loss was premature, when filed immediately after the title clearance action had been remanded by the appellate court to the trial court "for reconveyance and for such other proceedings as were necessary" to unwind a conveyance of the insured property. The court said:

> This construction of the "final determination" provision in Ticor's policy is consistent with those cases addressing the issue of when a judgment is final for appeal purposes. The United States Supreme Court has held that a final decision is one that ends litigation and leaves the court with nothing to do but execute the judgment. Catlin v. United States, 324 U.S. 229, 233, 65 S.Ct. 631, 633, 89 L.Ed. 911 (1945). Thus, a determination of liability is not a final decision where the issue of damages remains unresolved.[321]

A bankruptcy court's order refusing to lift an automatic stay was not a final determination adverse to the insured lender for which immediate payment of loss was owed.[322]

The insurer has the right to pursue the title clearance action through the appellate process, as discussed at §3.4.8. When the insurer has elected to appeal, the trial court ruling is not the final order, and the duty to pay has not yet been triggered.[323] Conversely, when the insurer elects not to appeal an adverse ruling, the trial court order becomes the final determination and the time limit for paying the insured begins to run.[324]

When the insurer clears title but not through litigation, the final determination clause applies with the same effect, barring the insured from demanding payment until the insurer has completed its actions to clear title. The insurer should take action promptly if it intends to clear title without litigation. See §3.4.1 regarding the diligent clearing of title.

The insured may not demand that the insurer resolve the claim in another manner while the insurer is pursuing an action to clear title. An insurer has the right to complete the title clearance action, and is not required to obey a command by the insured to pay off or remove the encumbrance that the insurer is seeking to defeat or subordinate in such action.[325] Thus, in Securities Service Inc.

(unpublished), the court dismissed an action by an insured owner demanding that the insurer stop defending the foreclosure of a missed deed of trust and pay it off or pay the insured policy limits. The court said: "Where a policy of title insurance gives the insurer the right or duty to defend its insured against adverse claims to title, the insurer may take the opportunity to prosecute the action on the insured's behalf before paying the claim. … The Policy afforded defendant a number of choices when plaintiff filed her claim, including the choice to '[p]rosecute or defend a court case related to the claim.' Defendant exercised its contractual right… . Notably, under the Policy defendant is not required to pay plaintiff's claim 'until [her] case is finally decided.'" In Branch Banking & Trust Co. v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 2011 WL 3841655 (M.D.Tenn.) (unpublished), the court refused to dismiss the insured's declaratory judgment action on

v. Transamerica Title Ins. Co.,[326] the court found that the insurer was not obligated to pay off an adverse lien claimant or tender policy limits to the insured during the time that it was defending the insured against the lien in a foreclosure action. As another court explained, an insurer was not required to abandon litigation over lien priority based on the insured's demand that it immediately pay the liens instead:

> [U]nder these circumstances, where not only the insurer but also the insured denied the validity of the liens, it was not incumbent upon Stewart Title to pay the amounts claimed by the lienors without a determination of the liens' validity. In fact, under the clear terms of the policy, a claim did not arise and was not maintainable and hence Stewart Title's obligation to pay did not arise "until there has been a final determination by a court of competent jurisdiction ... adverse to the title, as insured."[327]

Also, an insurer was not required to reimburse an insured for a reduction in the price on a sale of the property that closed, when the insurer was actively engaged in removing the restriction and succeeded in doing so after closing.[328] However, several courts have permitted insureds some form of loss payment when the courts have determined that the insurer did not act with diligence in clearing title or in electing to clear title, or because the insured was stymied in its use of the property while the title clearance action was pending, as discussed at §3.4.9.

The insurer's diligence in the prosecution of title clearance litigation is measured by its persistence and doggedness; there is no bright line test as to the amount of elapsed time that represents diligence, because the amount of time it takes to clear title will vary widely from cases to case. See §3.4.1 for a complete discussion of the insurer's reasonable diligence in the clearing of title.

If the title clearance action is unsuccessful, loss is payable within 30 days.[329] Conditions 12 of the 2006 ALTA Owner's policy comes into play, which says: "[w]hen liability and the extent of loss or damage have been definitely fixed in accordance with these Conditions, the payment shall be made within 30 days."[330] In some states, a law or regulation prescribes the number of days an insurer indemnification while the lien litigation was pending, saying that dismissal "would leave the parties in ongoing limbo." However, the court agreed with the insurer that it could not rule on the contract breach claim until the underlying litigation was concluded.

[330] Conditions & Stipulations 9(b) of the 1992 ALTA Owner's Policy (8(b) of the loan policy) states: "In the event of any litigation, including litigation by the Company or with the Company's consent, the Company shall have no liability for loss or damage until there has been a final determination by a court of competent jurisdiction, and disposition of all has to pay a loss once liability has become reasonably certain, which can be different from 30 days, as discussed in §2.5.

Under the 2006 ALTA policies, if the insurer is unsuccessful in clearing title, the insured receives two benefits. First, the policy amount is increased by ten percent.[331] Second, the insured is entitled to select one of two alternate dates on which loss will be measured.[332] Conditions 5(b) of the 2006 policies states:

> (b) If the Company pursues its rights under Section 5 of these Conditions and is unsuccessful in establishing the Title, as insured,
>
> (i) the Amount of Insurance shall be increased by 10%, and
> (ii) the Insured Claimant shall have the right to have the loss or damage determined either as of the date the claim was made by the Insured Claimant or as of the date it is settled and paid.

If the insured makes the date-of-loss election after the final determination in the action, the loss is not payable until the election is made and the diminution in value can be measured. See §3.2.3.4 for a discussion of the owner's policy date of loss, and §3.2.4.2 for a discussion of the loan policy date of loss.

Occasionally, the result of the title clearance action will be that the title defect is limited but not eliminated. In such cases, a loss payment to the insured is calculated as the amount of the diminution in the value of the land due to the covered matter as so limited.[333] The insurer does not

Conditions & Stipulations 12(b) of the 1992 ALTA Owner's Policy (11(b) of the loan policy) states: "When liability and the extent of loss or damage has been definitely fixed in accordance with these Conditions and Stipulations, the loss or damage shall be payable within 30 days thereafter."

[331] See Shamrock Bank of Florida v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 1304694 (S.D.Ill. 2014) (unpublished), in which a bank that was a $50,000 participant in a $1.3 million loan, which was later assigned to it for no additional consideration, was able to turn its $50,000 investment into $1,430,000 after a judgment was entered declaring that title had reverted and its lien was extinguished. The final kicker was the court's order adding 10% to the policy amount after it declared that the lender was entitled to policy limits.

[332] The decisions in In re Evans found at 2011 WL 6258473 (Bkcy.S.D.Miss.) (unpublished) and 2011 WL 6258881 (Bkcy.S.D.Miss.) (unpublished) held that, when the title insurer attempted to obtain a valid lien for the insured lender and failed, loss was measured as of one of the dates stated in the 2006 ALTA Loan policy: the claim date or the date payment is made. The court said loss was not measured as of the policy date, the interpretation that the insured sought. However, in an earlier decision stemming from the same bankruptcy, the same court found that loss should be measured as of the date of policy when the insurer does not take action to clear title. G&B Investments, Inc. v. Henderson (In re Evans), 460 B.R. 848 (Bkcy.S.D.Miss. 2011). The key difference between the two cases, according to the court, was that the title insurers attempted to cure the title defects in one case but not the other. Thus, the court said, the unsuccessful cure provision of the 2006 policy applied. The decision setting the policy date as the date of loss was based on Citicorp Svgs. of Illinois v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 840 F.2d 526 (7th Cir.1988), which found that loss should be measured as of the date of policy because the insured mortgage was void from inception. Citicorp has since been rejected by a number of other courts. However, in each of those decisions, the insurer admittedly took action to establish title as insured, or to impose an equitable lien on behalf of the insured lender. See the discussion of those cases at §3.4.6.2.

3.4.6 Clearing Title For A Lender

The loan policy gives the insurer the right, at its own election, to bring an action or "do any other act which in its opinion" will perfect title in the borrower or "establish ... the lien of the insured mortgage, as insured, or to prevent or reduce loss or damage to the insured."[336] The insurer may thus seek to cure a defect in the lien of the insured mortgage or in the title to the property. When meritorious arguments exist for establishing the mortgage as insured, the insurer will often elect to use its rights under the title clearance provision to assert those arguments on behalf of its insured.

When the insured has submitted prompt notice of the title defect, and absent prejudice by the insured's actions or inaction, the insurer may not deny coverage based on the insured's own failure to protect the lien of the insured mortgage based on those meritorious defenses.[337] The final settled by an agreement under which the insureds obtained title, but which subjected the property to a restriction on its use, the measure of loss was the diminution in value to the property due to the restriction. When the disputed easement's path was limited, the court gave no clear-cut answers as to the measure of loss, if any, but it instructed the trial court to consider on remand whether or not the insured suffered a loss because, as a condition to the narrowing of the easement path, the easement holder insisted that the insured indemnify it against damage to its pipeline. Bender v. Kansas Secured Title and Abstract Co., Inc., 34 Kan.App.2d 399, 119 P.3d 670 (Kan.App. 2005).

[334] Linder v. Ticor Title Ins. Co. of Calif., 647 N.E.2d 37 (Ind.App. 4 Dist. 1995).

[335] In Kasco, L.P. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2011 WL 4984741 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), the insured limited the path of an easement covered by the policy. The insurer cited Linder to support the argument that the limitation of the easement should offset the diminution in value claim. The court refused, saying that such an offset might encourage the title insurer to delay as long as possible "in the hope that the problem is going to solve itself" and allow it to "escape liability for its breach of contract," and that in clearing title the insured "did what [Chicago Title] should have done long before." However, if the insurer reimburses the insured for the cost of a title clearance suit that the insured conducts without first giving notice to the insurer, the insurer is entitled to assert the policy provision stating that no loss is payable when title has been cleared. In Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. Machado Family Limited Partnership No. 1, 2018 WL 1877465 (M.D.Fla. 2018) (unpublished), the court held that no loss was payable for an error in a legal description that was fixed in a lawsuit filed by the insured but for which the insurer reimbursed the insured. The court rejected the insured's argument that Condition 9 should not apply because the insured conducted the title clearance action and did not ask Stewart Title to get involved until it was finished. The court said: "But the relevant Policy provision does not require that Stewart Title itself conduct the litigation. It also allows for litigation conducted with the title insurer's 'consent.' ... Stewart Title had no opportunity to express its consent (or lack thereof) at the outset of this litigation, which had been underway for several years before Stewart Title was notified. But the fact that Stewart Title promptly paid for that litigation is sufficient, for present purposes, to show (at least) implicit consent."

[337] In Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. Matrix Financial Services Corp., 255 Ga.App. 874, 567 S.E.2d 96 (Ga.App. 2002), the insurer asserted Exclusion 3(a) as a coverage defense, based on the insured lender's failure to assert certain arguments as to why its lien had priority over mortgages recorded in the gap. The court rejected the argument, saying: "Nothing in the policy's terms, however, required Matrix to prosecute a quiet title action or to otherwise commence litigation challenging the Haygoods' adverse claim. Instead, the policy gave Fidelity the right to establish Matrix's superior interest or cure the title defect through litigation or other action. Matrix was merely obligated to aid Fidelity in determination clause does not apply to suspend the insured's right to seek payment from the insurer for a title matter, when the only litigation pending is the lender's action against the borrower seeking recovery of the debt.[338] According to the final determination clause, the insurer is not liable to the insured for any claimed reduction in the value of the property that occurs while title is being cleared. However, courts have taken different positions on the issue, as fully discussed in §3.4.1.

The insurer will typically make an effort to preserve the insured lender's rights versus a lien against which there is policy coverage, while it is taking action to clear title. In Transamerica Title Ins. Co. v. San Benito Bank & Trust Co.,[339] the mortgage was insured as a second lien when, in fact, it was third. All three mortgages went into default and the lenders brought parallel foreclosure actions. The insurer obtained a release of the second lien. However, the insured lost the chance to purchase the first mortgage because the second-position lender did so while the insurer was clearing title. The senior lienholder then foreclosed the first mortgage and wiped out the insured's lien. The court ruled that the insured's lien was not established as insured, because the insured did not have the second-position creditor's right to redeem the first mortgage and thus preserve its security.

An insurer that fails to take action promptly to clear title may lose the right to take such action.[340] See §3.4.1 concerning the covenant to clear title diligently.

this effort. And this 'aid' provision cannot reasonably be understood to require the insured to institute legal action, particularly when the policy expressly gives Fidelity the right to bring--at its own expense--such an action. Given the clear policy terms, and construing the policy exclusions against Fidelity, we refuse to find that Matrix created, suffered, assumed, or agreed to the adverse title claims by not instituting a quiet title action or otherwise challenging those claims in court. Furthermore, since the policy did not require Matrix to commence litigation, we cannot find that Matrix failed to mitigate its damages by declining to do so." (emphasis in original).

[338] In First Citizens Bank & Trust Co. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 320 P.3d 406 (Colo.App. 1 Div. 2014), the court quoted 2 Gregory J. Notarianni, Colorado Practice Series: Methods of Practice § 63:3, at 271 (Cathy S. Krendl ed., 6th ed., 2012), which says: "An insured mortgagee has not suffered an identifiable loss unless and until it forecloses its insured deed of trust and a title defect reduces the value of the property, thereby preventing the mortgagee from recouping its loan amount upon resale. If a title defect exists, but the value of the property is nevertheless sufficient to pay the mortgagee its loan amount, then there is no damage compensable under the loan policy." However, the court found that the insured lender was not premature in bringing suit against the insurer for payment based on its defective lien, although it was still litigating with the defaulted borrower and might obtain some payment from it. The court held that the final determination clause did not stay the coverage suit, since the insurer was not paying for the lawsuit against the borrower, and that action would not clear title.

[340] In Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. Goldome Credit Corp., 494 So.2d 10, 12 (Ala. 1986), the insurer agreed at closing to obtain a release of a prior mortgage, but failed to do so. The loan went into default, and the insured gave the insurer two options: pay policy limits or buy the loan. Shortly thereafter, the lender filed suit. The insurer attempted to obtain the release, and then filed suit to remove the lien. The court barred the insurer from pursuing its title clearance action, and granted summary judgment for policy limits, holding that the insurer "has had reasonable and adequate time to cure the defects in the subject title." Goldome was limited by the Alabama high court in Mississippi Valley Title Ins. Co. v. Odom, 624 So.2d 1012 (Ala. 1993). The Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals distinguished Goldome in Youngblood v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 923 F.2d 161 (11th Cir. 1991).

3.4.6.1 Tendering Title To Lender To Satisfy Policy Duties

A lender does not suffer a compensable loss under a title insurance policy if it is able to foreclose the insured mortgage and take title to the property. The lender's ability to successfully foreclose establishes the lack of a defect in title, even when the property was the subject of loan fraud.[341] The lender also does not suffer a compensable loss if it succeeds in taking a deed in lieu of foreclosure that conveys title to the lender subject to the matters excepted from coverage and any post-policy matters.[342]

Likewise, the insurer fulfills its policy duties when it gives the lender title to the property.[343] The lender may prefer to be paid money than to receive title to the property, but it is not entitled to insist on that election.[344] The policy gives the insurer the right, but not the obligation, to purchase the loan, as discussed in §3.8.

Mississippi Valley Title Ins. Co. (In re Evans)*, 2012 WL 2374237 (Bkcy.S.D.Miss.) (unpublished), the insurer tendered title to the insured lender, which the court approved other than its mandate that the insurer also obtain approval for subdivision of the property from which the insured parcel had been carved. However, in a related case, the same court held that the insurer was liable for policy limits after it obtained title to the insured parcels for the lender and put it in title. The court refused to credit the value of the property against the debt, excused the insured from proving a diminution in value by labeling the loss provision an "exclusion," and judicially rescinded the conveyances. In re Evans, 492 B.R. 480 (Bkcy.S.D.Miss. 2013). In Premier Community Bank v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2015 WL 3949327 (W.D.Wash. 2015) (unpublished), the insurer obtained an equitable lien on the property and converted it to title, which it tendered to the lender insured. The lender demanded to be paid the amount by which the property had declined in value from the policy date to the day on which title was tendered to it. The court rejected that claim, and found that the insurer owed no money to the lender for the decline in value. It rejected the Citicorp analysis that an equitable lien is not title as insured, because Citicorp had ignored the insurer's right to tender title to the insured in full satisfaction of its policy duties.

[344] In Bayrock Mortgage Corp. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 286 Ga.App. 18, 648 S.E.2d 433, (Ga.App. 2007), the court held that an insured lender was not entitled to sue the title insurer for policy limits and bad faith damages while refusing the insurer's offer to convey the property to the lender. BayRock Mortgage made a loan secured by a deed of trust. The United States took the property by forfeiture a short time later. BayRock demanded policy limits from its insurer, Chicago Title. When Chicago Title did not pay the claim within 60 days, BayRock sued for breach of policy and bad faith. Chicago Title then arranged for the United States to convey the property to BayRock, but the lender declined the tender. Chicago Title moved for summary judgment, which the trial court granted and the court of appeals affirmed.

3.4.6.2 Establishment of Equitable Lien As Clearing Of Title

The policy permits the insurer to clear title in order to "establish ... the lien of the insured mortgage, as insured." In some cases, the insured mortgage cannot be enforced, but the lender is entitled to an equitable lien. The equitable lien may be based on equitable subrogation, to prevent unjust enrichment or as a good faith improver lien.[345]

Two older Illinois decisions held that an insurer did not establish the lien of the insured mortgage by obtaining a judicial declaration of an equitable lien in favor of the insured. In Citicorp Savings of Illinois v. Stewart Title Guar. Co.,[346] a court found that a title insurer did not establish the lien of the insured mortgage by obtaining an equitable lien, because the insured was precluded from collecting interest secured by the lien. The court said that "no action by Stewart Title could have established the mortgage lien as insured... ." [emphasis in original] It awarded the lender insured policy limits, on the rationale that the lender would not have lent the money in the first place "but for" the assurance that the lien was enforceable. An Illinois appeals court decision followed Citicorp in 1989.[347]

Citicorp, which was decided by the Seventh Circuit about Illinois property, was overturned by the Illinois Supreme Court, which held that a title insurance policy is an indemnity contract and not a guaranty.[348] In addition, the Citicorp rationale is flawed because the policy does not insure the debt, or the right to enforce the note. Interest is a component of the debt. The promissory note and the mortgage have been termed two different species, and the policy protects only the mortgage.[349] By analogy, when a lender makes a full credit bid for the property on foreclosure, the lender is deemed to have made an election to take the land in full satisfaction of the debt.[350] Generally, when the lender takes title free of covered title defects, its full credit bid also extinguishes any policy claim.[351] See §7.9 for a discussion of the full credit bid as a payment that terminates a loan policy.

[345] Most states follow the rule that a party who builds an improvement on the land of another is entitled to an equitable lien equal to the value of the improvement. See Equitable Real Estate Investments, Inc. v. United States Dep't of Housing and Urban Development, 14 F.Supp.2d 1058 (N.D.Ill. 1998), for example, in which a lender was denied an equitable lien because it "had constructive and inquiry notice" that the borrower was not the owner of the property on which the improvement was built. Equitable subrogation is discussed at §3.4.7.3.

Corp*., 282 F.R.D. 423 (N.D.Ill. 2012), a federal court in Illinois found Citicorp distinguishable, because the ALTA Residential Limited Liability Junior Loan policy at issue does not assure the validity or enforceability of the insured's lien.

The Citicorp holding that an insured lender is entitled to be paid policy limits if its lien is defective on the policy date has been rejected by numerous other courts.[352] In First Federal Savings & Loan Ass'n v. Transamerica Title Ins. Co.,[353] the policy insured a mortgage on a leasehold estate securing a loan of about $3 million. The leasehold estate was later determined to be void. The insurer cleared title by having the owner deed the entire fee simple estate to the lender. The land was worth less than the loan amount, due to falling land values. The lender later resold the property for $775,000, and then sued the insurer for policy limits plus attorney fees, based on Citicorp. The Tenth Circuit held that "this reasoning 'ignores the nature of title insurance.'" The court ruled:

> Generally, title insurance policies allow an insurer to cure an alleged defect within a reasonable time after receiving notice of such defect before an insured may bring suit on the policy. … First Federal's attorneys, as agents of Transamerica, established title within a reasonable time. Therefore, Transamerica never breached the agreement.[354]

The First Federal court found that tender of the deed established title as insured. The First Federal decision accurately states that, if title is cured by the insurer, no loss lies.

Citicorp was also rejected in Bar-K, Inc. v. Security Title Corp.[355] That case also involved a defective mortgage on a leasehold estate. The insured, Bar-K, Inc., argued that First American Title was barred from hiring a lawyer to try to clear title, because it would be impossible to establish the mortgage liens against the true leasehold estate holder. Therefore, it claimed, First American should have been required to just pay policy limits to the insured, based on Citicorp. The court rejected that argument, saying that the policy gave First American "broad discretionary authority to pursue litigation or other means to resolve title issues," and that even if the insurer would be unable to establish the mortgage as insured, it had the right to mitigate the insured's own loss by clearing title:

> The [policy] language is straightforward and the discretion is considerable. Also, the undisputed facts are that First American acted diligently pursuant to this > authority. Once notified by Bar-K of a foreclosure dispute, it promptly retained Damon Kay to represent Bar-K, and Damon Key promptly pursued litigation based upon a theory that might well have established the lien of the mortgage "as insured" if the litigation had been completed, i.e., that under alter ego law, Airlines's mortgages applied to Air's leasehold interest.

[352] In Amzak Capital Management v. Stewart Title of Louisiana (In re West Feliciana Acquisition, L.L.C.), 744 F.3d 352 (5th Cir. (La.) 2014), the court noted that the Illinois Supreme Court has since rejected the Citicorp premise, as have Focus Investment Associates, Inc. v. American Title Ins. Co., 992 F.2d 1231 (1st Cir. 1993); Gibraltar Savings & Loan Ass'n v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 905 F.2d 1203 (8th Cir. 1990); and JP Morgan Chase Bank, N.A. v. First Am. Title Ins. Co., 725 F.Supp.2d 619 (E.D.Mich. 2010). In Premier Community Bank v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2015 WL 3949327 (W.D.Wash. 2015) (unpublished), the insurer obtained an equitable lien on the property and converted it to title, which it tendered to the lender insured. The lender demanded to be paid the amount by which the property had declined in value from the policy date to the day on which title was tendered to it. The court rejected that claim, and found that the insurer owed no money to the lender for the decline in value. It rejected the Citicorp analysis that an equitable lien is not title as insured, because Citicorp had ignored the insurer's right to tender title to the insured in full satisfaction of its policy duties.

> Furthermore, assuming arguendo that First American had been unable to literally establish the lien of the mortgage "as insured," the policy nonetheless gave it the discretionary authority to pursue litigation "to prevent or reduce loss or damage to the insured." If First American's pursuit of litigation ultimately enabled Bar-K to obtain title to the leasehold estate, it would have succeeded in preventing or reducing loss or damage to Bar-K.[356]

A Michigan federal court also rejected the Citicorp "title as insured" argument. In JP Morgan Chase Bank, N.A. v. First American Title Ins. Co.,[357] the court found that a title insurer was entitled to solve a lender's claim by giving it the title to the property. It ruled that the lender was not entitled to insist on cash instead, on the pretext that the mortgage was defective and that tender of title was not the same as establishing the lien of the mortgage as insured. The court specifically held that Citicorp was wrongly decided in that it "mistakenly treated title insurance as a guarantee of title" rather than a contract of indemnity. The JP Morgan court adopted the reasoning of the First Federal case instead. It concluded that "tendering full title to the Property to the Insured 'establishes the Title' under the Title Policy's Limitation of Liability Provision."

However, the Citicorp holding that a lender's loss should be measured as of the date of policy was adopted in a case in which the insured's mortgage was void and the insurer did not take action to clear title.[358]

3.4.7 Establishing Priority Over Competing Liens

Numerous legal doctrines or remedies may be asserted to establish the priority of the insured mortgage over a competing lienholder. Most depend on state law and are beyond the scope of this treatise. Several such doctrines are sufficiently universal or national so as to warrant inclusion in this text. The following sections discuss the principles that apply to federal tax liens, the doctrines of equitable subrogation and of purchase money mortgage and related principles.

3.4.7.1 Federal Tax Liens

Title insurers regularly encounter disputes regarding federal tax liens, including sometimes thorny issues concerning their attachment or priority. This section deals with some of the more common issues.

3.4.7.1.1 Perfection Of Tax Lien

The federal government obtains a lien against the taxpayer for unpaid taxes from the date on which the tax is assessed.[359] However, as to persons who purchase in good faith from the taxpayer, the lien attaches only on the recording of a federal tax lien in the office designated by state law for records intended to impart constructive notice to purchasers.[360] A protected purchaser is one who buys in good faith, for valuable consideration, and who imparts notice of his rights by recording of his deed.[361]

When a valid federal tax lien encumbers the property at the time the insured interest is created, the insured takes subject to the lien.[362] The purchaser's lack of actual knowledge of the lien is not a defense to its attachment ahead of the purchaser's interest, if the lien is perfected.[363] However, the IRS bears the responsibility for proper filing and indexing to achieve perfection of its lien.[364] See §3.4.7.6 regarding indexing defenses. The IRS is under no obligation to remove the lien as to an "innocent" purchaser, even if the taxpayer is making payments on the tax debt, because the lien serves as security for the payment of the obligation:

> Plaintiffs also claim that the United States should be required to extinguish the liens because payments are being made. This argument is meritless, as a secured party is entitled to hold a lien on property serving as security until the debt is paid in full. These debts have not been paid in full.[365]

[359] 26 U.S.C. §6321 provides: "If any person liable to pay any tax neglects or refuses to pay the same after demand, the amount (including any interest, additional amount, addition to tax, or assessable penalty, together with any costs that may accrue in addition thereto) shall be a lien in favor of the United States upon all property and rights to property, whether real or personal, belonging to such person."

[361] 26 U.S.C. §6323(h)(6) defines "purchaser" as follows: "[t]he term 'purchaser' means a person who, for adequate and full consideration in money or money's worth, acquires an interest (other than a lien or security interest) in property which is valid under local law against subsequent purchasers without actual notice."

3.4.7.1.2 Wrongful Levy Claim

The IRS enforces its lien rights against property by levying on it.[366] It sells the property at a distraint sale.[367] The IRS levy may be wrongful because, for example, the insured's interest in the property has priority over the lien, as discussed above, or a bank account levied on is in fact an escrow account, and the funds are not the property of the taxpayer. The insurer may then seek to set aside the levy based on the defenses discussed below.

A person holding a prior claim to property on which the Service has levied may make written request for the return of the property.[368] To have a levy set aside, first, demand should be made on the IRS District Director for return of the property. The request is to be addressed to the District Director for the District in which the levy was made, to the attention of the Chief, Special Procedures Staff. The request is to contain:

1. The name and address of the person submitting the request,

2. A detailed description of the property levied on,

3. A description of the claimant's basis for claiming an interest in the property, and

4. The name and address of the taxpayer, the originating IRS district, and the date of lien or levy as shown on the Notice (Form 668), Notice of Levy (Form 668-A), or Levy (Form 668-B) or, in lieu thereof, a statement of the reasons why such information cannot be furnished.[369]

The District Director has 30 days from receipt to ask for more specific information. If no such request is made, the information provided is deemed sufficient. If a request for further information is made, the party has 30 days from receipt of the IRS request in which to provide same.

If the Director refuses, the party in interest must bring an action for wrongful levy. Note that the time restrictions are both tight and inflexible. The demand extends the time for filing a wrongful levy action. A wrongful levy action must ordinarily be brought within 9 months of the date of levy.[370] However, a demand for return of property extends the time for filing an action to 12 months from the date of filing the request, or 6 months from the date of mailing by the Director of a notice of disallowance of the request, whichever is shorter.[371]

The District Director is obliged to return property that has been shown to have been levied on wrongfully. A request for return of the property extends the time period for filing an action for wrongful levy, as stated above. However, mere settlement discussions with the IRS do not extend the time period. The party claiming an interest in the property must bring the wrongful levy action within the time period, or it loses that right.

The District Director also has practical authority to release property when it appears that the Service's expenses of sale will be greater than the IRS's interest in the property.[372] This authority should be exercised when the Service's interest in the property is small, the legal situation is novel, or there are very large liens ahead of the IRS which the Service would be required to pay off after taking title.

A letter from an IRS agreeing to release property is a contract. However, the IRS challenged its obligations under one such contract with a variety of defenses, including lack of authority of the officer to bind the service, misrepresentation to the service as to the value of the property, and mistake. The Court of Federal Claims refused to grant the taxpayer equitable relief such as an order of specific performance. Based mostly on the allegations by the IRS that the taxpayer had lied to the Service, the court held that the taxpayer had the "heavy burden" of proving that the IRS could not renege on a release agreement.[373]

A party claiming priority over a tax lien must bring a wrongful levy action in U.S. District Court.[374] As stated above, suit must ordinarily be brought within 9 months of the date of levy.[375] A demand for return of property extends the time for filing an action to 12 months from the date of filing the request, or 6 months from the date of mailing by the Director of a notice of disallowance of the request, whichever is shorter.[376] A party must have strong equitable considerations to overcome this statute of limitations.[377]

The sole issue in the suit is whether or not the levy was wrongful. The validity of the assessment itself may not be disputed.[378] The burden of proof is on the plaintiff to prove an interest in the property superior to the lien, or that the lien does not attach.[379] The remedy for a prevailing plaintiff is the return of the property.[380]

Only a person "who claims an interest in or lien on" the property may file a wrongful levy action.[381] The wrongful levy action permitted under the Federal Tax Lien Act of 1966 is an exception to sovereign immunity. The law is strictly enforced in limiting the class of people who may bring such an action. A title agent that missed a lien because it was filed under an alias was not entitled to bring a wrongful levy action.[382] The title agent also had no standing to sue under the federal declaratory judgment action law or Administrative Procedures Act. Therefore, it had no forum in which to argue that the government had been unjustly enriched by levying on and reselling property based on a lien that provided no constructive notice.

3.4.7.1.3 Interest Existing Before Attachment Of Lien

If a purchaser's interest in the property comes into existence and becomes protected under state law before the tax lien attaches, the purchaser takes free of the tax lien.[383] The purchaser's interest must be created before the lien attaches. The purchaser must pay "adequate and full" consideration in "money or money's worth." Finally, the purchaser's interest must be valid under local law against subsequent purchasers without actual knowledge.[384]

The purchaser's interest is established by proof that a deed was executed, delivered and recorded. A purchaser may be found to have obtained priority over a federal tax lien when the deed is delivered before the tax lien is properly filed, and the purchaser's actual knowledge of an unfiled lien does not give the lien priority over the insured's interest.[385] Other decisions hold that if the conveyance is recorded after the tax lien is filed, the lien ordinarily takes priority even if the purchaser had no actual knowledge of it.[386] Also, a federal tax lien attaches to property conveyed by the taxpayer before the filing of the tax lien, when the conveyance is a sham intended to evade creditors.[387] A lessee's interest has been found to be perfected as of the date it takes possession, even if that date is prior to the recording of the lease.[388] A federal tax lien was found superior to a prior mortgage that was mistakenly satisfied.[389] However, when a federal tax lien was properly filed a lien but the county clerk failed to post it to the records, one court held that the purchaser was bound by the lien even though it was not discoverable.[390] See §3.4.7.6 for a full discussion of the effect on constructive notice of improper indexing.

A buyer of the fee simple estate may also qualify as a "purchaser," under certain circumstances, even before it has obtained a deed. The Code specifically states that an interest in property shall include a "written executory contract to purchase or lease property."[391]

The IRS thus consents to the exercise of the doctrine of equitable conversion, which is law in some states.[392] Under this doctrine, after the purchase agreement is signed, the seller's interest "is in

No notice of change of name was recorded with the Recorder of Deeds. The mortgage was then assigned by Bank One, Rockford to Bank One Mortgage Corporation; the assignment did not mention the First National Bank name. Then the mortgage was mistakenly satisfied by Bank One Mortgage as attorney-in-fact for First National Bank n/k/a Bank One, Rockford. A federal tax lien and judgment were then filed against the borrower, who later filed bankruptcy. When the relative priorities of the mortgage and tax lien were contested in bankruptcy court, the lender attempted to use the mortgage chain of title to its advantage, arguing that the mistaken satisfaction was signed by the assignor only, and therefore invalid. The court rejected this argument, however, and instead used the gap in the chain of assignment against the lender. It held that the federal tax lien had priority over the claimed interest of Bank One Mortgage, because the mortgage assignment was a "wild" instrument and not notice by which a subsequent creditor is bound. Therefore, under IRS rules, the lender did not have a valid security interest which could take priority against the later tax lien.

[392] See Niagara County Savings Bank v. Reese, 179 N.Y.S.2d 453 (1958). A variant is to consider the date of conversion to be the date on which the purchaser's obligation to buy becomes unconditional (i.e., when all contingencies have been removed). See Mueller v. Novelty Dye Works, 273 Wis. 501, 78 N.W.2d 881 (1956); Carefree Homes, Inc. v. Production Credit Ass'n of Madison, 81 Wis.2d 541 (1978). In *State Farm Gen'l Ins. Co. v. The conversion takes place at the time of entering into the contract. It stems from the basic equitable principle that equity regards as done that which ought to be done. The doctrine of equitable conversion has been recognized in Illinois, as it has in practically every other jurisdiction since earliest times." [quoting Shay v. Penrose, 25 Ill.2d 447, 449, 185 N.E.2d 218, 219-20 (1962)]. On property closed through an escrow, title passes when the conditions to the escrow have been met. Prochaska v. Midwest Title Guar. Co. of Florida, 932 P.2d 172 (Wash.App. 1997). In a case involving a judgment which became a lien after delivery of the deed but before recording, a New Jersey court allowed the judgment creditor to assert its lien despite a prior transfer of title. Lieberman v. Arzee Mid-State Supply Corp., 306 N.J.Super. 335, 703 A.2d 936 (N.J.Super.A.D. 1997). In Lieberman, however, the grantor conveyed to his brother one week before the judgment was docketed. The judgment creditor filed suit to enjoin a further sale of the property, and the title insurer took a secured indemnity to protect against the judgment. These facts appear to have influenced the court, which held that "had [the purchasers] or others acting on their behalf, including their title insurer, 'made reasonable and diligent inquiry' as required, they need not have closed without seeing to the satisfaction of Arzee's judgment." the purchase money, and he has a lien on the land as security for any unpaid balance of such money."[393] The fact that the insured purchaser has paid only part of the consideration for the property at the time the lien is filed does not make the insured's interest subordinate to the tax lien.[394]

If the insurer can show equitable conversion, it must also prove that the "purchaser" would have priority over any subsequent purchaser of the land. Again, this may be established if the purchaser comes into possession of the property.[395] Several cases are illustrative of the application of equitable conversion to federal tax liens. In Niagara County Savings Bank v. Reese,[396] a New York court held that a purchaser whose agreement was signed before the lien but whose deed came later had priority over the tax lien. The court first stated that New York follows the equitable conversion doctrine, giving the purchaser title as of the contract date. The court then held that the purchaser's interest was superior though unrecorded because he was in possession.

It is often stated that equitable conversion does not take place until a purchase agreement is unconditional. Thus, it may be necessary to establish that all contingencies under the agreement had been met or waived before the lien was recorded.[397]

In Newnham v. United States,[398] a purchaser who cancelled the sale after signing the purchase agreement was held to be a "purchaser." The court held that the purchaser "had an interest in the property by virtue of her written executory contract to purchase it."[399] In Sodorff v. United States,[400] a purchaser signed a purchase agreement to buy the taxpayer's property. A tax lien was recorded after the agreement but before either the full purchase price was paid or the deed was recorded. The purchaser's right was held to be superior to the Service's lien. In some cases, the key element is proof of possession. In United States v. V & E Engineering & Const. Co., Inc.,[401] the "purchaser" was not in possession. It therefore lost priority to the IRS lien.[402]

3.4.7.1.4 Lien Limited To Net Proceeds Of Sale

In some cases, the tax lien attaches to the insured property, but the amount due the IRS is more than the seller received at closing. In such a case, the extent of the lien against the real estate is limited to the seller/taxpayer's net proceeds of sale.[403] On proof of the net proceeds, and that the sale was an arm's length sale for value, the Service should provide a release.[404] The lien is not so limited if the sale price does not reflect fair market value.[405]

Several courts have refused to limit the IRS lien to the amount of the taxpayer's sale proceeds, however. For example, in Han v. United States,[406] the Ninth Circuit ruled:

> A tax lien "shall continue until the liability for the amount so assessed ... is satisfied or becomes unenforceable by reason of lapse of time." 26 U.S.C. § 6322 (1988). The IRS is authorized to seize liened property even if it has been sold to a third party. 26 D.F.R. 301.6331-1 (1990). Nowhere in the statutory or regulatory scheme is there a provision limiting the IRS's recovery. A lien continues unabated regardless of sale, so long as it is properly recorded. Because the lien is unaffected by sale, we see no basis for fixing the amount of the lien at the time of sale. We decline to legislate where Congress has failed to do so.[407]

[403] A similar case involving a judgment is First American Title Ins. Co. v. Casper, 157 Cal.Rptr. 798 (Cal.App. 2 Dist. 1979) (unpublished). A seller had entered into an accord and satisfaction with a judgment creditor, under which he still owed $4,650. The judgment lien was still on file in the original amount of $50,045, and there was no public evidence of the accord and satisfaction. The insurer missed the judgment. At closing, the seller cleared $13,242.63. The creditor first agreed to settle with the insurer for $16,104.63, but then retracted and demanded the full judgment amount. The court pointed out that, had the lien been discovered, the creditor would have received only $4,650. The court affirmed judgment in that amount. In Lang v. Klinger, 34 Cal.App.3d 987, 110 Cal.Rptr. 532 (Cal.App. 1 Dist. 1973), however, a judgment creditor was found not to be required to accept payment of the net proceeds of sale. The court reasoned that "the value of the property is not established as against the creditors as that price at which the Klingers chose to sell. An execution sale, to which appellants were entitled, might have produced a larger sum." This ruling is probably dictum, since the court found it unnecessary to address the argument because it had not been properly raised on appeal. The court's reasoning also seems contrary to common wisdom, since an arm's-length sale ordinarily nets more, not less, than a distressed sale such as at execution. See also United States v. Baran, 996 F.2d 25 (2nd Cir. 1993). In that case, the lien attached to a life estate. The court noted that "the tax lien is not on the entire property, but only on the life estate. Indeed, the tax lien is for more than $260,000, but may be satisfied out of the proceeds of sale only to that extent because that is the value of the life estate."

The Han court cited as precedent Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. United States,[408] in which the IRS recovered more on its lien after foreclosure by a lender than it would have received had the taxpayer sold the property. In Han, however, the court permitted the purchasers to assert equitable subrogation to the position of the taxpayer's mortgage lender paid off with the purchase funds. The court found that, by imposition of equitable subrogation, "[t]he IRS will not suffer any injustice ... , since it will recoup as much as if [the taxpayer] had still owned the property."[409] See §3.4.7.3 for a full discussion of equitable subrogation.

When the insurer has missed a lien, however, it can have a difficult time putting itself in a position to make the above argument to the IRS. In Universal Title Ins. Co. v. U.S.,[410] the insurer sought to limit a $31,000 lien to the $12,865.01 that the seller-taxpayer had collected as net proceeds at the sale. The IRS refused an outright offer of that amount, and convinced the insurer to put up the full value of the real estate in an escrow account in exchange for a release of the property from the lien. The parties then litigated the amount owed the IRS.

The court found that the insurer's only standing in the matter was as subrogee of the insured purchaser or the paid-off prior lienholders. The court went on to find, however, that the insurer had no right of subrogation, because it had not yet made its insured whole; that it had no right of equitable (legal) subrogation, because it had a special duty as a title searcher which it had breached; and that the government would not be unjustly enriched by receiving more than the net proceeds of sale. On the last point, the court said this:

> Universal's argument [about unjust enrichment] begs the question. Universal erroneously assumes that the conclusion to its argument is true--that is, that the IRS is limited to recovering $12,865.01, the seller's net proceeds, because of the IRS's past practice of releasing tax liens upon receipt of the seller's net proceeds. We also reject Universal's contention that denying it the right of subrogation will result in a windfall to the government. On the contrary, the government will simply receive that [sic] which it is entitled--full payment of the federal tax lien. The IRS properly recorded its tax lien, and the government is legally entitled to be paid the full amount of that lien. The fact that the IRS has, in the past, gratuitously released liens in exchange for payment of less than the full amount of the lien is immaterial. The government has the discretion to decide whether to insist upon full payment of its lien or to accept a lesser amount.[411]

The Universal court incorrectly ignored the fact that the IRS lien attaches only to the taxpayer's interest in the property. The full measure of the taxpayer's interest in land is the amount of his or her equity. If the lien is for $1 million but the equity in a particular piece of land is $1,000, the lien as to that land is only $1,000. The IRS would obtain only that amount if it conducted a distraint sale. Therefore, the IRS must release the property (not satisfy the lien) on payment of the equity. The Universal court carelessly mischaracterizes the IRS "practice" of issuing releases as being gratuitous. Contrary to the court's statement, the IRS may not refuse to release real estate from a lien if it is paid the full amount of the taxpayer's interest in that land.

Universal illustrates that an insurance company has a difficult time persuading a court that the government has overstepped its bounds, when the controversy would not have existed but for the insurer's mistake. An insurer would be well advised not to enter into the kind of escrow arrangement suggested by the IRS in the Universal case. See §5.6 for further discussion of the Universal decision in regard to subrogation.

3.4.7.1.5 Subrogation Rights Against Taxpayer

When an insurer pays the tax debt of a seller or other party in order to obtain a satisfaction or release of the insured property, it will often wish to pursue the taxpayer for reimbursement. Such subrogation is "equitable" rather than "conventional." See §5.6 for a discussion of the difference between the two forms of subrogation. In short, conventional subrogation is the contractual right of an insurer to stand in the insured's shoes. Equitable subrogation permits one who has paid another's debt for the benefit of an innocent party to recover from the debtor.

The tax code acknowledges subrogation rights by stating that a lienholder junior to the IRS may gain priority over the Service by paying off a senior lienholder.[412] However, the Internal Revenue Service is often unwilling to recognize or cooperate with subrogation of its claim against a taxpayer. It sometimes takes the position that any payment of a tax debt by a party other than the taxpayer is made as a volunteer. This position has been accepted in some decisions.[413] See §3.4.7.3 below, discussing this defense to federal tax liens.

Thus, before paying off a federal tax lien on the insured's behalf, the insurer will want to negotiate for an assignment of rights by the Service to the insurer. If that is not possible, the insurer will want to seek an agreement that the Service will turn over at time of payment all information in its files regarding the present whereabouts of the taxpayer and the status of the debt, and that someone from the Service will testify if necessary to establish payment of the tax debt. In most jurisdictions, an insurer which pays the IRS on behalf of an insured lender may pursue the mortgagor in the name of the lender. The tax debt becomes a valid obligation of the mortgagor secured by the mortgage.[414]

[412] 26 U.S.C. 6323(i)(2) states: "Where, under local law, one person is subrogated to the rights of another with respect to a lien or interest, such person shall be subrogated to such rights for purposes of any lien imposed by section 6321 or 6324." See US Life Title Ins. Co. of Dallas v. Romero, 652 P.2d 249 (N.M.App. 1982), discussing this section of the Code.

[413] See Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. Eynard, 84 Misc.2d 605, 377 N.Y.S.2d 895 (1975) and Coy v. Raabe, 69 Wash.2d 346, 418 P.2d 728 (1966). Also see §5.8.3 generally for a discussion of the volunteer defense.

[414] See U.S. Life Title Ins. Co. v. Romero, 98 N.M. 699, 652 P.2d 249 (App. 1982), in which the court stated: "There is a rather large body of case law that allows a mortgagee to subrogate to the rights of tax liens paid by the mortgagee to protect its mortgage. See Annot., 61 A.L.R. 587, 601-607 (1929); Annot., 106 A.L.R. 1212, 1217-1224 (1937); 73

When the taxpayer is the seller, the insurer may also assert the insured's rights under deed covenants. See §5.9 regarding subrogation rights against sellers. The insurer may pursue both sets of rights, make an election, or pursue only the warranty claim if necessary. The insurer should carefully evaluate the defenses to either claim before making such an election, because recovery may be allowed under one set of rights and denied under the other.

The seller may raise several defenses to recoupment by an insurer as subrogee of either the insured or the IRS.[415] If the insurer proceeds as subrogee of the IRS, its claim is based entirely on equitable subrogation. The seller may raise the insurer's failure to report the tax lien as a defense to recovery. This defense leads to a windfall and should not prevail. However, one court denied recovery based on this defense.[416]

The seller may also raise the volunteer defense, either in response to a claim under the IRS's rights or a claim based on the deed covenants. The volunteer defense may prevail if the IRS has not provided the documentation suggested above to assign its claim to the insurer. The volunteer defense is not an automatic defense to subrogation on the insured-purchaser's warranty claim.[417] Nonetheless, when the seller did not warrant title, a "volunteer" insurer was left with no rights against the seller.[418]

3.4.7.1.6 Release Or Subordination Of Federal Tax Lien

The insurer may seek a release of a federal tax lien from the insured parcel, under 26 U.S.C. 6325, on payment of less than the full amount of the tax debt. Under Section 6325(b)(1), the Service is authorized to issue a certificate of release of a particular parcel of real estate if:

> ... the Secretary finds that the fair market value of that part of such property remaining subject to the lien is at least double the amount of the unsatisfied liability secured by such lien and the amount of all other liens upon such property which have priority over such lien.

Am.Jur.2d Subrogation §§ 66, 122 (1974), and cases cited therein." Internal Revenue Code, 26 U.S.C. 6321 states: "If any person liable to pay any tax neglects or refuses to pay the same after demand, the amount (including any interest, additional amount, addition to tax, or assessable penalty, together with any costs that may accrue in addition thereto) shall be a lien in favor of the United States upon all property and rights to property, whether real or personal, belonging to such person."

[415] In United States v. Hall Family Trust Dated June 8, 2001, 2019 WL 1429572 (S.D.Cal. 2019) (unpublished), when the IRS pursued its tax lien against buyers from the taxpayer, who has since died, a California court later dismissed the title insurer's claim against one of his two heirs because she did not sign the purchase contract and had no privity with the buyers.

Under Section 6325(b)(2)(B), the Secretary is permitted to issue a release if "the interest of the United States in the part to be so discharged has no value." In turn, in determining the value of the interest of the United States in the property, the Secretary "shall give consideration to the value of such part and to such liens thereon as have priority over the lien of the United States."

Thus, the insurer or other party may ask the Service to release its lien from a parcel on proof that the federal tax lien is subordinate to other liens, so that the equity to which the federal lien attaches is nominal or non-existent. The Service may require payment of some amount of money if its lien attaches to some equity in the property. When there is no equity in the property to which the lien can attach, the Service is authorized to issue a certificate of non-attachment for that parcel, under Section 6325(e).

The Service may also be asked to subordinate its lien to another lien, under Section 6325(d), when "there is paid over to the Secretary an amount equal to the amount of the lien or interest to which the certificate subordinates the lien of the United States."

3.4.7.2 Purchase Money Mortgages

Some states recognize the doctrine, which comes from English common law, that a seller has an implied equitable lien for the balance of the unpaid purchase price. In modern times, the purchase money mortgage doctrine followed in some states is that a mortgage granted by a purchaser of real estate takes priority over other liens that attach to the property once the purchaser acquires title, including federal tax liens.[419] This rule may be used to establish the priority of an insured mortgage over other liens attaching to the property.[420]

3.4.7.3 Equitable Subrogation

When a new lender that pays off an existing senior lien, a junior lien moves up in priority and ahead of the new lien, based on recording order. The doctrine of equitable subrogation is an equitable remedy, the primary use of which is to reorder the lien priorities so that the junior lien remains so, and the new lien obtains the priority position of the lien it paid off. If this doctrine were not employed, the intervening lien holder would receive a gift by the fortuity of the refinance of the senior debt.

[419] See Joyce Palomar, Patton and Palomar on Land Titles, (3rd Ed.) § 568, for a more complete discussion of the purchase money mortgage doctrine.

[420] See, for example, Estate of Skvorak v. Security Union Title Ins. Co., 140 Idaho 16, 89 P.3d 856 (Idaho 2004), which concerned the relative priorities of two purchase money mortgages, one given to the seller and the other to an institutional lender. The institutional lender's mortgage was recorded first. The court refused to reorder priority established by the order of recording to favor the seller-mortgagees. It reversed the trial court order, which had adopted Restatement (Third) of Property (Mortgages) § 7.2, which provides: "(c) A purchase money mortgage given to a vendor of real estate, in the absence of a contrary intent of the parties to it and subject to the operation of the recording acts, has priority over a purchase money mortgage on that real estate given to a person who is not a vendor." Comment (d) of the Restatement says that, when purchase money mortgages are granted to both a vendor and a third party, "if both lenders have notice of the other's mortgage, the vendor's mortgage will be superior to its third party counterpart." The Supreme Court refused to adopt the Restatement position, saying "[u]nder Idaho's recording statutes a purchase money mortgage recorded first in time has priority over a subsequent vendor purchase money mortgage." 140 Idaho at 23; 89 P.3d at 863.

Equitable subrogation is also used to impose an equitable lien in place of a defective mortgage, to avoid unjust enrichment to the borrower whose debt was paid, and in certain other situations when an equitable lien will avoid a windfall and protect a valid interest in property. The doctrine may be used to cure or partially cure a number of issues, such as when a mortgage on homestead property is deemed void because it was not signed by both spouses, the mortgagor lacked capacity to sign the instrument, or the mortgage was forged or was given by a borrower whose deed was forged.

Most states employ the doctrine of equitable subrogation, although it is sometimes referred to as conventional subrogation (as in Illinois) or the doctrine of equitable mortgage. The doctrine has received significant scholarly comment in recent years.[421] See the state-by-state summary of the cases applying the doctrine at the end of this section.

A common formulation of the doctrine of equitable subrogation is stated this way:

> Equitable subrogation is generally appropriate where (1) the subrogee made the payment to protect his or her own interest, (2) the subrogee did not act as a volunteer, (3) the subrogee was not primarily liable for the debt paid, (4) the subrogee paid off the entire encumbrance, and (5) subrogation would not work any injustice to the rights of the junior lienholder. ... Equitable subrogation is a broad equitable remedy, and therefore it applies not only when these five factors are met, but also "whenever 'one person, not acting as a mere volunteer or intruder, pays a debt for which another is primarily liable, and which in equity and good conscience should have been discharged by the latter.'"[422]

Under the doctrine of equitable subrogation, when a new lender pays off a lienholder having priority over the intervening lien, it steps into the senior lienholder's shoes to the amount of the paid-off debt.[423] The doctrine has also been applied when the debt paid by the new lender was something

[421] Numerous cases involving mortgages and equitable subrogation are recited in Carol Vento, J.P., Annotation, Discharge of Mortgage and Taking Back of New Mortgage As Affecting Lien Intervening Between Old and New Mortgages, 43 A.L.R. 5th 519 (1996). The use of the doctrine by title insurers is discussed in Cox and Johnson, State Equity Doctrine Helps Title Insurers, National Law Journal February 7, 2000, p. B17. See also John C. [423] In the federal tax code, the federal government consents to the subordination of its tax liens, as discussed below in this section. The IRS Regulation on the application of equitable subrogation to a federal tax lien (§301.6323(i)-1(b)) elaborates that "[t]hus, if a tax lien imposed by section 6321 or 6324 is not valid with respect to a particular interest as against the holder of that interest, then the tax lien also is not valid with respect to that interest as against any person who, under local law, is a successor in interest to the holder of that interest." That regulation gives an example in which a

other than a consensual loan, such as real estate taxes or an income tax lien, as is further discussed below, this section. The purchaser or lender may, in some circumstances, be equitably subrogated to the full amount of the prior lien even if the new lender pays less than the balance of the debt.[424]

The subrogated party is entitled to receive interest on the subrogated amount at the rate which accrued on the loan which was paid off.[425]

The reordering of the priority of two competing liens is not the sole way in which the doctrine is employed.[426] Equitable subrogation may also be used to impose an equitable lien to replace a defective or unenforceable lien, or a mortgage that was not recorded.[427] The doctrine may first mortgagee (C) has priority over a tax lien and a second mortgagee (B) does not. The first mortgage is foreclosed. B "pays the amount of the principal and interest in default to C in order to protect the second mortgage against the pending foreclosure of C's senior mortgage. Under local law, B is subrogated to C's rights to the extent of the payment to C. Therefore, the tax lien is invalid against B to the extent he became subrogated to C's rights even though the tax lien is valid against B's second mortgage on the property." Equitable subrogation was used to subordinate a federal tax lien in, for example, In re Allen, 32 B.R. 93 (1983); Pipola v. Chicco, 274 F.2d 909 (2nd Cir. 1960); Little v. United States, 40 AFTR2d 77-5703 (1977); Mort v. United States, 86 F.3d 890 (9th Cir. 1996); and First American Title Ins. Co. v. United States, 848 F.2d 969 (9th Cir. 1988). In ContiMortgage Corp. v. United States, 109 F.Supp.2d 1038 (D.C.Minn. 2000), a lender was found equitably subrogated to the lien priority of mechanic's liens paid at closing. The court also held that the assignee of the loan could assert the equitable subrogation argument standing in the shoes of the original lender.

[426] Section 7.6 of the Restatement (Third) of Property: Mortgages explains that equitable subrogation may apply in four different types of situations to impose an equitable lien. Thus, while the doctrine is used most commonly to reorder the priority of two liens, that is not its exclusive purpose. See the decisions reported below, this section, in the state-by-state review of the doctrine.

The Internal Revenue Code recognizes rights by subrogation against a federal tax lien.[431] Section 6323(i)(2) of the Code states:

> Where, under local law, one person is subrogated to the rights of another with respect to a lien or interest, such person shall be subrogated to such rights for purposes of any lien imposed by section 6321 or 6324.[432]

Section 6321 has to do with income tax liens; Section 6324 applies to estate and gift tax liens. A private party may also assert equitable subrogation against the federal government to subordinate the priority of a mortgage made or held by an arm of the federal government, although that waiver of sovereign immunity was not granted by Section 6323 of the tax code.[433]

Courts frequently recite that the priority of two mortgages will not be reordered by use of equitable subrogation when the remedy would work an injustice on the junior lien holder. In order not to cause a change in position to the junior lender, the subrogated party may claim a prior lien only in the amount of the debt secured by the lien that was paid off, plus interest at the paid-off lender's rate. By so limiting the remedy, the intervening lien holder "will be in the same position it was in at the time the [intervening] lien was filed," whereas if equitable subrogation were denied, the intervening lien holder would "receive a windfall, moving up to a better position that it originally had."[434]

(relative who lent money secured by deed of trust who did not know funds were used to pay off prior liens was not entitled to equitable subrogation to those liens to beat federal tax lien); LaSalle Bank N.A. v. Vogtman, 2010 WL 1981831 (Wash.App. Div. 1) (unpublished) (equitable subrogation not employed to place lien on half interest of tenant in common who did not sign deed of trust because larger loan amount would prejudice that owner); Gaub v. Simpson, 866 P.2d 765 (Wyo. 1993) (person who paid taxes to protect his property interest entitled to subrogation).

[431] This section of the Code applies only to an insured stepping into the shoes of another private party versus the government. It is not intended to establish a right to be subrogated to the Service on payment of a tax lien. To the contrary, when an insurer or insured pays off the IRS, the Service often treats the party as a volunteer. For a discussion of the insurer's right to stand in the IRS's shoes as the Service's subrogee, see §3.4.7.9.

[432] 26 U.S.C. §6323(I)(2). This section was found applicable to equitable subrogation by a lender to a prior lienholder's position, in Mort v. United States, 86 F.3d 890 (9th Cir. 1996).

[433] In Boresek v. United States Dep't of Agriculture, 2014 WL 4792587 (D.Or.) (unpublished), the court addressed what it believed to be "a matter of first impression in any court, state or federal." The question was whether or not the United States has waived sovereign immunity to permit a private party to assert priority by equitable subrogation over a mortgage held by the federal government. The court noted that many cases have found a waiver of sovereign immunity as to federal tax liens under 26 U.S.C. § 6323(i), because that provision specifically states that the subrogation doctrine may be asserted against such liens. However, in Boresek, the private party mortgage holder sued the Department of Agriculture, the holder of a mortgage, to reverse priorities. It sued under 28 U.S.C. § 2410(a)(1), which states that "the United States may be named a party in any civil action or suit in any district court, or in any State court having jurisdiction of the subject matter … to quiet title to ... real or personal property on which the United States has or claims a mortgage or other lien." No court had ever held that the quiet title law waived sovereign immunity to challenge a lien priority, but no case had ever held the opposite either. The court walked through the legislative history of the law and a long line of federal decisions to conclude that Congress intended to waive sovereign immunity.

[434] Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. United States, 907 F.2d 868, 895 (9th Cir. 1990).

There are a number of limitations on the doctrine that have been imposed by certain states. See the state-by-state review of the cases at the end of this section for a complete analysis of each jurisdiction. For example, some states find reasons to label a lender as a volunteer, which can bar the right to employ the remedy. Other jurisdictions follow the rule that a lender is not a volunteer if the lender intended to receive a first lien, or paid the debt by an agreement, which may be implied or inferred by the payoff of the prior lender.[435] Some courts will not employ the doctrine if the lender had actual knowledge of the intervening lien at the time it made the new loan.[436] However, the lender's knowledge of an intervening lien does not alter the windfall effect to that lien holder if it moves up in priority solely by the fortuity of a new loan that pays off the senior lien. Thus, a number of states have adopted the view that actual knowledge is not a bar, as has the Restatement (Third) of Property: Mortgages §7.6.[437] One court observed that "other jurisdictions have increasingly recognized the flaws in the actual knowledge prohibition, and although actual knowledge bars subrogation in the majority of jurisdictions, this dominant position is being rapidly eroded."[438]

Some states, notably Kentucky and Michigan, generally prohibit employment of equitable subrogation to aid a sophisticated commercial lender. Similarly, some states preclude the use of equitable subrogation when, in the court's determination, the new lender's title insurer has been negligent in performing its title search.[439] Other jurisdictions deny equitable subrogation on the closely-related grounds that the intervening lien imparts constructive notice, and recording priorities set by a race-notice statute cannot be overturned in aid of equity.[440] These positions completely misapprehend the doctrine, however. Equitable subrogation exists solely in order to reverse lien priority, in order to avoid unjust enrichment to the intervening lien holder that moves up in priority when a prior lien is paid off.

Some courts have considered as a factor that the lender seeking equitable subrogation has the benefit of a title insurance policy, as a reason why the doctrine need not be employed.[441] Other courts have rejected insurance as a factor, recognizing that equitable subrogation exists to prevent unjust enrichment, and insurance favoring one party does not negate the fact of a windfall to the other party. In Mort v. United States,[442] the IRS argued that the lender could not even assert the doctrine until it had first pursued its "legal remedies against the title insurer." The trial court agreed, but the Ninth Circuit reversed, holding flatly that "[t]he district court offered no authority in support of its decision not to exercise equity jurisdiction in this case, and we are unable to find any." The court acknowledged that equitable remedies may not be pursued until legal remedies against the same party are exhausted. However, since the lender had no legal remedy against the IRS, there was no bar to equitable relief. The court also rejected the claim by the IRS that the title insurer would be unjustly enriched if equitable subrogation were employed, and that the real party in interest in the case was the title insurer. The Mort rationale was adopted in ContiMortgage Corp. v. United 459007 (Tenn.App.) (unpublished) (equitable subrogation granted prematurely because valid defenses might exist of actual knowledge or negligent title search); Alegis Group L.P. v. Lerner, 2004 WL 2647607, 2004-Ohio-6205 (Ohio App. 5 Dist. 2004) (unpublished) (equitable subrogation denied because lender was negligent in not discovering recorded intervening lien).

[440] See for example, Ripley v. Piehl, 700 N.W.2d 540 (Minn.App. 2005), rev.den. (Oct. 18, 2005) (equitable subrogation not permitted as to lien filed in recording gap because that lien imparts constructive notice); S.A. Harms v. Burt, 40 P.3d 329 (Kan. 2002) (constructive notice of intervening lien precludes equitable subrogation); Green Tree Credit LLC v. Hopkins, 9 Misc.3d 1122(A), 2005 WL 2782579 (N.Y.Sup.), 2005 N.Y. Slip Op. 51729(U) (unpublished) (equitable subrogation denied because intervening lien was recorded and thus imparted constructive notice).

[441] In Community Trust Bank of Mississippi v. First Nat'l Bank of Clarksdale, 150 So.3d 683 (Miss. 2014), the Mississippi Supreme Court gave many reasons for not applying the doctrine, including that the refinancing lender had title insurance, that the search negligence that caused it not to know about the existing junior lien should be imputed to it as negligence, that the lender had constructive notice of the junior lien, and that the amount of the refinancing lender's debt had been paid down before the priority dispute erupted (which somehow prejudiced the junior lender). The court said: "Other courts have found that the principles of equity required consideration of the negligence of a title insurance company which bungled the transaction in the first place. After all, '[e]ither they insure or they don't. It is not the province of the court to relieve a title insurance company of its contractual obligation.' Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. Capp, 174 Ind.App. 633, 369 N.E.2d 672, 674 (1977)." However, Capp involved policy subrogation rights, not equitable subrogation. Further, Indiana has codified the equitable subrogation doctrine by statute, and the law specifically states that insurer negligence is not a defense to the use of the doctrine. See the discussion of the Indiana statute in the state-by-state review at the end of this section. The title insurance argument was rejected in a lengthy and scholarly opinion in Bank of America, N.A. v. Diamond Financial, LLC, 88 Mass.App.Ct. 564, 42 N.E.3d 1151 (Mass.App. 2015), in which the court noted that the purpose of the doctrine is to prevent a windfall to a junior lender.

States,[443] in which a lender paid off a mortgage and several construction liens in a refinance loan. A federal tax lien was filed in the recording gap just before closing. The borrower told the loan broker that he was negotiating with the IRS on some taxes. After foreclosure, the lender brought a quiet title action under 28 U.S.C. § 2410(a)(1) against the IRS to claim priority by equitable subrogation. The court rejected the argument by the IRS that the insurer was the real party in interest, and was not entitled to reorder priorities under equitable subrogation. However, in First Federal Savings Bank of Wabash v. United States,[444] also involving a lender's claim of equitable subrogation as to a federal tax lien, the Seventh Circuit accepted the government's argument that "the title insurer, and not First Federal, is the real party in interest here." The court held that a bank, "as a sophisticated lender with no use for the mortgage property other than as collateral, ... was able to obtain title insurance to contract against the risk of errors such as the one that occurred here." Thus, the court denied equitable subrogation because it viewed the case as merely "an attempt by the insurer to shift some of its expected payout cost to the public fisc."

The following is a state-by-state review of the cases that have considered the equitable subrogation doctrine.

Indiana

Indiana adopted a statute providing that equitable subrogation may not be denied a lender because of constructive notice of the intervening lien or the fact that the lender obtained a title insurance policy. Ind.Code § 32-29-1-11 was added by Pub.L. No. 2-2002, § 14 (eff. July 1, 2002), amended by Pub.L. No. 122-2003, § 1 (eff. July 1, 2003), Pub.L. No. 151-2003, § 2 (eff. July 1, 2003) and Pub.L. No. 2-2005, § 86. The current leading case is Bank of New York v. Nally, 820 N.E.2d 644, 651 (Ind. 2005), which permitted equitable subrogation despite notice of the intervening lien, finding the lender not guilty of "culpable negligence" due to its failure to discover the intervening recorded lien. Nally adopted the Restatement position. The statute overturned, and Nally distinguished, Osterman v. Baber, 714 N.E.2d 735 (Ind.App. 1999), which denied the use of equitable subrogation because the lender failed to update title before closing, and was thus "culpably negligent," and Wilshire Servicing Corp. v. Timber Ridge Partnership, 743 N.E.2d 1173 (Ind.App. 2001), reh.den. (equitable subrogation denied on assumption that lender's title insurer made mistake, relying on Osterman). See also Liberty Mortgage Corp., Inc. v. National City Bank, 755 N.E.2d 639 (Ind.App. 2001) (lender that paid off the borrower's equity loan but did not close account not entitled to equitable subrogation); Gibson v. Neu, 867 N.E.2d 188 (Ind.App. 2007) (doctrine may not be denied just because the person has title insurance, and extended doctrine to use by purchasers); Neu v. Gibson, 928 N.E.2d 556 (Ind. 2010) (although purchasers stand in shoes of paid-off lender to claim priority over junior lien from seller, they do not have power foreclose and cannot extinguish junior mortgage; options are either to sell property and pay off lien or have title insurer pay off junior lien); JP Morgan Chase Bank v. Howell, 876 N.E.2d 1171 (Table), 2007 WL 4126473 (Ind.App.) (unpublished) (doctrine used to give refinancing first lender priority over equity loan not quite paid off at closing); Bank of America, N.A. v. Ping, 879 N.E.2d 665 (Ind.App. 2008) (new lender's failure to tell revolving credit lender to close account was "culpable negligence" under Wilshire standard, barring use of doctrine); McIntyre Brothers, Inc. v. Henderson, 940 N.E.2d 862 (Table), 2010 WL 5536347 (Ind.App.) (unpublished) (lender entitled to priority over mechanic's lien; equitable subrogation statute is not read to deny remedy to lender who gets title insurance, as to mechanic's lien claimant); Finance Center Federal Credit Union v. Brand, 967 N.E.2d 1080 (Ind.App. 2012) (equitable subrogation used to give priority over revolving credit mortgage paid to zero at refinance closing); Lewallen Revocable Trust v. Fifth Third Mortgage Co., 2015 WL 3500462 (Ind.App. 2015) (unpublished) (doctrine used to impose equitable lien on half interest held by son of borrower, who claimed his signature was forged, because otherwise son would be unjustly enriched by lien-free title).

Rupe*, 225 Iowa 1044, 283 N.W. 108 (1938) (refinancing lender entitled to lien by subrogation against interest of wife when attorney title opinion did not note deed putting wife in title); Iowa State Bank & Trust Co. v. Michel, 683 N.W.2d 95 (Iowa 2004) (equitable mortgage not granted to cure lack of spouse's signature on homestead property); Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. v. Burt, 40 P.3d 329 (Kan. 2002) (constructive notice of intervening lien precludes equitable subrogation); National City Mortgage Co. v. Ross, 34 Kan.App.2d 282, 117 P.3d 880 (Kan.App. 2005) (equitable subrogation permitted to avoid unjust enrichment, though borrowers' title no good and rightful owners were still in possession, because owners' mortgages were paid off).

Central Bank of Jefferson County, Inc.*, 2008 WL 1991642 (Ky.App.) (unpublished) (equitable subrogation denied because of constructive notice of state tax warrants); Wells Fargo Bank, Minnesota, N.A. v. Community Trust Bank, Inc., 2011 WL 558655 (Ky.App.) (unpublished) (lender not entitled to subrogation because it was unaware of intervening lien due to "an error of the title examiner"); In re Hensley, 578 Fed.Appx. 530, 2014 WL 4251567 (6th Cir. (Ky.)) (unpublished) (lender barred by passage of time from seeking to impose lien on second parcel by equitable subrogation, although the debt it paid was secured by the parcel).

Mortgage Electronic Registration Systems, Inc.*, 295 Mich.App. 72, 813 N.W.2d 332 (Mich.App. 2011) (court cautiously adopted Restatement (Third) of Property: Mortgages § 7.3, which says that lender that replaces its own prior mortgage loan obtains priority over intervening lien in same way as equitable subrogation is applied when new lender refinances a debt; the Restatement labels this doctrine the replacement mortgage doctrine, and does not merge its discussion of the doctrine into the section of the Restatement covering equitable subrogation, which is found at §7.6); CitiMortgage, Inc., v. FMM Bushnell, LLC, 2014 WL 7338876 (Mich.App. 2014) (unpublished) (court reiterated mistaken position that lender may only obtain equitable subrogation if it refinances its own prior debt, under replacement mortgage doctrine, but reached correct conclusion that lender is not a bona fide encumbrancer entitled to benefit of race-notice recording law when it makes a loan with full knowledge of the competing lien; because both loans were made on the same day, priority question could only be settled by determining which loan closed first).

Mississippi

Ramoneda Bros. v. Loggins, 89 Miss. 225, 42 So. 669 (Miss. 1907) (doctrine not invoked and mortgage not revived when person who paid off loan was a volunteer and stranger to the parties, and true intent was to pay off the debt and not take an assignment of it); Prestridge v. Lazar, 132 Miss. 168, 95 So. 837 (Miss. 1923) (announcing the principles that the doctrine requires a "factual determination of each particular case with consideration of fairness and justice as its guiding principles," and that the doctrine "is one of equity and benevolence; its basis is the doing of complete, essential, and perfect justice between the parties, without regard to form, and its object is the prevention of injustice. It does not rest on contract, but upon principles of natural equity.") In Avakian v. Citibank N.A., 773 F.3d 647 (5th Cir. (Miss.) 2014), husband and wife signed separate deeds of trust for their homestead. The federal trial court held the deeds of trust were void because the spouses needed to sign the same instrument to create a valid lien on a homestead and refused to grant equitable subrogation on the theory that it has no authority to impose "equitable liens in cases where a statute declares that the lien is not valid or binding." It also held that the lender was barred from asserting equitable subrogation because it missed the general statute of limitations for subrogation claims. The Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals reversed and remanded in 2014 WL 6915192 (December 9, 2014), finding that the spouses had shown their joint intent and consent to grant a lien on the homestead; the court did not need to resort to equitable subrogation. In Community Trust Bank of Mississippi v. First Nat'l Bank of Clarksdale, 150 So.3d 683 (Miss. 2014), the Mississippi Supreme Court gave many reasons for not applying the doctrine, including that the refinancing lender had title insurance, that the search negligence that caused it not to know about the existing junior lien should be imputed to it as negligence, that the lender had constructive notice of the junior lien, and that the amount of the refinancing lender's debt had been paid down before the priority dispute erupted (which somehow prejudiced the junior lender). The court thus gutted the statement it quoted from Prestridge v. Lazar, 132 Miss. 168, 95 So. 837 (Miss. 1923), that the doctrine "is one of equity and benevolence; its basis is the doing of complete, essential, and perfect justice between the parties, without regard to form." About the existence of a title insurance policy, the court said: "Other courts have found that the principles of equity required consideration of the negligence of a title insurance company which bungled the transaction in the first place. After all, '[e]ither they insure or they don't. It is not the province of the court to relieve a title insurance company of its contractual obligation.' Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. Capp, 174 Ind.App. 633, 369 N.E.2d 672, 674

(1977)." The court did not acknowledge that Capp involved policy subrogation rights, not equitable subrogation, and that Indiana has codified the equitable subrogation doctrine by statute, which law specifically states that insurer negligence is not a defense to the use of the doctrine to avoid unjust enrichment. See also U.S. Bank, N.A. v. U.S. Small Business Administration, 2017 WL 3496217 (S.D.Miss.) Thompson v. Chase Manhattan Mortgage Corp., 90 S.W.3d 194 (Mo.App. S.D. 2002) reh.den. (Nov 20, 2002) (doctrine not applied because lender failed to discover intervening lien); Ethridge v. TierOne Bank, 226 S.W.3d 127 (Mo. 2007) ("drastic remedy" of equitable subrogation requires proof of fraud, not applied to cure deed of trust invalid on entireties property due to lack of spouse's signature); United States v. Tolin, 2015 WL 1456980, 115 A.F.T.R.2d 2015-1203 (E.D.Mo.) (unpublished) (court denied lender equitable subrogation versus a federal tax lien on mistaken notion that new loan was not "simultaneous" with payoff of old loan, based only on fact that old mortgage was released of record shortly before new mortgage was recorded; court did not compare closing date to date of old mortgage release; court appeared to apply tougher stance on doctrine because lender asserted priority over lien held by federal government).

Ameriquest Mortgage Co*., 155 N.H. 19 (2007) (equitable subrogation "is a broad doctrine, which is given liberal application," and it "applies where one who has discharged the debt of another may, under certain circumstances, succeed to the rights and position of the satisfied creditor."); In re Chase, 388 B.R. 462 (Bkcy.D.N.H. 2008) (lien by equitable subrogation is created by court order, and bankruptcy trustee avoided the lien granted based on equitable subrogation because court decision was not recorded in the real estate records); Bilden Properties, LLC v. Birin, 165 N.H. 253, 75 A.3d 1143 (N.H. 2013), (purchasers and their lender had inquiry notice of mortgage granted by seller although it recited wrong name for borrower, and took subject to lien; however, they were granted equitable lien in amount of senior mortgages paid off at closing, thus permitting missed lien holder to foreclose, but only after paying buyers amount of paid-off senior lien); Bank of America, N.A. v. Citizens Bank, 2015 DNH 233, 2015 WL 9305653 (D.N.H. 2015) (unpublished) (lender that paid off all of first mortgage loan and part of junior revolving credit loan entitled to subrogation over HELOC mortgage that was not released, predicting that New Hampshire will adopt Restatement position that actual knowledge does not bar use of remedy); Deutsche Bank Nat'l Trust Co. v. Pike, 916 F.3d 60 (1st Cir. (N.H.) 2019) (lender that failed to get wife to sign mortgage on homestead not entitled to equitable subrogation because it did not prove that wife got benefit from loan or participated in fraud on refinancing lender, because New Hampshire Supreme Court has held that equitable principles may limit homestead rights "only when there has been fraud, deception, or other misconduct in the procurement of funds spent on a homestead."); *Santander Bank, N.A. v. New Jersey Equity Sav. & Loan Ass'n v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 190 N.J.Super. 340, 463 A.2d 398 (App.Div. 1983) (subrogation by equitable assignment to put new lender in same priority position as paid-off mortgagee); Union Nat'l Bank v. Nelkin, 354 N.J.Super. 557, 808 A.2d 856 (N.J.Super.A.D. 2002) (doctrine not applied to subordinate revolving credit loan, full balance of which was not paid off); In re Day, 443 B.R. 338 (Bkcy.D.N.J. 2011) (bankruptcy trustee exercising strong-arm powers as putative bona fide purchaser for value beat unrecorded mortgage given by person who never took title, and equitable subrogation rejected). New Jersey took a step toward the Restatement position in Investors Savings Bank v. Keybank Nat'l Ass'n, 424 N.J.Super. 439, 38 A.3d 638 (App.Div. 2012). A later decision adopted at least part of the Restatement position. In Sovereign Bank v. Gillis, 432 N.J.Super. 36, 74 A.3d 1 (N.J.Super.A.D. 2013), the court granted equitable subrogation to a lender that paid off a first lien, as to an intervening equity loan lien, despite the lender's claimed actual knowledge of the intervening lien, in reliance on the Restatement and decisions from Washington and other states. However, it said that it was not required to resolve the "significant doctrinal and policy issues" raised by the Restatement position, because the case could be decided under § 7.3 of the Restatement, concerning replacement loans, rather than § 7.6, which addresses equitable subrogation for parties paying off loans made by others. Also see Reibman v. Myers, 451 N.J.Super. 32, 164 A.3d 1080 (N.J.Super. 2017) (lender that paid off loan that paid off loan secured by valid lien entitled to two-step equitable subrogation; court imposed equitable lien against rights of borrower's spouse and co-owner of property who received benefit from loan); Amboy Bank f/k/a Amboy National Bank v. David N. Findel, Monmouth County, New Jersey Superior Court Docket No. F-02500-10, decision issued February 17, 2017 (equitable subrogation used despite lender's actual knowledge of intervening lien based on Sovereign Bank v. Gillis, 432 N.J. Super. 36, 46 (N.J.A.D. 2013) that favored position of Restatement (Third) of Property-Mortgages §7.6(b)(4) that knowledge is irrelevant); Wilmington Savings Fund Society, FSB v. 61 Holdings, LLC, 2019 WL 3063740 (N.J.A.D.) (unpublished) (equitable subrogation used to give lender intended first position; lender had no actual knowledge of intervening lien, but actual knowledge is no longer a bar to doctrine in New Jersey).

Greenpoint Mortgage Corp.*, 304 A.D.2d 608, 758 N.Y.S.2d 367 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept. 2003) (lender not entitled to equitable subrogation because of unclean hands; loan was to bank officer, who forged wife's signature, causing mortgage to be invalid; assignee of mortgage took subject to equitable defenses); Green Tree Credit LLC v. Gil, 125 A.D.3d 559, 6 N.Y.S.3d 3, 2015 N.Y. Slip Op. 01590 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept. 2015) (equitable subrogation not used to grant equitable lien to lender that made loan to limited liability company to replace mortgage court had voided because not all of the LLC members had approved the loan, and not used to impose a lien on the interests of the LLC members who sought the loan and signed the mortgage, because court had mistaken impression that doctrine may be used only to reorder priorities rather than to impose an equitable lien when justice so requires; see Section 7.6 of the Restatement (Third) of Property: Mortgages, which explains that equitable subrogation may be used to impose a lien against the interest of the person who borrowed the money to replace an invalid lien); CitiMortgage, Inc. v Chouen, 63 N.Y.S.3d 443, 154 A.D.3d 914, 2017 N.Y. Phillips*, 65 N.Y.S.3d 147, 157 A.D.3d 1 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept. 2017) (lender entitled to equitable subrogation to replace mortgage given by people who got title by fraud because money lent by new lender was used to pay off valid debt of rightful owner); Filan v. Dellaria, 43 N.Y.S.3d 353, 144 A.D.3d 967, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 07922 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept. 2016) (refinance lender who paid off first lien entitled to equitable subrogation versus other liens not paid off because they were fraudulently satisfied; junior lenders not harmed by new lender's priority); First Franklin Financial Corp. v. Beniaminov, 42 N.Y.S.3d 46, 144 A.D.3d 975, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 07923 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept. 2016) (equitable subrogation could be used to impose lien to replace forged mortgage because loan money paid off prior valid mortgage debt; however, owner raised triable issue of fact in asserting that lender knew of forgery); Lombard v. Yacoob, 168 A.D.3d 919, 92 N.Y.S.3d 398, 2019 N.Y. Slip Op. 00427 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept. 2019) (when lender paid off a prior loan made by Berkshire, and Berkshire paid off earlier loan held by Ocwen, new lender entitled to stand in shoes of Ocwen in order to establish a valid lien despite the fact that new lender's borrower took title by a fraudulent deed); *Nationstar Mortgage LLC v. Washington

The Washington Supreme Court has adopted the rule of the Restatement (Third) of Property: Mortgages § 7.6 in full, in accordance with "the modern trend," in Columbia Community Bank v. Newman Park, LLC, 177 Wash.2d 566, 304 P.3d 472 (Wash. 2013). It overturned prior cases that used the volunteer rule as a bar to equitable subrogation, especially BNC Mortgage, Inc. v. Tax Pros, Inc., 111 Wash.App. 238, 46 P.3d 812 (Wash.App. 2002). That case held that a lender was not entitled to subrogation because it was a "volunteer" in making its loan because it "did not act under any ... duty or compulsion, but instead chose freely and voluntarily to avail itself of a business opportunity." The new decision expanded on the acceptance of the Restatement in Bank of America, NA v. Prestance Corp., 160 Wash.2d 560, 576, 160 P.3d 17 (2007), which adopted the Restatement in part. Prestance was followed in In re Greer, 2008 WL 2655805 (Wash.App. Div. 2) (unpublished). In Columbia Community Bank v. Newman Park, LLC, 177 Wash.2d 566, 304 P.3d 472 (Wash. 2013), the lender was tricked into making a loan based on fake authority documents for the borrower entity. The court relied on that portion of the Restatement rule that says subrogation is available when a lender is induced to pay off a debt by "misrepresentation, mistake, duress, undue influence, deceit, or other similar imposition." See also Worden v. Smith, 314 P.3d 1125 (Wash.App. Div. 3 2013) (equitable lien imposed in favor of junior lien holder who bid at sale and whose money was improperly applied to avoid unjust enrichment to party redeeming the foreclosed loan); Sygitowicz v. United States, 2007 WL 2496095 (W.D.Wash.) (unpublished) (relative who lent money secured by deed of trust who did not know funds were used to pay off prior liens not entitled to equitable subrogation to those liens to beat federal tax lien); and LaSalle Bank NA v. Vogtman, 2010 WL 1981831 (Wash.App. Div. 1) (unpublished) (equitable subrogation not employed to place lien on half interest of tenant in common who did not sign present deed of trust because higher loan amount would make use of doctrine unfair). In addition to the Tax Pros decision, Columbia Community Bank overturned other decisions that had barred equitable subrogation due to actual knowledge of intervening lien, including Kim v. Lee, 9 P.3d 245 (Wash.App.Div. 1 2000); Bank of America v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 126 Wash.App. 710, 109 P.3d 863 (Wash.App.Div. 1 2005); Kim v. Yakima County Title Co., 31 P.3d 665 (Wash. 2001) (denying remedy because of insurer's negligence and holding that "loss should fall on the title company rather than the innocent judgment creditor"); Flagstar Bank, FSB v. Eerkes, 2014 WL 4384063, 114 A.F.T.R.2d 2014-5893 (W.D.Wash.) (unpublished) (lender not entitled to equitable subrogation against federal tax lien because the paid off lender's lien had been released before tax lien was recorded; court said government had special status that needs protection because, "as an involuntary creditor, [it] had no choice as to whether Mr. and Mrs. Eerkes would become indebted to it or the mechanisms by which it could seek recovery: it took the steps necessary to seek full recovery for the public treasury."); America's Credit Union v. Countrywide Home Loans, Inc., 188 Wash.App. 1063, 2015 WL 4456181 (Wash.App. 2 Div. 2015) (unpublished) (equitable subrogation used to reverse lien priorities; court rejected argument that there was no need to reorder the liens because the property had sufficient value to secure both loans); Bel Air & Briney v. City of Kent, 358 P.3d 1249 (Wash.App. 1 Div. 2015) (land buyer who paid off first lien but did not learn of recorded junior lien until after close of escrow granted lien by equitable subrogation to have priority over junior lien, but buyer not permitted to foreclose and extinguish junior lien; court relied primarily on Section 7.6 of the Restatement (Third) of Property Mortgages in concluding that equitable subrogation aids a good faith buyer).

3.4.7.4 Defenses Based On Race-Notice Recording Laws

State recording statutes protect a purchaser or encumbrancer that records its conveyance against the rights of other persons whose conveyances are not recorded. Some recording laws are "pure" race statutes, giving priority to the person who first records, with few or no exceptions. Other laws are race-notice statutes, which protect the first person to record only if that party does not have knowledge of the other conveyance.[445]

When instruments of conveyance, such as two mortgages, get recorded out of the intended order, a race-notice law typically will permit the intended first lien holder to reorder the recording priority if the intended second lien holder had knowledge of the intended first lien at the time the mortgage was delivered or recorded.[446] Under a race-notice system, a lender with actual knowledge

[445] The subject of recording laws generally is beyond the scope of this text. See Joyce Palomar, Patton and Palomar on Land Titles (3rd Ed.), Chapter 3, for a complete discussion of the subject. One interesting example is Borries v. Goshen Mortgage, LLC, 219 So.3d 593 (Miss.App. 2017), in which the court held that a recorded instrument failed to impart constructive notice because one of its essential terms was missing, but found that the buyer would still be bound by her actual knowledge of the instrument if it appeared in a search of the real estate records. However, the buyer was found not to have actual knowledge of the instrument because the title company did not locate it in the title search.

[446] Baer v. Douglas, 2012 WL 917190 (Cal.App. 4 Dist.) (unpublished); First Bank v. East West Bank, 199 Cal.App.4th 1309, 132 Cal.Rptr.3d 267 (Cal.App. 2 Dist. 2011). In Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. v. Gakin, 2013 WL 869942 (Minn.App.) (unpublished), the court refused to reorder recording priority based on funding date, so that a mortgage recorded first but disbursed after the junior mortgage would have been second. The junior mortgagee creatively but incorrectly sought to splice together the race-notice recording law with the doctrine that a lender may not enforce a lien securing a debt until the loan is made. In Bank of East Asia (U.S.A.) N.A. v. Javaherian, 2013 WL 206127 (Cal.App. 2 of a prior interest in property does not receive priority over the competing lien or title interest by recording its mortgage before the other interest is recorded.[447] A decision that focused on the knowledge and status of the lender with recording priority blunts the argument that the intended first lien holder was negligent in recording late, which can also thwart its right to equitable subrogation.[448]

All or most of the states take the view that a judgment creditor is not a bona fide purchaser entitled to the protections afforded by the race-notice recording laws.[449]

3.4.7.5 Conveyances Outside of Chain of Title

Most state laws provide that constructive notice of real estate interests is imparted by a grantor-grantee index. A grantor-grantee index is a name index. The "chain of title" consists of a set of links, as the name suggests, each of which is a deed.[450] A conveyance (deed, mortgage, easement or otherwise) that is recorded outside of the chain of grantors is deemed not to impart notice of the Dist.) (unpublished), a deed of trust to private parties was marked as recorded one day before a deed of trust to Bank of East Asia was recorded. However, the private deed of trust was not indexed on the day the bank's lien was recorded. The bank had no knowledge of the private deed of trust. The court ruled that the bank's lien had priority over the private deed of trust, because there was no notice of the lien through the index on the day the bank's lien was recorded.

[447] Aurora Loan Services, LLC v. Molter, 2010 WL 3159571, 2010-Ohio-3704 (Ohio App. 5 Dist.) (unpublished) (junior mortgagee whose lien was recorded first found not entitled to priority because it had actual knowledge of intended first mortgage, and thus was not entitled to race-notice law protection, and because it would receive a windfall); CitiMortgage, Inc., v. FMM Bushnell, LLC, 2014 WL 7338876 (Mich.App. 2014) (unpublished) (lender not a bona fide encumbrancer entitled to benefit of race-notice recording law when it made loan with full knowledge of competing lien; because both loans were made on the same day, priority question could only be settled by determining which loan closed first).

[448] In Aurora Loan Services, 2010 WL 3159571, 2010-Ohio-3704 (Ohio App. 5 Dist.) (unpublished), the court acknowledged that a lender is ordinarily denied equitable subrogation in Ohio if it is "negligent," and thus turned to the race-notice law to rebut the intended junior mortgagee's expert testimony that the senior lender was negligent in taking 34 days to record its mortgage.

[449] Based on this principle, a Maryland court held that a deed of trust became a lien on the date of delivery and had priority over a judgment lien docketed two years later. Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. Mary B., 190 Md.App. 305, 988 A.2d 1044 (Md.App. 2010).

[450] The process of building a chain of title is described in a book written by a law professor and counsel for a title insurer: "Suppose, for example, that the United States Government records show that the United States sold a particular tract of land to John Jones on March 15, 1840. The title searcher will turn to the Grantor Index, which is arranged alphabetically, and, beginning with the date March 15, 1840, he will look under the letter "J" for any deeds or mortgages made since March 15, 1840, by John Jones. Naturally he would not expect to find any deeds or mortgages of that land made by Jones prior to March 15, 1840, because Jones did not become the owner under that date. Therefore the law does not require him to look for any such deeds or mortgages prior to that date. Suppose he finds that John Jones conveyed the land to Joseph Smith by deed dated September 10, 1860, and recorded November 1, 1860. He will now look under the letter "S" for any deeds or mortgage by Smith on or after September 10, 1860 … This process is repeated until he has brought the title down to the present. This process is called running the chain of title." Robert J. Kratovil, Real Estate Law, 5th Ed., §123, p. 64.

instrument.[451] For example, if Smith deeds Blackacre to Jones by a deed recorded on June 1, a mortgage granted by Jones and recorded on May 25 of the same year is a "wild" instrument that will not be discovered in a search of the grantor-grantee index. The search under "S" for Smith will end on June 1, and the search under "J" for Jones will begin that day also. The mortgage, appearing in the list of recorded instrument six days earlier, is not in the "chain" of title.

The "wild instrument" argument depends on the state or county's index system. If state law provides that only the grantor-grantee index imparts constructive notice, the argument is sound. If the state provides that a tract index also imparts notice, at least in those places in which one is maintained, the argument may fail.[452] A tract index is a parcel index. The chain of title under a tract index is comprised of all instruments pigeonholed into the index slot reserved for that parcel.[453] An instrument recorded before the grantee takes title will still be posted against the parcel, thus imparting notice.

3.4.7.6 Liens That Fail to Impart Constructive Notice

A lien that contains an inaccurate grantor or legal description, or which is accurate but incorrectly indexed by the recorder, typically does not impart constructive notice. If the lien is inaccurate or incorrectly indexed, the insured may assert that it is not binding on the insured as a bona fide purchaser or lender for value. Liens are indexed in two ways—by name or by parcel. The following is a summary of the law concerning the general rules by which courts determine if a lien imparts constructive notice, broken down by those two categories of liens.

3.4.7.6.1 Name Indices And Constructive Notice

Liens that are indexed by name rather than parcel present their own set of issues about the sufficiency of the lien or index entry to impart notice.

Federal tax liens fall in this category, and many of the cases on this subject concern federal tax liens. The sufficiency of a filing of a federal tax lien is determined by federal law.[454] 26 U.S.C. § 6323 states that a federal tax lien is not binding "as against any purchaser, holder of a security interest, mechanic's lienor, or judgment lien creditor until notice thereof which meets the requirements of subsection (f) has been filed ... ." Subsection (f), in turn, requires that a lien be filed [451] See Joyce Palomar, Patton and Palomar on Land Titles, (3rd Ed.), §§69-70 for a systematic treatment of the issue.

[452] For example, in Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. v. Simpson, 36 N.E.3d 266, 394 Ill.Dec. 333, 2015 IL App (1st) 142925 (Ill.App. 1 Dist. 2015), reh.den. June 30, 2015, mod. on den.reh. August 3, 2015, a mortgage was found to be enforceable even though it was not recorded in the chain of title. See Joyce Palomar, Patton and Palomar on Land Titles, (3rd Ed.), §§5-13 for a discussion and comparison of the recording laws and the pure race and race-notice systems adopted by the various states.

[453] "[The tract] index allocates a separate page in the index to each piece of property in the county, and if you are interested in a particular piece of property, you simply locate the proper page in the index, where you will find all recorded deeds and other documents relating to this piece of property." Robert J. Kratovil, Real Estate Law, 5th Ed., § 124, p. 65.

"in such a manner that a reasonable inspection of the index will reveal the existence of the lien."[455] One must fall under the classes of protected parties listed in § 6323 in order to take free of the tax lien.[456]

Notice comes from proper indexing, not simply by recording. The entire doctrine of constructive notice is built on the premise that a document, once recorded, will be indexed in such a way as to permit a title searcher to locate it when searching the chain of title. [457] The person seeking [456] In Brady v. Internal Revenue Service, 83 A.F.T.R.2d 99-1487, 1999 WL 221821 (E.D.Cal.) (unpublished), a person who sold a half interest in property to the taxpayer was found not to be a purchaser, and thus not entitled to be protected against a federal tax lien against the grantee, even though the taxpayer's name was misspelled on the lien.

[457] In Greenpoint Mortgage Funding, Inc. v. Schlossberg, 390 Md. 211, 888 A.2d 297 (Md. 2005), the court gave an impressively lucid explanation of the little-appreciated process of title examination, refuting the common notion that notice is imparted by a document simply by recording: "We continue by offering a brief description of the process of examination of titles, … which is a relatively laborious process that changed little during the first centuries following this nation's founding. The importance of correct indexing being a necessary part of filing and recording of instruments affecting property--if the purpose of the document is to afford constructive notice--can only be understood, if one fully understands the nature of the title examination process. …A title examiner goes to the place where the land records and other applicable records repose. He or she develops a chain of title, i.e., a list of the people who have owned the property for the last specified period of years. The property, or various fractional interests in it, may have been owned by one person or a hundred persons over that particular period of time. Then, during the periods in which each owner owned the property, or any portion of it or interest in it, the examiner must check to see whether during the period that particular owner owned the property, he or she had sold or mortgaged his or her interest in it to someone other than the person above him in the chain of title (in essence selling or mortgaging the same property more than once) or whether during the period of time each particular owner owned the property any judgments were rendered against such respective owner or whether, during that period any suits were filed anywhere that might constitute lis pendens against the respective owner and to the property while that owner owned it. As a practical matter it is impossible in a lifetime to examine every original document of every kind ever filed in the land and other records, which would be necessary if the buyer or lender is to be assured that the property is lien free and is owned by the person who is selling it, if the buyer or mortgage lender is required to be responsible for non-indexing or mis-indexing. Presume that an owner in 2000 had owned a subject property in Baltimore City for four years. In the year 1999-2000 there were 31,000 civil cases alone filed in that jurisdiction; in the year 1998-1999 there were 32,742 civil cases filed; in 1997-1998 there were 28,119 civil cases filed; and in 1996-1997 there were 26,877 civil cases filed in the Circuit Court of that jurisdiction. Altogether, during the period our seller owned the property there were 118,737 civil cases filed. Additionally, the title examiner under such circumstances would have to examine all cases pending at the beginning of the respective period of time--in the example given there were an additional 107,920 civil cases pending in that jurisdiction at the beginning of 1996-1997. If mis-indexing were to be at the risk of the buyer or, as in the present case, at the risk of the banks who are the third-party mortgagees, the person examining the title would have to personally read all the papers filed in those 226,658 cases in addition to federal lien dockets, tax records and the millions of other documents in the land records in order to insure that none of them constituted lis pendens against the property and to verify that nothing adversely affecting title occurred while the last owner (seller) held complete and clear title to the property. Then, once that is accomplished (which is impossible in the first instance) the title examiner would have to do the same thing in respect to the period of time that each prior owner owned the property, millions of additional documents (usually for a period of at least 60 years at the time the writer was examining titles). Relying on indexing is the only thing that makes it possible for title attorneys to limit the examination of documents to those that are relevant, generally those cases and documents indexed in the grantor's or debtor's name. If indexing were to be eliminated, the marketability of titles would be seriously compromised and the entire system of property in this country might collapse. The contrary position, i.e., indexing is not required, would result in millions of documents having to be reviewed to certify a clear title. It would be an impossible task." 390

to impart notice of his or her rights is obligated not only to record the instrument, but to verify that it has been indexed so that it will impart notice.[458] The failure of the party adverse to the insured to impart constructive notice of its rights is a powerful defense for the insured.[459] However, there are circumstances under which notice is imparted through the index despite the misposting of the instrument by the recorder.[460]

A lien indexed by name may or may not be enforceable against a parcel of land purchased by the debtor under another name. Thus, a lien that recites the debtor's correct legal name at the time of the filing of the lien may or may not be enforceable against property when the debtor purchased the land under a new legal name.[461] A lien that is filed using a name that is not the debtor's true legal name does not impart notice.[462] However, when there is adequate information of the use of an alias Banegura*, 357 Md. 450, 745 A.2d 419 (Md. 2000); Greenpoint Mortgage Funding, Inc. v. Schlossberg, 390 Md. 211, 888 A.2d 297 (Md.App. 2005) (party recording lis pendens has duty to verify that it is indexed so as to impart constructive notice, and loses to bona fide encumbrancer for value when instrument not properly indexed).

[459] In Keybank National Association v. NBD Bank, 699 N.E.2d 322 (Ind.App. 1998), a mortgage on which the legal description stated the wrong range did not provide notice because it "described an existing parcel of real estate ... [and] was indexed in the Recorder's office consistent with the legal description contained in the mortgage and, thus, out of the chain of title ... ." The lender argued that mere recording gave inquiry if not constructive notice, and that a careful search should have revealed the NBD mortgage. The court disagreed, holding that the onus is on the party recording an instrument to make sure that its lien gives notice, rather than on the bona fide purchaser or encumbrancer to find the document. An instrument recorded outside of the chain of title does not give any notice. The court concluded: "To hold otherwise would cause the recording statute to prove a snare, instead of a protection."

[460] In In re Arvizu Construction, Inc., 430 B.R. 544 (Bkcy.D.Ariz. 2010), the borrower's name was misspelled in the posting of a deed of trust in the index, but the instrument was still found to impart notice because its legal description was accurate; therefore, the bankruptcy trustee, as a putative bona fide purchaser, could not avoid it. In First Citizens Nat'l Bank v. Sherwood, 879 A.2d 178 (Pa. 2005), a mortgage was misposted by the recorder. The court ruled, very simply, that recording alone imparted notice: "Per [the recording law], the legal effect of the recording of a written agreement such as a mortgage is to give subsequent purchasers constructive notice of the mortgage." The court tacitly admitted that its decision does not make practical sense, but blamed the result on the legislature. It refused the "invitation" from the injured lender to adopt the rulings of Coco v. Ranalletta, 189 Misc.2d 535, 733 N.Y.S.2d 849 (N.Y.Sup.Ct. 2001) and Waicker v. Banegura, 357 Md. 450, 745 A.2d 419 (2000), discussed in this section. The Sherwood court may have been influenced by, but did not mention, the case of Antonis v. Liberati, 821 A.2d 666 (Pa. 2003), which held that a mortgage did not impart notice, and found the lawyer responsible to his client for failing to verify that the mortgage was properly posted. Antonis relied on Prouty v. Marshall, 225 Pa. 570, 74 A. 550 (1909).

[461] See United States v. Polk, 822 F.2d 871 (9th Cir. 1987), which found that the IRS does not have the duty to find the property owned by the taxpayer and file liens under each name by which the taxpayer has later taken title. However, another court found that a lien filed against a woman taxpayer under her former married name was not notice when the taxpayer had since remarried and taken title to the property under her married name. Davis v. United States, 728 F.Supp. 513 (D.C.Ill. 1989). In Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. Phillips, 108 F.Supp.2d 1382 (D.C.M.D.Ga. 2000), a title agent was found not to have standing to contest a lien filed against an alias, so the court did not address the issue on its merits.

in the public records that impart notice to a purchaser of real estate, a lien that names the debtor by that alias may be enforceable.[463]

The appropriate rule is that a purchaser has no constructive notice of a lien that is indexed by name only, if the debtor's name is misspelled on the lien. One commentator has suggested a rather amorphous standard: "whether or not the [name] designation affords under the circumstances an opportunity to a person dealing with the delinquent taxpayer to ascertain the existence of a federal tax lien."[464] This rule would create a standard which is too imprecise to be followed in practice. In modern reality, with the strains on name indices caused by increased population, the lien creditor has a duty to correctly spell the debtor's full name in order to give constructive notice to otherwise bona fide purchasers and encumbrancers for value.

Modern courts recognize that, as population increases, fewer people have names that adequately distinguish them from others. Thus, in one case, a judgment docketed against a Walter M. Smith was found not to be impart constructive notice to create a lien on property owned by Walter William Smith, Sr., particularly given the fact that the judgment contained a different address and marital status also. The court found that "[t]he differences in the middle name/initial, suffix, marital status and address, as well as the commonality [commonness?] of the name, do not provide sufficient notice to enable the judgment to constitute a lien as a matter of law."[465] A number of states hold that it is the lien holder's duty to recite the debtor's name correctly, in order to impart constructive notice with only a reasonable burden on the searcher to locate the lien in the index.[466]

Civil, LLC), 415 B.R. 403 (B.A.P. 9th Cir. 2009) (federal tax liens that left out a word in the taxpayer entity's name did not impart notice; court rejected IRS's argument that it imparted constructive notice because a wild card search using the first two words of the name would have turned up the liens).

[463] In Kivel v. United States, 878 F.2d 301 (9th Cir. 1989), the court accepted expert testimony that an examination of all of the documents in the chain of title, including released tax liens, would have revealed the alias under which the tax lien was filed. Therefore, the lien was found to give notice sufficient to be discovered on a reasonable inspection of the index. Kivel is discussed in California Title Insurance Practice, § 4.24, published by Continuing Education of the Bar.

[466] "It is the duty of a person offering an instrument for record to see that it is both properly recorded and properly indexed," per Waicker v. Banegura, 357 Md. 450, 745 A.2d 419 (Md. 2000). The court found that proper spelling is essential to the name index. "The indexing requirement of alphabetizing of names in judgment indexes is the foundation by which judgment liens are researched. The reason is simple. If a judgment is not indexed in the proper fashion, i.e., in alphabetical order, a searcher may never find it." See also Coco v. Ranalletta, 305 A.D.2d 1082, 759 N.Y.S.2d 274 (N.Y.A.D. 4 Dept. 2003) (duty to see that lien is properly indexed is that of lienholder; no constructive notice imparted by mortgage lien improperly indexed, even though broad search of electronic index could have revealed lien). In First Merit Bank, NA v. Guarantee Title & Trust Co., 2006 WL 1791148, 2006-Ohio-3333 (Ohio App. 9 Dist. 2006) (unpublished), the court cited several cases for the rule that "[i]t is the duty of a person offering an instrument for record to see that it is both properly recorded and properly indexed." Baker v. Coffman, 24 Ohio N.P. (N.S.) 259 (1922); Brown v. Ault, 56 Ohio Law Abs. 536 (N.D. Ohio 1949); Waicker v. Banegura, 357 Md. 450 (2000); and Commonwealth v. Roberts, 392 Pa. 572 (1958). In First Merit, the court also found that the lender had a duty to draft the instrument to impart notice. The title insurer had given the lender the borrower's name by which he took title. The lender mistakenly moved his first initial to become a middle initial on the mortgage. The lender was not paid off when the borrower sold

A purchaser is obligated to search a name variant only if he or she is actually aware of the alternate name.[467] Colorado holds that, when a person holds title using a first initial, a judgment search must be made against the middle name as well; however, the court refused to broaden the search duty to include idem sonans names, a subject further discussed further below.[468] A California decision involving a judgment lien expanded this definition of knowledge by imputing the escrow officer's knowledge of a name variation to the purchaser.[469] A mortgage recorded under a woman's the property, because a later title searcher did not discover the mortgage. The borrower later filed bankruptcy, preventing the lender from recovering the debt from the borrower personally. The lender's failure to impart constructive notice was also found to be excluded from policy coverage under Exclusion 3(a), as a matter "created" by the lender.

[467] Waicker v. Banegura, 357 Md. 450, 745 A.2d 419 (Md. 2000), noted that a name variance can be binding on a purchaser who actually knows the variant name under which the lien is docketed. "In Messinger v. Eckenrode, 162 Md. 63, 158 A. 357 (1932), Susanna Messinger conceded that she never conducted a search of the judgment index, that the judgment was indexed under the correct surname and correct middle names of the judgment debtors (although not under the correct first name), and that she knew that the parties commonly went by their middle names under which the judgment was indexed. In other words, Messinger would have had actual knowledge that the indexing was wrong had she conducted a title examination. Under the facts of that case, we held that there was sufficient evidence presented that Messinger, because of her actual knowledge, would have found the judgment if a proper search of the judgment index had been conducted. Crucial to our interpretation was not only that no search was conducted, but that Messinger actually knew the property owners by the names under which the judgment was indexed: "If anyone had inspected the index in the clerk's office, he would have found the name 'Heagy' and the Christian names by which they were known to the appellant . ... " Id. at 69, 158 A. at 359 (emphasis added). In other words, a court may employ a subjective test to consider the independent knowledge of an involved party. Whether a party has actual knowledge that a judgment is indexed under an alternative spelling or incorrect name is the primary factor a court should consider in determining whether, had a title examination been conducted, the party would have found the specific judgment. If the party has actual knowledge that the judgment was indexed, or likely to be indexed, under an incorrect name, the party has a duty to search under that incorrect name because, due to the party's actual knowledge, the party presumably would have discovered the misindexed judgment."

[469] In re Marriage of Cloney, 91 Cal.App.4th 429, 110 Cal.Rptr.2d 615 (Cal.App. 1 Dist. 2001). In that case, a judgment against James Michael Cloney was found enforceable against the purchaser of property titled in Mike Cloney because the escrow officer saw Cloney's full name on his driver's license, which she reviewed as notary. In imputing the escrow officer's knowledge to the purchaser, the court said: "It is well-settled law in California that the holder of an escrow is agent for all parties up to the time that the escrow is closed… Because an escrow agent in a real property conveyance is a dual agent for both the purchaser and the seller, any escrow agency is of a limited and special nature, and the obligations imposed on an escrow agent to disclose matters to his or her principals are more limited than those imposed on an agent pursuant to a general agency. For this reason, in order for any knowledge acquired by an escrow agent to be imputed to either principal, such knowledge must have been acquired by the escrow agent within the course and scope of his or her limited agency. Nevertheless, insofar as the escrow agent-acting within the course and scope of his or her agency duties-acquires specific material information pertinent to matters within the same escrow that could have a substantial adverse effect on the principal, such knowledge will be imputed to the principal. … The question, then, is whether Holcomb's actual knowledge of Cloney's full name was acquired within the course and scope of her escrow agency. We conclude that it was. Holcomb asked for Cloney's identification, not simply as a notary public, but as the escrow officer acting on behalf of both parties. Before Cloney signed the grant deed conveying the Property to respondent, it was necessary to ascertain that he was, in fact, the person he represented himself to be. This information was necessary to Holcomb for her to carry out her duties as escrow agent to respondent. Although she testified she believed Cloney's identification was "confidential" and she could not reveal it to anyone, her belief was clearly incorrect.

married name did not impart constructive notice when there was no other record evidence of her name change.[470]

The rule of idem sonans has been suggested by lien creditors as a defense when the name on the lien docket does not match the name under which the debtor took title. Idem sonans is a rule for establishing that a person who uses two names is in fact the same person. The courts commonly say that, in verifying identity, the law addresses the ear. The rule has been states as follows: "if two names sound alike, or substantially alike, although spelled differently, they are presumed to be names of the same person."[471]

The idem sonans doctrine is a savings clause that smooths over name variations that would otherwise be considered breaks in a chain of title, such as when a person takes title by one name and deeds out by a variant spelling.[472] This legal fiction was not invented to broaden the constructive

Under the law, Holcomb was required to supply this information to any member of the general public upon simple written request and payment of "not more than thirty cents" per photocopied page. (Gov.Code, § 8206, subd. (c).) Moreover, Holcomb acquired knowledge of Cloney's true full name in the process of fulfilling her escrow duties of supervising the execution of the conveyance documents and disbursement of purchase moneys. Because this information was obtained in the course of her escrow agency and was highly material to the subject matter of that agency, Holcomb was obliged by her agency to disclose this information to respondent as one of her principals. As a matter of law, therefore, she is presumed to have fulfilled this duty of her agency. The highly material knowledge of Cloney's identity must therefore be imputed to respondentY"

Black's Law Dictionary 744 (6th Ed. 1990) describes the rule this way: "Under the rule of 'idem sonans,' variance between allegation and proof of a given name is not material if the names sound the same or the attentive ear finds difficulty in distinguishing them when pronounced." National Packaging Corp. v. Belmont, 47 Ohio App.3d 86, 88 n.1, 547 N.E.2d 373, 374 n.1 (1988) said this: " The doctrine of idem sonans has been defined as: 'The arbitrary orthography and pronunciation given to proper names, and the variant spelling resulting from ignorance have led the courts to formulate the doctrine ... , which means 'sounding the same.' Under this doctrine a mistake in spelling the name of a party is immaterial if both modes of spelling have the same sound. The grounds for applying the doctrine to slight variations in spelling is that of de minimis non curat lex--the principle that the law is not concerned with trifles ... . Thus, it is not every mistake in names which will invalidate an instrument or proceeding ... . Since words are intended to be spoken, bad spelling will not vitiate their intended effect where the sound is substantially preserved.'"

[472] In Waicker v. Banegura, 357 Md. 450, 745 A.2d 419 (Md. 2000), for example, the court noted the proper and limited uses of the doctrine: "This Court has hesitated to embrace this doctrine and applied it only in two older cases. See State v. Warfield, 139 Md. 74, 76, 114 A. 835, 836 (1921) (holding that an indictment using the word "tract" instead of "track" would be saved by the doctrine of idem sonans); Elliott v. Knott, 14 Md. 121, 135 (1859) ("The names 'Penryn' and 'Pennyrine' should be regarded, in the absence of all proof to show they belong to different tracts of land, as applicable to the same, and as idem sonans."). Both Warfield and Elliot are distinguishable from the case sub judice. Neither of them involved the priority of liens arising out of misindexing. Additionally, neither involve the misspelling of a party's name, much less the misspelling of a party's name in a judgment index in which the only way to find the judgment is alphabetically by the judgment debtor's name." In National Packaging Corp. v. Belmont, 47 Ohio App.3d 86, 88 n.1, 547 N.E.2d 373, 374 n.1 (1988), the court noted prior decisions applying idem sonans in question-of-identity situations. As interpreted by the Waicker court, however, National Packaging distinguished these cases as follows: "The Ohio court then discussed several old Ohio cases of various types in which the doctrine of idem sonans had been applied, noting that in each case there was other evidence from which a proper identification of the relevant party would have notice imparted by a document that creates a lien indexed by name. If it were so used, it would make the searching of a name index very time-consuming and uncertain in the extreme, since there can be so many variants on any name.[473]

Therefore, courts agree that the doctrine of idem sonans may not be used to make a purchaser bound by notice of a tax or judgment lien in which the debtor's name is spelled differently than on the conveyance vesting title to the property,[474] except when the sole variant is a middle initial or been actually known: Lessee of Pillsbury v. Dugan's Administrator, 9 Ohio 117 (1839) (involving a petition for partition sale in which the notice contained a description of the property); Buchanan v. Roy's Lessee, 2 Ohio St. 251 (1853) (dicta regarding the misspelling of a party's name in a publication notice in a quiet-title action); and Turpin v. State, 19 Ohio St. 540 (1869) (involving a variance in the spelling of a forged signature in an exhibit and the indictment, when there was other evidence of the identity of the person whose name was forged)."

[473] Franklin Bank, N.A. v. Bowling, 74 P.3d 308 (Colo. 2003) mod. on den.reh. (Aug 04, 2003) (idem sonans rejected). In Waicker v. Banegura, 357 Md. 450, 745 A.2d 419 (Md. 2000), the court said: "Allowing for misnomers even in the form of minor misspellings would undermine the entire indexing system of judgment liens. A minor misspelling may render a judgment "undiscoverable" by even the most prudent of searchers. As in Belmont, in the case at bar the name at issue, Banegura, could be misspelled in an almost inexhaustible number of ways: Baneguna, Baneguma, Banegupa, Baneguha, Banegure, Baneguri, Baneguro, Banguro, Beneguro, Binegua, Benigura, Benegara, ad infinitum. As we stated, supra, one of the purposes of the alphabetized index and records system of judgment liens is to provide an organized and efficient method by which the general public can easily and effectively research money judgments acting as liens on a particular parcel of land. It serves, if done properly, to give constructive notice to subsequent purchasers, encumbrancers, or others who may deal with the title to the real estate, of any and all judgments that constitute liens on real property. It does so by providing a method whereby title examiners can examine the judgment index under the name of the title owner, as that name is recorded among the land records of a particular jurisdiction. The only way constructive notice is sufficient is if the correct name of the title owner of the land against which the lien is sought to be enforced is indexed and recorded in the judgment lien indexes. '[To constitute notice to ... encumbrancers, a judgment must be properly docketed by the correct [first] name and surname of the judgment debtor.' Venetsky, 28 N.J.Super. at 187, 100 A.2d at 295. In the case of judgment liens there is no designation of, or reference to, the property in question to aid in the conveying of notice to the searcher. The only way to conduct research in the judgment lien index is by the name of the title holder of the land as that name is reflected in the land records--this is why the information included, especially the surname, needs to be accurate. Considering that a misspelling might render a judgment impossible to find, in the absence of evidence of actual knowledge of the misspelling or misnomer, there is a presumption that a judgment indexed under an incorrect or misspelled name will not be found by a party examining title to property under the correct name as reflected in the land records."

Many of the above cases are discussed in *Waicker v. indexes." The Waicker court held that "the doctrine of idem sonans generally does not apply to the indexing and recording of judgment liens. To hold otherwise, in the absence of additional evidence of the facts and circumstances relating to a party's actual knowledge, would lessen the functional necessity of the alphabetized recording system to the free marketability of property titles in Maryland." Waicker relied in part on Jaczyszyn v. Paslawski, 147 Pa.Super. 97, 24 A.2d 116 (1942), the facts of which it recited as follows: "John Paslawski had a judgment against Nikolai Borys that was entered incorrectly in the judgment index under the name Mikola Borys. Mrs. Jaczyszyn's attorney searched the judgment index but found no record in favor of Mr. Paslawski against Nikolai Borys. The Pennsylvania Superior Court ruled in Mrs. Jaczyszyn's favor, holding that the judgment indexed under Mikola Borys did not constitute constructive notice of a judgment against Nikolai Borys. The court reasoned: "It was the duty of the plaintiff in the judgment, Mr. Paslawski, to see that [the name recorded in the judgment index] was correctly entered. There was no duty resting on Mrs. Jaczyszyn, or her attorney, to search the records for any other name than the one Borys was always called and known by, Nikolai Borys." Id. at 101, 24 A.2d at 118 (citations omitted).

In National Packaging, a judgment against Michael Bolan was indexed and recorded under the incorrect name Michael Bolen. The judgment lien claimant argued "that the certified judgment filed under a similar sounding but incorrect spelling of the debtor Bolan's name, retaining the same initial letters as the correctly spelled name, should have been held to give rise to a valid lien for the benefit of NPC and to provide the appropriate constructive notice to title searchers." The court rejected the doctrine: "We hold that the doctrine of idem sonans is inapplicable to names that are misspelled in judgment-lien name indexes. We are not a frontier society of pioneers with little education or an absence of precedent and system. Since the [Ohio] Supreme Court issued its opinion in Pillsbury, we have experienced a tremendous growth in the population and the economy, and those developments have spawned countless real estate sales and a volume of litigation resulting in an abundance of indexed judgment liens. In modern society we cannot overlook matters of form by continuing to indulge the outmoded premises of our societal infancy. To impose rigidly the doctrine of idem sonans to name indexes now maintained for judgment liens would tax all land abstractors beyond reasonable limits and require them to be poets, phonetic linguists, or multilingual specialists. The additional time necessary to examine name indexes under such a stringent doctrine would make the examinations financially prohibitive.

"The appellees, in their brief, demonstrate the difficulty in applying the doctrine of idem sonans to the range of spellings implicated in the instant case: Bolan, Bolen, Bolin, Bowlin, Bowlan, Bowlen, Bolun; the addition of double "l," "ein," and "ien" spellings does not even exhaust all conceivable spelling possibilities. The impossibility of the task created by the doctrine of idem sonans is further illustrated by the fact that we, as a society and state, are no longer a small homogeneous population primarily of European abstraction. Since our infancy, we have added Asian, African, South American, Oriental and Arabic surnames. The spelling, sound, and pronunciation of our population's surnames create an insurmountable burden for an abstractor to face in appreciating all the possible variations ... . [A] strict application of the doctrine [of idem sonans] today would leave a real estate purchaser with a lingering fear that misspelled lien-holders, either negligently or deliberately, might be lurking under the idem sonans doctrine in the judgment- debtor indexes." Id. at 90, 547 N.E.2d at 375-76. The Maryland Waicker court adopted this holding of National Packaging.

[475] Most cases involving initials have to do with the inclusion or lack of an initial, or the use of the wrong middle initial. Most courts have found that the initial is not fatal to notice, because the first and last names are indexed under the correct name. See Coral Gables, Inc. v. Kerl, 334 Pa. 441, 6 A.2d 275 (1939) (holding that a judgment indexed in the name of Caroline Kerl constituted notice of a judgment against Caroline C. Kerl) and Department of Pub. Assistance v. Reustle, 358 Pa. 111, 56 A.2d 221 (1948) (judgment indexed in the name of Rosie Reustle was notice of a judgment against Rosie C. Reustle). A minor variation in middle name was found not to thwart notice, when the lien was readily discernible in the index, in Susquebanc Lease Co. v. Lucchesi, 707 A.2d 540, 542 (Pa.Super.1998). In that case, a judgment against Camill Louis Lucchesi, indexed under Camill Lewis Lucchesi was found sufficiently similar to be a lien against real estate. The court said that "appellate courts have resolved such cases on the basis of the factual circumstances and practical considerations present in each case." The court concluded:

constructive notice even though the debtor's name was misspelled, a California court found idem sonans inapplicable:

> In our view, the case at bar presents a situation where the written name is material. We therefore decline to follow Green's holding[[477]] which, in essence, dispenses with the formalities of record notice. Moreover, the Green opinion entirely ignores the added burden placed on the searcher who is charged with knowledge of the alternative spellings.
> In refusing to apply the doctrine here, the trial judge found requiring a title searcher to comb the records for other spellings of the same name would place an undue burden on the transfer of property. The court observed "if you put the burden on those people in addition to what comes up when the name is properly spelled, to track down and satisfy themselves about whatever comes up when the name is improperly spelled in all different ways that it might be improperly spelled, it leads to, I think, an unjustifiable burden." We agree.[478]

"Camill Lewis Lucchesi" appear[s] on the very same or adjacent page as other entries against the name Lucchesi, which did not include the middle name "Lewis." Two judgment liens had been recorded ... against "Lucchesi." Another was filed against "C.L. Lucchesi, a/k/a C. Louis" ... . These several judgments filed against an individual with a name very similar to that of the seller of the property on the same or adjacent pages should have alerted a reasonably careful searcher to verify the identity of the judgment debtor rather than relying solely on the name as listed in the judgment index." Id. at 542-43. In Waicker v. Banegura, 357 Md. 450, 745 A.2d 419 (Md. 2000), the court summarized the cases: "These cases indicate that those courts are generally less inclined to hold a mistake in a middle name or initial to as high of a standard as a mistake in a first name. Thus, an error in a middle name, according to those courts, is less likely to hinder constructive notice and be fatal to lien priority." Courts divide on whether or not a search must be made for judgments entered only by the first initial, as opposed to the full first name. In Garner v. Cluck, 209 Ark. 912, 916, 193 S.W.2d 661, 663 (1946), Arkansas rejected the notion, saying: "Where an initial is employed instead of the first name of the judgment debtor, an error therein is as fatal as it would be in the name itself. In regard to the middle initial, some authorities hold that if a middle initial is used, it must be the proper one, especially when there are other persons in the district who have a similar name." However, in Green v. Meyers, 98 Mo.App. 438, 72 S.W. 128 (1903), the court held that a judgment docketed against "E.G. Seibert" attached to, and was record notice to a purchaser of, land owned by Eleanor G. Sibert. The Green court acknowledged that idem sonans dealt with identity and was therefore properly addressed to the ear, while record notice is a matter of sight. However, it bridged the gap with the rather metaphysical remark that notice "is, above all, a matter for the consideration of the mind."

Internal Revenue Service*, 83 A.F.T.R.2d 99-1487, 1999 WL 221821 (E.D.Cal.) (unpublished), in which a lien against Yolanda Braskat was filed naming "Y. Brasket." However, the party claiming the protection of Orr and §6323 was Ms. Braskat's tenant in common, who sold her a one-half interest in the property. The court found that he was not a purchaser entitled to protection under §6323, and therefore the lien attached despite the lack of notice caused by the misspelling.

In short, the lien creditor has the burden of spelling the debtor's name correctly.[479] However, at least one court has used the doctrine of idem sonans to broaden the search duty to the benefit of the federal government as creditor.[480]

3.4.7.6.2 Parcel Indices And Constructive Notice

Some instruments or conveyances are recorded but fail to impart constructive notice to a purchaser for value. When the policy contains the standard exception for easements not in the public records, the policy provides no coverage against easements that are not recorded, or which are recorded but do not appear in the chain of title. See §12.4 for a discussion of the unrecorded easement exception. That exception is consonant with other standard exceptions that limit the insurer's risk to matters discoverable in a title search. See §12.3.1 for a discussion of the rationale behind such standard exceptions.

Some courts have held that the title insurance policy does not protect against instruments or rights that are not in the chain of title. For example, in Fekishazy v. Thomson,[481] when a lease was found to be a wild instrument, the policy was found not to indemnify the insured against the lessee's rights:

> [W]e ... declare that the lease from Ruth Thomson to John Thomson does not constitute a defect or encumbrance affecting plaintiffs' title to the premises for the purposes of determining TRW's liability under its title insurance policy and that TRW should be discharged of all responsibility to plaintiffs under its title insurance policy.[482]

The same rule was enunciated, albeit as to an abstractor of title, in 1119 Delaware v. Continental Land Title Co.[483] The court found that the abstractor's liability depended on whether or not the permit was recorded in the chain of title:

> Assuming the CUP was within the chain of title[FN5], Continental should have included the CUP in the abstract of title as an encumbrance.
> [FN5] Continental does not contend the CUP was recorded outside the chain of title. We note that a "wild" document, the existence of which could not be found by a search of grantor/grantee indices, does not impart constructive notice.[484]

In most instances, however, the fact that an instrument does not impart notice is not a bar to policy liability, unless excepted in Schedule B. The instrument's failure to impart notice serves as a basis for the insurer to defend or protect the insured from the adverse interest. See the discussion of this issue at §3.4.7.6.

Some states have held that instruments entitled to recordation and duly recorded, but which are misindexed or mislabeled by the recorder or register of deeds, impart no constructive notice.[485] Some states follow the rule that an instrument does impart constructive notice if it is discoverable in a title search, despite a technical deficiency in the instrument.[486] Other states follow the doctrine that an instrument that is recorded, but which fails to contain all of the elements required by law for a valid conveyance, or to entitle it to be recorded, do not impart notice despite the fact that they are [486] In In re Crane, 742 F.3d 702, 58 Bankr.Ct.Dec. 232 (7th Cir. (Ill.) 2013), the court ruled that the suggestion in a statute that a mortgage recite the due date of the loan and the rate of interest was not a requirement in order to impart constructive notice; therefore, a bankruptcy trustee did not have the strong-arm power to avoid a mortgage that did not recite those terms. The lower court decision had held that the mortgage did not impart notice, and caused the title industry to obtain a change in the law (Illinois statute 765 ILCS 5/11) making it clear that the recitation of a due date and interest rate are not mandatory. 2012 Ill. Legis. Serv. P.A. 97–1164, § 20. In Borries v. Goshen Mortgage, LLC, 219 So.3d 593 (Miss.App. 2017), the court held that a recorded instrument failed to impart constructive notice because one of its essential terms was missing, but found that the buyer would still be bound by her actual knowledge of the instrument if it appeared in a search of the real estate records. However, the buyer was found not to have actual knowledge of the instrument because the title company did not locate it in the title search. Ohio has produced a series of decisions that have saved the notice effect of a recorded mortgage. The Ohio recording statute requires that a mortgage contain a "description of land," and say that a mortgage is valid when it is in the form required by law "in substance." In Fifth Third Mortgage Co. v. Brown, 2012-Ohio-2205, 970 N.E.2d 1183 (Ohio App. 8 Dist. 2012), the court said that the law does not require a formal metes and bounds description and that a description of the property "is sufficient if it is such as to indicate the land intended to be conveyed, so as to enable a person to locate it." In ABN AMRO Mortgage Group, Inc. v. Jackson, 159 Ohio App.3d 551, 558-559, 2005-Ohio-297, 824 N.E.2d 600 (Ohio App. 2 Dist. 2005), the court held that a mortgage imparted notice despite a deficient description because it recited the correct tax parcel number and street address. In Acacia on the Green Condominium Ass'n v. Jefferson, 2016-Ohio-386, 47 N.E.3d 207 (Ohio App. 8 Dist. 2016), the court said that a mortgage that contained no description at all still imparted notice because a title examiner was able to locate the mortgage in the records "with ease." In Williams v. Schneider, 109 N.E.3d 124, 2018 -Ohio- 968, 2018 WL 1353291 (Ohio App. 8 Dist. 2018), the court held that a metes and bounds description, though incomplete, was nonetheless adequate to impart notice, so that the mortgage had priority over later-filed mechanic's liens. In Sides v. Saliga, 2019 WL 2529551 (Tex.App.-Austin) (unpublished), the court held that a declaration of restrictions was in the chain of title despite the fact that the full legal name of the declarant was not recited in the instrument.

readily found by a title search.[487] Bankruptcy trustees use these principles and their strong-arm avoidance powers to avoid an otherwise valid mortgage or other interest in property, in order to capture it for the benefit of unsecured creditors.[488] However, bankruptcy courts apply normal recording law notice principles when they consider notice given to the bankruptcy debtor, or priority disputes between creditors.[489]

Some states have held that an instrument that is recorded, but which is not in a class of documents entitled by statute to be recorded, does not impart notice and may be expunged from the record.[490] In some states, the recorder, as custodian of the public records, may be personally liable [487] For example, in Life Insurance Co. of Virginia v. Page, 178 Miss. 287, 301, 172 So. 873, 876 (1937), the court held that the failure to name a beneficiary caused a recorded deed of trust not to impart constructive notice.

[488] See, for example, the following representative decisions. In Heritage Real Estate Investment, Inc. v. Dynasty Group, Inc., 783 Fed.Appx. 403, 67 Bankr.Ct.Dec. 226 (5th Cir. (Miss.) 2019) (unpublished), the court held that, while a deed is an effective conveyance between seller and buyer whether or not it is recorded, a bankruptcy trustee is treated as a hypothetical bona fide purchaser under Section 544, giving him or her the ability to avoid the deed if it is not recorded. The court went on to hold that the deed, though later recorded, was ineffective because it was not signed by the grantor. In In re Jones, 580 B.R. 916 (Bkcy.M.D.Ga. 2017), a Georgia court held that a recorded mortgage did not impart constructive notice because the signature page was inadvertently not included in the instrument (or perhaps was included but got caught in the recorder's scanner and not imaged). The lender argued that the mortgage did contain a signature page because the borrowers signed an attached rider. Ironically, the lender relied on bankruptcy court decisions that had saved mortgages under similar circumstances. This court distinguished those decisions, and let the trustee avoid the mortgage. In In re Forrester, 2017 WL 5468172 (Bkcy.D.N.H.) (unpublished), the trustee tried to avoid a mortgage because it described the property as Unit 3 in a condominium, while the declaration created Units 3 A and 3 B, but no Unit 3. However, the mortgage also described the parcel by its correct street address and tax parcel number. The trustee argued that the description was ambiguous and inaccurate, and thus it could not possibly impart constructive notice despite the fact that it was recorded. He relied on U.S. Bank, N.A. v. Bickford, 2015 WL 1470879 (D.N.H. 2015), another federal decision, in which a mortgage described the right parcel but also said the land was the same as that conveyed in a certain deed, and the deed described a different parcel. In Bickford, the court said that the mortgage did not impart notice, but solely to reach the conclusion that a federal tax lien had priority over the mortgage. In Forrester, the court did not avoid the mortgage. The court noted that this mortgage did not describe two different parcels that exist, but one parcel that did exist (by the tax parcel number and street address) and one that did not (by the reference to Unit 3).

[489] A New Mexico bankruptcy court found that the debtor took title subject to an existing, recorded deed of trust because he purchased with constructive notice of the instrument and also had actual knowledge of it, in In re Lamey, 2017 WL 1839154 (Bkcy.D.N.M. 2017) (unpublished). Also, in In re Hard Rock Exploration, Inc., 580 B.R. 202 (Bkcy.S.D.W.Va. 2017), a junior creditor asserted that its lien was not subject to a deed of trust because it contained too skimpy a legal description to impart notice. The court disagreed, after applying conventional law about the adequacy of a legal description in a conveyance instrument. West Virginia court decisions have upheld conveyances that described the land by number of acres, "all my land" in a certain town or county, land lying on a certain side of a river, and similar methods short of a conventional metes and bounds description. The court found the deed of trust was adequate because it encumbered "all of the Company's interests" in land located within that county. Also, in Park Bank v. U.S. Bank Trust, N.A., 2018 WL 3954162 (W.D.Wis. 2018) (unpublished), a Wisconsin court accurately applied that state's race-notice recording law to find that a lender whose mortgage was recorded first was still subject to another mortgage because it was granted first, though recorded afterward. The second lender had actual knowledge of the loan that predated its own, because it was disclosed by the borrowers on their financial statement.

[490] Ward v. Superior Court, 55 Cal.App.4th 60, 63 Cal.Rptr.2d 731 (2 Dist., Div. 2 1997). In recent years, certain states have seen an increase in sham recordings by anti-government groups. When recorders refuse to record these instruments, they are sometimes severely harassed. In some states, slander of title statutes have been amended to impose for negligent supervision of his `or her employees if the office improperly accepts documents for recording, or fails to record or index them in a timely fashion, or misindexes or mislabels them in the indices.[491]

A third party sometimes seeks to impute notice of its recorded instrument to an insured based on the insurer's knowledge or notice of the instrument. A title insurer is not the agent of the insured, and the insurer's knowledge of an instrument is not imputed to the insured.[492] Constructive notice is imparted only according to the rules established in each state as to which indices and records serve as the "official" set of records.[493] Dunlap Investors Ltd. v. Hogan[494] is also illustrative. In that case, a recorded easement lacked a legal description and was granted by a party which was not the record owner. It therefore was not in the chain of title, and further could not be discovered by reviewing its legal description. However, a copy of the easement was located in the title insurer's "base" file. The easement holder sought to impute notice on the servient parcel owner on the theory that the insurer was the owner's agent. The court found that the insurer was not the insured's agent, and the information contained in its prior title file was not imputed to the insured owner.

Further, an insured does not have imputed notice of all of the records maintained in its title insurer's office, which often includes an extensive title plant. As a Connecticut court noted, it is imperative that there be an objective standard as to which records impart notice to purchasers, and that a purchaser not be bound by notice from records in private title plants:

"It has always been the policy of our law that the land records should be the authentic Furthermore, the matter of constructive notice from recorded documents is entirely a creature of statute and not of common law. ... Such notice must therefore be created by the statute itself or not at all."

> oracle of title on which a bona fide purchaser ... might safely rely." … The plaintiff's argument would require the defendants to look beyond the Greenwich land records…. That proposition runs contrary to over a century of jurisprudence holding that one searching title to land is not bound to search the records at large, but is bound with only such facts as appear in the chain of title to the particular lot in question.[495]

There may be very limited circumstances under which the knowledge of a title insurer may be imputed to the insured.[496] Also, an insured may receive actual knowledge of an interest in land or a recorded instrument by reading a title insurance commitment or policy.[497]

3.4.7.7 Estate Tax Liens

On occasion, a title insurer makes the decision to insure the sale of property by an estate, accepting evidence from the estate that the estate tax has been paid in full, or that none will attach. If the IRS later asserts that a federal tax lien attaches, federal law provides that the lien is nonetheless divested to the extent that the estate proceeds are "used for the payment of charges against the estate and expenses of its administration, allowed by any court having jurisdiction thereof."[498] To prove divestment, a title insurer must show that the sale proceeds satisfied "charges against the estate or expenses of its administration," and that a court with proper jurisdiction allowed the satisfaction.

One court chastised several title insurers who had insured the title to property sold by an estate for not proving up the "careful tracing" required to show that the sale proceeds were used to satisfy estate expenses or charges.[499] The court was looking for hard evidence that estate debts had

[496] In Hall v. World Savings and Loan Ass'n, 189 Ariz. 495, 943 P.2d 855 (1997), the deed by which the owner/borrower took title recited that nominal consideration had been paid for the property. A judgment creditor sought to have the insured mortgage found junior to the judgment under a fraudulent conveyance statute, based on this notice. The court agreed "that the title company was [the lender] World's agent for purposes of the title report, and thus World is bound by whatever notice the title company had while acting within the scope of its authority." However, because only nominal consideration is often recited on deeds in Arizona, "nothing on the face of the recorded documents alerted either the title company or World to the possibility of fraud or the need for further investigation."

A Washington court held that a reference to an easement in a title insurance commitment provided "legal notice" of the encumbrance to the purchaser. *Nicklaus v. been paid, and it appears that the title companies did not have such evidence. Further, the court found that the payments were not made by court order, because the estate had operated under Washington's informal probate statute, citing a Fifth Circuit decision to that effect, which construed Texas law.[500]

Because a title insurer is not the taxpayer, the only authority under which it may challenge the imposition of an estate tax lien is by bringing a wrongful levy action against the United States. Such an action must be brought within "the expiration of 9 months from the date of the levy."[501] Another code section says that, in such an action, the third party may only challenge the levy, and not the amount of the assessment.[502]

In the 2007 decision of EC Term of Years Trust, the Supreme Court ruled that the code section that provides the right to challenge the amount of a levy is available only to the taxpayer.[503] Following that decision, the Ninth Circuit held that three title insurers did not have the right to challenge the estate valuation by the IRS which triggered the tax levy.[504] The title insurers relied on an earlier decision, United States v. Williams,[505] which had suggested that a third party could challenge the assessment. However, in EC Term of Years Trust, the Supreme Court said this interpretation of Williams was too broad. The Ninth Circuit thus held that justice did not require that the insurer be allowed to challenge the IRS's valuation of the assets in the estate:

> Justice does not require that § 1346 be embraced to avoid the § 7426 limitation on challenges to assessments. Had Jensen paid the estate taxes when due, or paid the installments and not gone bankrupt, she could not have challenged the assessment, because she had agreed to it. There is no good reason why her failure to pay the estate's taxes should reopen the valuation of Frisko Freeze, Inc. True, the homeowners and the title insurers that stepped into their shoes did not have a chance to challenge the assessment. But the assessment was not really their problem. Their problem was that the real estate chain of title included an estate that had not paid its taxes. A third party that pays a tax to eliminate a tax lien on the third party's property is, under § 7426(c), bound by the assessment on the property.

3.4.8 Right To Appeal Adverse Ruling

The policy gives the insurer the right to pursue an appeal in order to clear title or defend the insured.[506] When the insurer initially rejected a tender of defense, it may not assume control of the appeal, including choice of counsel, without the insured's consent.[507]

Most ALTA policies explicitly state that the insurer reserves the right to pursue an appeal "in its sole discretion," which clearly indicates the intent to leave that decision to the insurer. Some and perhaps most states will permit the insurer to make that election based on the policy's language.[508] However, some states have developed doctrines, applied to all lines of insurance, that require an insurer to appeal decisions adverse to the insured, under certain circumstances and without regard for the policy language.[509] In some states, the rule is stated that an insurer has a duty to appeal an adverse judgment when there are reasonable grounds therefor.[510]

When the insurer elects not to appeal, the judgment becomes the final determination in the action and, if it is adverse to the insured, loss is payable.[511] If the insured's title is threatened by other adverse claims or actions while an appeal is pending, the insurer may wish to consider the interim measures discussed at §3.4.4.[512]

[506] Condition 5(c) of the 2006 ALTA policies says: "Whenever the Company brings an action or asserts a defense as required or permitted by this policy, the Company may pursue the litigation to a final determination by a court of competent jurisdiction, and it expressly reserves the right, in its sole discretion, to appeal any adverse judgment or order." Conditions and Stipulations 4(c) of the 1992 ALTA policies contains a nearly identical provision.

Co.*, 149 Idaho 437, 235 P.3d 387 (Idaho 2010) (holding that "[u]nder the plain language in the insurance policy, Stewart Title had the contractual ability to abandon Mortensen's appeal and to instead tender full payment of the policy to Mortensen."); also, see Guarantee Abstract & Title Co., Inc. v. Interstate Fire & Cas. Co., Inc., 228 Kan. 532, 618 P.2d 1195 (1980). In Wei v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2018 WL 1870400 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), the court found that the insurer was not required to appeal a trial court judgment because the insureds prevailed at trial on the only issue for which there was policy coverage; the issue the insureds wanted to appeal was beyond the scope of policy coverage.

[509] Stalberg v. Western Title Ins. Co., 282 Cal.Rptr.43, 49 (1991) stated that an insurer "has a duty to defend its insureds until the final determination of the underlying action," citing CNA Casualty of California v. Seaboard Surety Co., 176 Cal.App.3d 598, 618, fn. 11, 222 Cal.Rptr. 276 (1986). In Stalberg, the insurer was found to have breached the duty to defend by refusing the appeal. In fact, the appeal was not refused. The insurer had insisted on trial counsel doing the appeal. The court held that the insurer had no right to insist on the choice of counsel, since it had "wrongfully denied a defense." Id. *Schneider v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. 3.4.9 Expenses Incurred While Insurer Is Clearing Title

The final determination provision establishes that the policy permits the insurer to clear title, and that no loss is payable unless and until the attempt to clear title fails. Except for very limited exceptions, then, the insurer is not required to pay the insured for expenses or claimed damages incurred while the insurer is clearing title.[513] As one court stated it:

> A title policy indemnifies rather than guarantees the state of the insured title. The policy does not guarantee that litigation will not occur, but, in fact, assumes the opposite, that many types of title defect litigation can occur. The insured's claim must await an adverse title determination by a court. "The claim only lies once a court speaks, and not before, and not if the court's judgment is favorable."[514]

The ALTA Homeowner's Policy reserves the right to pursue title clearance through a final determination, including all appeals, but also enumerates certain elements of loss the insurer will pay in the event that the insured is not permitted to occupy the property while title is being cleared. Paragraph 6.b(2) states that, if the insured is not permitted to occupy the land while title is being cured, the insurer shall pay rent for "a reasonably equivalent substitute residence," plus "reasonable costs ... to relocate any personal property ... for up to twenty-five (25) miles from the Land ... ." By implication, the policy does not provide coverage for any other expenses incurred by the insured while the insurer is clearing title.

Despite the policy terms, some courts have awarded damages to insureds when the insurer fails to take prompt action to clear title, or when it seeks to cure the title defect but is unsuccessful.[515] position in the property, which it refused to do. The court said that the insured was not required "to throw good money after bad" by bidding in while its case was on appeal. The insured was awarded policy limits.

See Holmes Development, LLC v. Cook, 2002 UT 38, 48 P.3d 895 (Utah 2002), which denied claims for lost lot sales, lost profit on those sales, and carrying costs for the property, because the insurer successfully defended the insured's title: "First American cured any claims of unmarketability of title by succeeding in establishing title in Holmes by litigation. Section 9(a) expressly provides that litigation is a 'reasonably diligent manner' of establishing title and curing any alleged title defects. Therefore, according to the plain language of section 9(a), First American has 'fully performed its obligations with respect to that matter' and cannot 'be liable for any loss or damage caused thereby.'... In the policy, First American contracted to have 'no liability' to Holmes under the policy unless a court rendered a final judgment adverse to Holmes's title. …The result of the Keystone litigation was favorable to Holmes ... Accordingly, section 9(b) precludes Holmes from recovering further against First American beyond the costs First American incurred defending Holmes's title when the Keystone litigation quieted title in Holmes as against Keystone and no adverse final determination resulted."

Arizona Title Ins. & Trust Co*., 141 Ariz. 363, 687 P.2d 371 (Ariz.App. 1984), the court

Nebo, Inc. v. Transamerica Title Ins. Co.[516] is often cited by the insured as support for a claim for lost income from the property or other expenses incurred while the insurer is seeking to clear title. The Nebo court held:

> The provisions in the policy permitting the company, at its own cost and without undue delay, to litigate defects in title to final determination in a court of last resort, do not specify the company is not liable for actual damages resulting from the defect while the litigation goes on.[517]

Nebo interpreted an older form of policy that did not contain a final determination provision. Also, the insurer in Nebo did not take affirmative action to clear title, and did not disclose the then-pending lawsuit about ownership of the property in the policy. The insured was denied the right to collect rent from the income-producing property during the two years in which the lawsuit was pending. See §3.4.4 regarding measures which the insurer may take to assist the insured while title is being cleared and §3.4.5 regarding the final determination provision.

3.4.9.1 Lost Rent

The policy does not indemnify the insured for lost earnings from the property during the time in which the insurer is clearing title.[518] There are two reasons for this: such potential income is typically speculative and thus not "actual monetary loss or damage" incurred by the insured, and the policy states that no loss is payable until there has been a final determination in the litigation, and that result is adverse to the insured. Thus, when the title issue delays the construction of a building, which in turn delays the renting of that building to a tenant, the insurer is not required to pay the insured the projected rental income from the originally anticipated date of occupancy to the date on which the tenant is actually able to take possession. The policy also does not indemnify the insured owner against rent paid by the insured to lease alternate space, as discussed in §3.4.9.2.

However, when the insured purchases an existing building with existing tenants, and the insured's title is so questionable on the policy date that a court rules that a party other than the insured is entitled to the rent earned during the time title is in dispute, that lost rent is compensable under the policy because it represents "actual monetary loss or damage" that the insured will never found that the insurer was not guilty of bad faith for following a "do nothing" strategy in litigation which was approved by the insured and was part of a greater plan to acquire a larger parcel. In Hodas v. First American Title Ins. Co., 696 A.2d 1095 (Maine 1997), the court found an insured entitled to indemnity for a reduction in sale price which occurred when the property was sold during the course of the action to clear title, even though the insurer successfully removed the defect not long after the sale.

recover except from the insurer. Thus, in Nebo, Inc. v. Transamerica Title Ins. Co.,[519] the insured was found entitled to be paid as a policy loss the rent that the court ordered be paid to the competing owner during the pendency of the suit in which title was contested. In American Legion Ed Brauner Post v. Southwest Title & Ins. Co.,[520] the insured was found to be entitled to an indemnification payment equaling the rent the insured could have received from a tenant during the time in which the insurer was clearing title to extinguish a recorded lease.

When a competing owner claims the right to collect rent from the property, the insurer may wish to protect the insured by obtaining an agreement or order escrowing the rents, paying them into court, appointing a receiver or property manager who will use the rents to cover building expenses, or some similar arrangement. An arrangement that allows the insured to receive the rent if it succeeds in the litigation avoids the loss that the Nebo court found to be payable by the insurer. See §3.4.4 regarding stopgap measures that the insurer may take while a title clearance action is pending.

3.4.9.2 Carrying Expenses

FORM 64, Appendix A
Measure of loss payable if title clearance unsuccessful

The title insurer is not liable for payment of the insured's ownership costs for the real estate, such as taxes and debt service, during the time in which the insurer is paying to clear title.[521] As one court explained, such expenses are not losses incurred due to a title defect, but rather are ordinary costs of ownership; such expenses are most clearly not losses when the insured has the use of the property:

> ... Plaintiffs are fully compensated by the award of damages ... based on the difference in the fair market value of the properties with and without the defects established by the evidence. The damage awards on the negligence and breach of contract claims cannot be reconciled because they are based on two contrary assumptions. The contract award assumes that Plaintiffs retain the value of the property with the defects while the negligence award assumes Plaintiffs would never have purchased it if they had known of the defects. Because Plaintiffs retain their respective interests in the land, an award of their out-of-pocket costs associated with

Chirco Title Co.*, 2012 WL 11000 (Mich.App.) (unpublished) (insurer not responsible for paying ownership expenses and other claimed damages for the two-year period in which insurer was clearing title, which it succeeded in doing, although insured had bought property intending to quickly flip it). In Hilfer v. United States Mortgage & Title Guaranty Co., 14 N.J.Super. 456, 82 A.2d 463 (1951), the court held that the insurer was not required to pay the insured interest on borrowed money and real estate taxes it paid while the insurer was clearing title, although that effort was unsuccessful, because the insurer took immediate action to remove the title defect and paid the insured within 30 days after the loss was fixed. In Eureka Investors Corp. N.V. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 743 F.2d 932 (D.C. Cir. 1984), the court held that the insurer was not required to reimburse the insured for loan expenses and real estate taxes paid while title was being cleared, because the insured incurred those expenses as the owner of the property. In Aboussie v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 949 S.W.2d 207 (Mo.App.E.D. 1997), the insurer was found not to be liable to the insured for the real estate taxes, mortgage payments and property insurance it paid while the insurer (successfully) cleared title. A Michigan court refused to dismiss a claim for carrying costs incurred while title was being cleared. In Soto v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2008 WL 3049982 (E.D.Mich.) (unpublished), title was subject to a mortgage when the insured owner purchased it. The insurer later purchased the property at the sheriff's sale conducted by the adverse lender and tendered title to the insured, who insisted that he was also owed money damages. The appeals court considered the tender of title to resolve the defect, but reversed summary judgment in favor of the insurer because the insured might be able to prove consequential damages: "Inherent in fee simple ownership is the right to quiet enjoyment and possession. … Defendant did not provide Plaintiff with possession for several months, the result of which ended in the property falling into foreclosure. It was foreseeable that the Property would go into foreclosure, and Plaintiff alleges that Defendant delayed curing the defect in title to secure a more desirable purchase price. … Plaintiff has presented a question of fact as to whether the house falling to foreclosure arose naturally from Defendant's delay in curing the breach, and damages relating to the foreclosure are recoverable… . Because Defendant's actions to cure the title defect may have been too little too late, and did not make Plaintiff whole, Defendant is not entitled to Summary Judgment … ." In RA Southeast Land Company LLC v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2016 WL 4591740 (D.Nev.) (unpublished), the court found that the insurer was not liable for various kinds of carrying costs that the insured allegedly incurred while the insurer was protecting its title.

> ownership of the units such as maintenance, mortgage interest, insurance and taxes would result in a windfall.[522]

Another court held that the insurer was not responsible for the mortgage interest and property taxes paid by the insured while the title clearance litigation was pending, when any delay in the property's development was not directly caused by the title issue.[523]

The title insurer also is not responsible for expenses incurred by the insured in moving from the insured building, renting an alternative dwelling or similar expenses.[524] The policy also does not permit the insured to receive money for the claimed value of the enjoyment of the disputed portion of the property while its ownership is being litigated.[525] Under a loan policy, the title insurer is not obligated to pay the lender advances it makes while title is being cleared.[526] The title insurer also is not liable to an insured for the loss of the use of the money invested in the property while title is being cleared.[527]

[524] In Perry v. Stewart Title Co., 756 F.2d 1197 (5th Cir. 1985), the court rejected the purchaser's claims against both seller and title insurer for "house hunting expenses, the cost of moving from their house, the cost of renting an apartment after they moved, the loss of favorable financing and depreciation on the house, closing costs, and house payments made to" their lender. The claim concerned an encroachment onto an easement, which the insurer resolved by buying a partial release of the easement for $100. The purchaser had insisted on rescinding the sale despite the easement holder's willingness to release. Because the insurer had obtained the release at its own cost, the purchaser obtained no judgment award against the insurer. In Perry, the insurer was sued in its role as escrowee, not on the policy, but the result is entirely consistent with principles governing policy claims. In Marchetti v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 829 F.3d 498 (7th Cir. (Ill.) 2016), the insureds originally asserted that the insurer was required to reimburse them for rent they paid for another dwelling during the time in which their ownership and right to possess the insured property was being litigated, but they withdrew that claim, and the court found that such rent was not compensable under the policy.

[525] In Miller v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 194 Or.App. 17, 93 P.3d 88 (Or.App. 2004), a portion of the yard adjacent to the insureds' house was claimed by the neighbor. The neighbor had the better record ownership claim, but the insurer paid for an adverse possession lawsuit that was successful. The insureds demanded money for the loss of use of the disputed land during the lawsuit, which the court denied, based on the final determination clause.

[526] See First American Bank v. First American Transp. Title Ins. Co., 759 F.3d 427 (5th Cir. (La.) 2014), which held that carrying costs incurred by the lender were not caused by the covered lien claims, and that the insurer had not agreed to pay such expenses while it exercised its valid right to clear title. However, in Guernsey Bank v. Milano Sports Enterprises, L.L.C., 2011 WL 1780911 (Ohio App. 10 Dist.), 2011-Ohio-2162 (unpublished), the court held that such expenses were within the scope of losses payable because protective advances are included in the definition of "indebtedness." The court ignored the fact that the word "indebtedness" is not used in the measure of loss provision, and that the full amount of the debt is calculated only if the insurer elects to purchase the loan from the insured. In Bank of Sacramento v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2011 WL 6396533 (9th Cir. (Cal.)) (unpublished), the court found that a complaint survived a motion to dismiss when it alleged that the insurer was required to pay carrying costs incurred by the lender while the insurer was clearing title by litigation, and the lender claimed that the insurer did not clear title with reasonable diligence.

3.4.9.3 Construction Expenses

FORM 45, Appendix A
Denial of delay damage claim

An insured's claim for money spent to build improvements on the property after the date of policy is inconsistent with the policy's measure of loss as the diminution in value to the property due to the covered title defect.[528] When a title defect is discovered while the insured is constructing improvements on the property, the defect may halt the project. If the insurer elects to cure title, it will ordinarily wish to attempt to avoid a construction stoppage. Frequently, however, the decision to halt funding or construction is made by the construction lender or the borrower and not the insurer, even despite the insurer's good faith attention to solving the title problem. When work has stopped, an insured owner may seek payment for its expenses incurred because of the delay. Except in the most unusual situation, such expenses are not payable.

As stated above, the current forms of policy state that damages do not accrue while the insurer clears title. Thus, in Lawyers Title Ins. Co. v. Synergism One Corp.,[529] the court held that construction delay expenses were not payable because the title matter was resolved in a reasonable time (33 months):

> We agree with appellant and hold that only paragraph 7(b) [equivalent of 9] applies to the facts of this case. A title policy indemnifies rather than guarantees the state of the insured title. The policy does not guarantee that litigation will not occur, but, in fact, assumes the opposite, that many types of title defect litigation can occur. The insured's claim must await an adverse title determination by a court. "The claim only lies once a court speaks, and not before, and not if the court's judgment is favorable." D. Burke, Law on Title Insurance (1986 & 1988 Supp.), section 9.4.3, titled Staying partnership's sale proceeds were held in escrow pending the removal of the title defect. The court ruled that "only the direct losses [the insured] sustained are recoverable." The insurer was not required to pay partners in the insured partnership the lost earnings from their shares of the proceeds while the money was tied up in the real estate. The court said that "The individual claims for lost profits arise from losses relating to personal investments and/or personal loans, not debts or investments of the partnership. The individuals claim that they intended to either make certain investments or pay off certain loans with the money each would have received from the sale proceeds. These damages are remote and consequential in nature and not covered under the title insurance contract which is in the nature of an indemnity contract requiring actual loss [citations omitted]." In Buffington v. Atlanta Title & Trust Co., 43 Ga.App. 444, 159 S.E. 297 (1931), the court dismissed a similar claim, because the damages were caused not by a defect in title but the foreclosure of a lien reported in the policy.

[528] In Gray v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 27 A.3d 852 (N.H. 2011), the court rejected the insured owner's claim for building costs she had incurred on the property before she discovered that her title was bad, because the policy limits compensable loss to the diminution in value to the property or the land's value.

the Claim for Pending Litigation.[530]

Several early cases awarded as loss the cost to rebuild a structure on the property, to remove a structure from a neighbor's land, or an increase in construction cost due to the title defect. The cases involved earlier policy forms that did not contain final determination provisions. The seminal case on construction damages is Pennsylvania Laundry Co. v. Land Title & Trust Co.[531] That policy did not contain an exception for the rights of the public in an alley on the property, which rights forced the owner to reconfigure the building then under construction. The court permitted recovery for the added construction cost, stating that ""[a]nything which renders it necessary to spend more money in using a lot impairs the value of the land."[532] In Burks v. Louisville Title Ins. Co.,[533] a neighbor announced his claim of title to a portion of the property while construction was proceeding. The insurer had been aware of the insured's intent to build but did nothing to resolve the claim when made. The court said the title defect "not only deprived plaintiff of part of the land he had bought, but required him to change the location of his driveway, to do additional grading, and to delay his construction, which, with other consequential damages suffered by plaintiff, exceeded the amount of defendant's guaranty."[534] Similarly, in Buquo v. Title Guaranty & Trust Co.,[535] the policy was issued "guaranteeing the lines of" the lot based on a survey, with the insurer aware that the insured intended to build immediately. The insured built a wall on the lot line shown on the survey. The lot line was incorrect. The court held that loss equaled the cost to remove the wall plus the value of the land. However, it denied recovery for consequential damages resulting from the insured's lack of ability to complete the project. The insured had argued that the insurer was responsible for such damages because the cost of rebuilding the encroaching wall impoverished the insured.

3.4.9.4 Lost Profit Or Sale

The policy does not make the insurer responsible for paying a loss to the insured measured as the loss of profit the insured might have earned on a sale of the property that might have occurred while the insurer was clearing title.[536] Also, the loss payable to the insured for the loss of a portion of the insured parcel is not measured as the resale value of the lots that might have been platted in the disputed part of the land, which was unplatted when the policy was issued.[537] An insured that could have converted and sold condominium units while title was being cleared was found entitled to payment from the insurer of the value of those lost sales.[538] An insurer that cleared title was not liable to the insured for its claimed lost profit from a shopping center it was allegedly delayed in building while title was being protected.[539]

3.4.9.5 Decline In Land Value And Other Claimed Expenses

Insureds sometimes seek payment for other types of expenses or losses they claim to have incurred during the time in which title was being cleared.[540] A California case based on negligent

[536] In K Corp. Enterprises, Inc. v. Fidelity Nat'l Financial, Inc., 2015 WL 3755339 (Cal.App. 5 Dist.) (unpublished), the court held that a title insurer did not owe the insured owner for the profit it would have earned on a contract it lost during the time title was being cleared by the title insurer. The court said no loss was payable to the insured because the insurer cured the title issue. However, in Eureka Investors Corp. N.V. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 743 F.2d 932 (D.C. Cir. 1984), the court found that the insurer was responsible for lost profit on resale when the policy contained an endorsement protecting against the effect of the tenants' rights to object to the conversion of the apartments to condominium units. The tenants did object, and thus delayed the sale of units. The Eureka court, however, rejected a claim by the insured for loss of earnings, based on the notion that the insured was too "distracted" by the title problem to concentrate on other profitable business. Red Lobster Inns of America Inc. v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 656 F.2d 381 (8th Cir. 1981) has been cited as supporting a claim for lost profit from the operation of a business. In that case, the property was encumbered by a restriction not shown on the policy. The restriction prohibited the restaurant use for which the land was purchased. The insured settled the restriction claim, then sued for the profit it would have made during the delay period. The court approved the claim. Red Lobster was not a policy claim, however. It was premised on a separate contract by which the insurer specifically agreed to advise the insured of any restrictions of record that would be violated by restaurant use and to provide the insured with a copy of such restrictions. In Neikes v. Ticor Title Company of Oregon, 291 Or.App. 720, 423 P.3d 102 (Or.App. 2018), the title insurer obtained the release of a deed of trust, after which the insured suffered no loss, including a claimed lost sale, lost rent or an alleged decline in the property's value while its title was in jeopardy. In Marceaux v. Baker, 2019 WL 5701736 (Ariz.App. 1 Div.) (unpublished), a title insurer that paid for a confirming deed to the insured was not also liable to the insured for the value of a claimed lost sale of the property.

D. & C.2d 320, 1975 WL 16878 (Pa.Com.Pl. 1975), for example, a home builder-developer was denied its claimed loss of profit on the resale of lots when the existence of the title defect was claimed to have reduced the number of lots in the proposed subdivision by three, which the court considered too speculative a measure of loss.

[540] In Yesilevich v. Republic Title Co., 2011 WL 10068810 (Ill.App. 1 Dist.) (unpublished), when the title insurer diligently defended the insureds' title in litigation and settled the case, it was not liable for water damage and other deterioration of the building that occurred during the two years or so that the litigation was pending, during which time misrepresentation rather than policy loss found that a dentist-owner was entitled to reimbursement for his time spent trying to straighten out the title problem, but not at his professional rate.[541]

Courts disagree as to whether or not the insurer can be liable to the insured for any decline in the value of the property between the date of policy and the date of loss. Several decisions involving property that had declined in value set the date of loss as the policy date, which is a means of causing the insurer to pay not only the diminution in value caused by the covered matter but also the decline in the property's value from the policy date to the date on which the claim is paid.[542] However, other courts have rejected such claims, holding that the policy does not assure that the property has any particular value, and that diminution in value caused by the covered matter is the sole loss payable under the policy.[543] A complete collection of those decisions is found at §3.2.3.4, concerning the the insureds did not have possession of the building. In Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. Tilden, 110 P.3d 865, 2005 WY 53 (Wyo. 2005), an insurer was found liable to the insured for his attorneys' fees in an arbitration, despite the fact that the insurer cleared title and the arbitrator found no compensable loss, because the arbitrator also determined that it took an unreasonably long time to clear title. The court based the award of attorneys' fees on a state law that says "[i]n any actions or proceedings commenced against any insurance company," the insured may recover attorney's fees when an insurer "refuses to pay the full amount of a loss covered by the policy and that the refusal is unreasonable or without cause." In such cases, "any court in which judgment is rendered for a claimant may also award a reasonable sum as an attorney's fee and interest at ten percent (10%) per year." § 26-15-124(c), Wyoming Statutes.

[542] In Equity Income Partners LP v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2012 WL 3871505 (D.Ariz.) (unpublished), the court held that loss was to be measured on the date the loan was made, because according to the court that is when the lender suffered its loss. The Equity Income court relied on G&B Investments, 460 B.R. 848 (Bkcy.S.D.Miss. 2011), which flatly held that "[a]llowing the insurer to wait to value the [insured interest] in a falling real estate market works to the insurer's benefit, a result that does not construe an ambiguity in the policy in favor of the insured." In First American Title Ins. Co. v. Johnson Bank, 353 P.3d 370, 237 Ariz. 490 (Ariz.App. 1 Div. 2015), the insured deed of trust was not defective. The claim concerned a use restriction. The facts were thus similar to those in Equity Income. The Arizona appeals court adopted the reasoning of Equity Income, and set the policy date as the loss date. The Arizona Supreme Court accepted review, however. The high court significantly modified the appeals court rulings and rejected the reasoning of Equity Income. 239 Ariz. 348, 372 P.3d 292 (Ariz. 2016). In Johnson Bank, the Supreme Court adopted the date of policy as the loss date, but only as to the facts of that claim. The court said that, "[w]hen the title defect is an undisclosed lien, the foreclosure date might well be the appropriate valuation date because the lender's damage results from not having priority in the foreclosure proceeds." One of the authorities that supported that limited rule, the court said, was the criticism of Equity Income found in Christopher B. Frantze, Equity Income Partners LP v. Chicago Title Insurance Co. and Recovery Under A Lender's Title Insurance Policy in A Falling Real Estate Market, 48 Real Prop. Tr. & Est. L.J. 391 (2013). Also, the Supreme Court rejected the ruling of the appeals court, which had assumed that the title defect caused the borrowers to default in order to grant summary judgment to the lender. The high court said that, "[o]n remand, Johnson Bank will have to prove that the title defect caused the borrowers' default and subsequent foreclosure to justify using the date of the policies as the valuation date. If Johnson Bank fails to satisfy this burden, then the proper valuation date is the foreclosure date." The Johnson Bank court also said: "[u]nder the policies, First American did not expressly agree to indemnify or otherwise insure against the risk of a drop in the real estate market." Decisions on owner's policies that have addressed the question of whether or not depreciation in the value of the land can be claimed as loss under the policy are discussed at §3.2.3.4 and §3.4.9.5. In Whitlock v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 399 S.C. 610, 732 S.E.2d 626 (S.C. 2012), the South Carolina Supreme Court held that loss under an owner's policy is measured as of the date of policy, which ruling may also apply to loan policies. See §3.2.3.4 for a complete discussion of the date of loss under an owner's policy, and §3.2.4.2 concerning the date of loss under a loan policy.

owner's policy date of loss, and §3.2.4.2, which discusses the loan policy date of loss. Several courts have awarded the insured the decline in property value for some period of time when the insurer responded to the claim by seeking to clear title but, in the court's opinion, the insurer did not clear title with reasonable diligence. Those decisions are found at §3.4.1, which discusses the so-called covenant to clear title diligently.

Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co. v. Sun Valley Credit, LLC, 2015 WL 807055 (unpublished). In Premier Community Bank, the insurer obtained an equitable lien on the property and converted it to title, which it tendered to the lender insured. The lender demanded to be paid the amount by which the property had declined in value from the policy date to the day on which title was tendered to it. The court rejected that claim, and found that the insurer owed no money to the lender for the decline in value. It rejected the Citicorp analysis, because Citicorp had ignored the insurer's right to tender title to the insured in full satisfaction of its policy duties. See §3.4.6.1 for a complete discussion of that principle. A South Carolina court rejected the insured's claim for a decline in property value during the time in which the successful title clearance action was pending, in First Federal Savings Bank v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 451 S.E.2d 916 (S.C.App. 1994). In Bank of Sacramento v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2011 WL 6396533 (9th Cir. (Cal.)) (unpublished), vacating 2010 WL 3784096 (E.D.Cal.), the Ninth Circuit vacated a district court ruling that definitively stated that a bank may not collect as loss the depreciation in the property's value during the time in which the insurer is clearing title. However, the appeals court held only that the bank "has alleged legally cognizable damages caused by the claimed breach in the form of increased carrying costs for any additional time title was unmarketable due to the alleged lack of reasonable diligence." It said it did "not reach the validity of any of the other damages theories asserted by the Bank." The decision is unpublished. In In re Evans, 2011 WL 6258881 (Bkcy.S.D.Miss.) (unpublished), the court said that the title insurers "did not assume … the risk … that the real property that secured OmniBank's loans maintained its value in the marketplace." In accord is First American Bank v. First American Transp. Title Ins. Co., 759 F.3d 427 (5th Cir. (La.) 2014). In Wade v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 82 N.E.3d 763, 2017 IL App (1st) 161765, 415 Ill.Dec. 559 (Ill.App. 1 Dist. 2017), the court refused to award the insured the decline in value of the property or the insured's carrying costs while the insurer was clearing title without litigation. It relied on prior Illinois decisions in saying that "... title insurance does not provide coverage of the loss of value to the land itself. Rackouski v. Dobson, 261 Ill.App.3d 315, 318, 199 Ill.Dec. 875, 634 N.E.2d 1229 (1994). 'If the value of the property appreciates or depreciates, the title policy is not affected.' McLaughlin v. Attorneys' Title Guaranty Fund, Inc., 61 Ill.App.3d 911, 916, 18 Ill.Dec. 891, 378 N.E.2d 355 (1978)." The Wade court said that the policy itself "evinces an intent by the parties to preclude defendant from liability from the loss in value to plaintiff's property," citing the final determination provision, which says the insurer owes no loss payment if it clears title. See also the cases discussed at §§3.4.1, 3.4.5 and 3.4.6. In Neikes v. Ticor Title Company of Oregon, 291 Or.App. 720, 423 P.3d 102 (Or.App. 2018), the title insurer obtained the release of a deed of trust, after which the insured suffered no loss, including a claimed lost sale, lost rent or an alleged decline in the property's value while its title was in jeopardy.

3.5 Payment Of Policy Limits

FORM 65, Appendix A
Tender of policy limits

An insured's recovery under the title insurance policy may not be in an amount greater than the policy limit.[544] All title insurance policies state that the insurer may satisfy all policy obligations, including the duty to defend, by tendering policy limits.[545] This provision has been consistently upheld.[546] However, state law generally controls as to whether or not an insurer may terminate the duty to defend by payment of policy limits. See §4.11 for a complete discussion of the pay-and-walk principle and policy terms.

The option to pay policy limits rests with the insurer. The insurer is never obligated to pay policy limits, since the insurer always has at least one other option provided by the policy, which is payment to the insured of the value of the property. Thus, when a title clearance action is taken but the title defect is limited rather than eliminated, loss is payable for the diminution in value of the land as encumbered by the defect as limited.[547] The insurer does not owe policy limits as a form of punishment for not having entirely eliminated the encumbrance.[548]

If an inflation protection endorsement has been attached to the policy, the insurer must

Corp*., 282 F.R.D. 423 (N.D.Ill. 2012) (all duties cease on payment of policy limits). The Idaho Supreme Court held that an insurer that paid policy limits had satisfied all of its policy duties, in Anderson v. Title Ins. Co., 103 Idaho 875, 655 P.2d 82 (1982). In Mattson Ridge, LLC v. Clear Rock Title, LLP, 824 N.W.2d 622 (Minn. 2012), the Minnesota Supreme Court reversed an appeals court ruling that the insurer was liable for more than policy limits for its failure to fix an allegedly ambiguous legal description. In Friedeberg v. Bullard, 2019 WL 1416473 (unpublished), recommendations adopted in 2019 WL 1412106 (E.D.Ark. 2019) (unpublished), aff'd 783 Fed.Appx. 648 (8th Cir. 2019), all claims by the insured based on the policy were terminated when the insurer paid the policy limits to the insured, including the insured's claim against the insurer that the policy had been issued without a "proper" title examination and his bad faith claim.

[547] See Ruger v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 1996 WL 769793 (Del.Super.) (unpublished), in which the insurer tendered policy limits but declined to clear title as demanded by the insured.

calculate the current amount of the policy in order to pay policy limits.[549] In those states that consider the insurer to have a fiduciary obligation to the insured while a claim is pending, that duty ceases when the insurer pays policy limits.[550] See §9.1.3.1 for a more complete discussion of the assertion that a title insurer owes a fiduciary duty to an insured.

3.6 Paying Party Adverse To Insured

The insurer may also resolve a claim by getting a deed, release or satisfaction of an adverse party's interest in or lien on the insured parcel.[551] For example, the insurer may pay off a lien,[552] or obtain a deed for the insured. The insurer may settle a lawsuit in which a third party asserts a right in the property by an agreement that resolves the title issue.[553] See also §3.7, discussing the closely-related subject of the insurer obtaining the conveyance of a right to the insured in order to establish title as insured.

[549] Barthels v. Santa Barbara Title Co., 28 Cal.App.4th 674, 33 Cal.Rptr.2d 579 (Cal.App. 2 Dist. 1994). In Appleby v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 80 A.D.3d 546, 914 N.Y.S.2d 257, 2011 N.Y. Slip Op. 00170 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept.), involving a policy containing a New York TIRSA market value rider, the court held that the insurer was not entitled to summary judgment declaring that payment of the face amount of the policy was its maximum liability for a lack of access, because the rider states that the amount of insurance is the property's market value on the date of loss, as established by three appraisers.

[550] Thus, when the insured and insurer jointly sought to recoup their losses after the insurer paid the claim, the insurer was found not to have a fiduciary duty to disregard its own interest and agree to a settlement that only benefited the insured, in Security Title Guar. Corp. of Baltimore v. McDill Columbus Corp., 543 So.2d 852 (Fla.App. 1989).

[551] Condition 7(b)(i) of the 2006 ALTA policies states that the insurer has the right "to pay or otherwise settle with other parties for or in the name of an Insured Claimant any claim insured against under this policy. In addition, the Company will pay any costs, attorneys' fees, and expenses incurred by the Insured Claimant that were authorized by the Company up to the time of payment and that the Company is obligated to pay… ." (unpublished), the insurer purchased a loan secured by a deed of trust with priority over the insured deed of trust, after litigating priority for the insured. It did not immediately remove the lien. The court dismissed a lender's claim for alleged lost profit on the sale of its loan that it claimed was foiled due to the existence of the prior lien, finding that it posed no threat to the insured once owned by the insurer.

3.7 Obtaining Title For Insured

Another option for the insurer is to obtain a conveyance to the insured of land or a property right such as an easement in order to establish title as insured in the policy. If the insurer succeeds in establishing title as insured, no loss is payable to the insured.[554] This option is sometimes used when the claim involves a lack of a right of access to the property. See §3.2.3.1.5 for a complete discussion of resolving a claim concerning lack of access, including the purchase of an access right. Also, if the insured's title to a portion of the property is defective, the insurer is sometimes able to resolve the claim by obtaining a conveyance of the property from its rightful owner to the insured.[555]

If the insurer elects to consider this alternative, it is not required to pay a price for the lost property that far exceeds the land's true value. It is not uncommon for the true owner to demand payment of a ransom price when he or she learns that an insurance company is trying to obtain the land for an insured. Similarly, the insured is not entitled to purchase the land at whatever price the seller demands, and then be fully reimbursed by the insurer.[556] Rather, loss is still measured as the true value of the lost parcel, if a separate parcel, or the difference in value between the entire parcel as insured and the land actually owned by the insured. The insurer will typically either pay the true diminution value to the insured as loss, or to the property owner to acquire the land, after which no loss is payable to the insured.

Also, when the insured purchases the lost land before tendering a claim to the insurer, or without the insurer's written consent given in advance, the voluntary settlement provision will ordinarily apply, meaning that the insurer is not required to reimburse the insured. The voluntary settlement provision is discussed at §2.14. Even if a claim is payable despite the insurer's prior written consent for the purchase, the loss payable may be less than the purchase price paid by the insured, which may not have reflected the property's true value.

Similarly, the insurer is not required to purchase for the insured's benefit more land than was insured. On occasion, the true owner of the lost parcel is willing to sell the land, but only as part of a larger parcel. In such a case, the insured is entitled to be indemnified only for the value of the land insured in the policy.[557] Although the insured incurs additional cost to purchase the uninsured land, that property also has value that accrues to the insured's benefit.

[554] See Neikes v. Ticor Title Company of Oregon, 291 Or.App. 720, 423 P.3d 102 (Or.App. 2018), in which the title insurer delivered title to the insured free of the covered matter, a deed of trust, after which the insured suffered no loss, including a claimed lost sale, lost rent or an alleged decline in the property's value while its title was in jeopardy.

[555] See Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. Synergism One Corp., 572 So.2d 517 (Fla.App. 4 Dist. 1990), for example, in which the insurer obtained a quit claim deed from a neighbor to quiet his claim of title to the land.

[556] For example, in Hillsboro Cove, Inc. v. Archibald, 322 So.2d 585 (Fla.App. 1975), the insured paid about $50,000 to obtain title to a 30-foot strip of land. The affected parcel's proportionate value of the land when the insured purchased it three years earlier was found to be just $6,000, however. The court awarded the insured the proportionate value of the property rather than the amount it spent obtaining title. Hillsboro thus acknowledges that loss must be measured by an objective standard.

[557] In Lake Havasu Community Hospital, Inc. v. Arizona Title Ins. & Trust Co., 141 Ariz. 363, 687 P.2d 371 (App. 1984), the insured purchased a larger parcel than the land insured because the neighbor insisted on selling the larger parcel. The court held that the insurer was obligated to pay only for the land insured. The insured had paid an additional amount, but had received land that had additional value.

Occasionally, the insurer attempts to arrange this type of cure, but abandons the effort in order to resolve the claim a different way. While an insurer may become bound by contract to purchase a property right, the insurer cannot be required by the third party to purchase a right for the insured's benefit, in an action for specific performance, when the parties have only a tentative agreement about the conveyance of that property right.[558]

3.8 Purchasing The Insured Indebtedness

The loan policy states that the insurer may buy the indebtedness from the insured lender, on which all liability under the policy ceases.[559] Conditions 8 of the 2006 ALTA Loan policy states that loss is the least of the policy limit, the diminution in value to the property or the Indebtedness. Thus, the insurer has the option to purchase the debt, but is not obligated to do so when demand is made by the insured.[560] If the land is worth less than the debt, the insurer is not entitled to demand that the insured sell the debt on payment of the value of the land, but the insured may agree to do so.

The 2006 ALTA Loan policy adds a definition of "Indebtedness" at Conditions 1(d).[561] This provides a very inclusive list: principal, principal advanced after date of policy, interest, prepayment penalties, cost of foreclosure, and advances to protect the mortgage lien or to prevent waste. The 1992 ALTA policy, by contrast, used the phrase "unpaid principal indebtedness," as reduced under the pro tanto provision.[562] The effect of the definitional change in the 2006 policy is compounded by

[559] Condition 7(a)(ii) of the 2006 ALTA Loan policy states that, "[i]n case of a claim under this policy, the Company shall have the following additional options," one of which is: "To purchase the Indebtedness for the amount of the Indebtedness on the date of purchase, together with any costs, attorneys' fees, and expenses incurred by the Insured Claimant that were authorized by the Company up to the time of purchase and that the Company is obligated to pay. When the Company purchases the Indebtedness, the Insured shall transfer, assign, and convey to the Company the Indebtedness and the Insured Mortgage, together with any collateral security." Further, Conditions 7(a) states that "Upon the exercise by the Company of either of the options provided for in subsections (a)(i) or (ii), all liability and obligations of the Company to the Insured under this policy, other than to make the payment required in those subsections, shall terminate, including any liability or obligation to defend, prosecute, or continue any litigation."

[560] Miller v. Commercial Standard Ins. Co., 248 So.2d 675 (Fla.App. 2 Dist. 1971).

[561] "… the Indebtedness is the sum of (i) the amount of the principal disbursed as of Date of Policy; (ii) the amount of the principal disbursed subsequent to Date of Policy; (iii) the construction loan advances made subsequent to Date of Policy for the purpose of financing in whole or in part the construction of an improvement to the Land or related to the Land that the Insured was and continued to be obligated to advance at Date of Policy and at the date of the advance; (iv) interest on the loan; (v) the prepayment premiums, exit fees, and other similar fees or penalties allowed by law; (vi) the expenses of foreclosure and any other costs of enforcement; (vii) the amounts advanced to assure compliance with laws or to protect the lien or the priority of the lien of the Insured Mortgage before the acquisition of the estate or interest in the Title; (viii) the amounts to pay taxes and insurance; and (ix) the reasonable amounts expended to prevent deterioration of improvements; but the Indebtedness is reduced by the total of all payments and by any amount forgiven by an Insured."

[562] Conditions & Stipulations 7(a)(ii) of the 1992 ALTA loan policy states that loss is limited to: "the amount of the unpaid principal indebtedness secured by the insured mortgage as limited or provided under Section 8 of these Conditions and Stipulations or as reduced under Section 9 of these Conditions and Stipulations, at the time the loss or damage insured against by this policy occurs, together with interest thereon ... ."

the elimination of the pro tanto provision. The 1992 and prior policies said that payment of the debt reduced the policy amount dollar for dollar. With that language erased, it will be far less common for the Indebtedness to be less than policy limits, particularly if the borrower is in default, because default interest, penalties and attorneys' fees are all added to the Indebtedness.

In those cases in which the Indebtedness is less than policy limits or diminution, the insurer will almost invariably wish to exercise the option to purchase the loan. The insurer is entitled to a full assignment of the loan and delivery of the loan documents when it purchases the debt from the insured.

4 Duty to Defend

One of the insurer's options in resolving a claim is to defend an insured who has been sued. The other options in resolving a covered claim are discussed in Chapter 3. The defense of an insured is not, strictly, an alternative to the other options which the insurer normally possesses. Rather, the duty to defend is separate from and in addition to the duty to indemnify. However, the two duties are complementary, in that a successful defense of the insured's title satisfies the duty of indemnity also.[1]

The law concerning an insurer's duty to defend an insured is local in nature. The reader must consult state law on all issues concerning the duty to defend, in addition to the cases cited herein. There are several related subjects discussed in other portions of this treatise. The insurer's right to bring an action to cure title is discussed at §3.4. The insurer's right to resolve the claim by settling with the adverse claimant is discussed at §3.6. Insurer bad faith is covered in Chapter 16.

4.1 Policy Provisions Regarding The Duty To Defend

The policy creates a duty to defend the insured in litigation for which the policy provides coverage. This duty is addressed in almost every provision of the policy. The defense duty is referenced in the Covered Risks. The 1992 policy states the following on the policy cover, below the list of insuring provisions:

> The Company will also pay the costs, attorneys' fees and expenses incurred in defense of the title, as insured, but only to the extent provided in the Conditions and Stipulations.

The 2006 policies contain a nearly-identical recital below the statement of Covered Risks.

The title insurance policy is not a "consuming" policy—that is, the amount of insurance coverage is not reduced by the attorneys' fees and expenses incurred in defending the insured, as is the case with many other types of insurance policies. This principle is restated in Condition 8 of the 2006 policies (Conditions & Stipulations 7 of the of the 1992 ALTA policies), regarding the extent of liability for a claim of loss, which says:

---

[1] See §3.4.5, discussing the final determination of loss provision, found at Condition 9(b) of the 2006 ALTA policies and Conditions & Stipulations 8 and 9, respectively, of the 1992 ALTA Owner's and Loan policies.

> The provisions of this paragraph shall not apply to costs, attorneys' fees and expenses for which the Company is liable under this policy ... .

The same rule is stated in Condition 10 of the 2006 ALTA policies (Conditions & Stipulations 10 of the 1992 policies), having to do with the reduction of the Amount of Policy after payment of a loss:

> All payments under this policy, except payments made for costs, attorneys' fees and expenses, shall reduce the amount of the insurance pro tanto.

There is no duty to defend matters excluded, as is discussed further at §4.4. The preamble to the Exclusions states:

> The following matters are expressly excluded from the coverage of this policy and the Company will not pay loss or damage, costs, attorneys' fees or expenses which arise by reason of:

Condition 5(a) of the 2006 ALTA policies (Conditions & Stipulations 4(a) of the 1992 ALTA policies) contains three related limits on the duty to defend: (a) the duty to defend is limited to causes of action covered by the policy; (b) the insurer may retain its choice of counsel to represent the insured as to the covered counts of the complaint; and (c) the insurer will not pay attorney fees for non-covered counts:

> [T]he Company, at its own cost and without unreasonable delay, shall provide for the defense of an insured in litigation in which any third party asserts a claim adverse to the title or interest as insured, but only as to those stated causes of action alleging a defect, lien or encumbrance or other matter insured against by this policy. The Company shall have the right to select counsel of its choice (subject to the right of the insured to object for reasonable cause) to represent the insured as to those stated causes of action and shall not be liable for and will not pay the fees of any other counsel. The Company will not pay any fees, costs or expenses incurred by the insured in the defense of those causes of action which allege matters not insured against by this policy.

See §4.7 below for further discussion of the insurer's provision of a partial defense. These limitations on the scope of the duty to defend are reiterated in Conditions 7(b) and 8(d) of the 2006 ALTA policies.

The insured has several duties regarding defense of an action. The first is to tender a request for defense:

Duty to Defend

> Upon written request by the Insured, and subject to the options contained in Section 7 of these Conditions, the Company, at its own cost and without unreasonable delay, shall provide for the defense of an Insured in litigation in which any third party asserts a claim covered by this policy adverse to the Insured.[2]

The subject of the duty to tender defense is discussed at §4.3. The insured also is obligated to cooperate in his or her defense:

> In all cases where this policy permits or requires the Company to prosecute or provide for the defense of any action or proceeding and any appeals, the Insured shall secure to the Company the right to so prosecute or provide defense in the action or proceeding, including the right to use, at its option, the name of the Insured for this purpose. Whenever requested by the Company, the Insured, at the Company's expense, shall give the Company all reasonable aid (i) in securing evidence, obtaining witnesses, prosecuting or defending the action or proceeding, or effecting settlement, and (ii) in any other lawful act that in the opinion of the Company may be necessary or desirable to establish the Title or any other matter as insured. If the Company is prejudiced by the failure of the Insured to furnish the required cooperation, the Company's obligations to the Insured under the policy shall terminate, including any liability or obligation to defend, prosecute, or continue any litigation, with regard to the matter or matters requiring such cooperation.[3]

The insured's incipient claim of loss is not payable until the defense of the action is concluded: "[w]henever the Company brings an action or asserts a defense as required or permitted by this policy, the Company may pursue the litigation to a final determination by a court of competent jurisdiction, and it expressly reserves the right, in its sole discretion, to appeal any adverse judgment or order."[4]

The duty to defend is satisfied on payment of policy limits to the insured. If that option is exercised by the insurer:

> ... all liability and obligations of the Company to the Insured under this policy, other than to make the payment required in this subsection, shall terminate, including any liability or obligation to defend, prosecute, or continue any litigation.[5]

However, payment of policy limits must be accompanied by payment of:

any costs, attorneys' fees, and expenses incurred by the Insured Claimant that were authorized by the Company up to the time of payment or tender of payment and that the Company is obligated to pay.[6]

The defense duty also terminates on settlement with either the adverse claimant or the insured. The balance of this chapter will address these policy provisions, and the common issues encountered as to the duty to defend.

4.2 Defense Obligation Runs To Insureds Only

The insurer's obligation to defend extends only to those parties who are insureds under the policy. The subject of the definition of "insured" is fully discussed in Chapter 7. The insurer does not owe duties to the parties in the title litigation who are adverse to the insured.[7]

4.3 Tender Of Defense

All modern ALTA policies require a written tender of defense by the insured to the insurer in order to invoke the duty to defend the insured in litigation.[8] Several decisions interpreting earlier policy forms found that a formal written tender was not required by those policies' terms, however.[9] Notice provided by the insured to a title agent, or other notice short of a tender of defense, has been found not to qualify as a tender.[10] A notice of claim made prior to the time the insured is sued is also not a tender of defense.[11]

Therefore, the insurer did not owe money to the defendants in the access case for their legal fees in prevailing against the insured.

(unpublished), both of which state that written tender of defense is required by the policy. See Condition 5(a) of the 2006 ALTA policies, which states that the insurer shall defend the insured "[u]pon written request by the Insured… ."

[9] In Allison v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 907 F.2d 645 (7th Cir. 1990), which concerned the 1970 ALTA owner's policy, the court found that notice of the suit and an indication by the insured of a willingness to allow the insurer to defend was sufficient to invoke a duty to defend. The Allison court acknowledged that later ALTA policies, by contrast, contain a tender requirement. Similarly, in Overholtzer v. Northern Counties Title Ins. Co., 116 Cal.App.2d 113, 253 P.2d 116 (Cal.App. 1 Dist. 1953), notice short of a formal tender was found to create a duty to defend under an older California Land Title Association policy form.

Duty to Defend

The current ALTA policies do not obligate the insurer to pay legal fees and expenses incurred before the insured tenders its defense to the insurer, although the insurer has been found to have a duty to pay defense fees incurred by the insured after tender and before the insurer's acceptance of the defense.[12] The effect of prejudice caused by a tardy tender of defense is discussed at §2.3.3. The effect of the insured's failure to cooperate generally is discussed at §4.10.

When a lawsuit involves more than one insured, each is required to tender his or her defense separately.[13] The general rule is as stated by one commentator:

> [T]hird party notice should not satisfy the insured's notice obligation unless the information provided by the third party is such as to put the company on notice that was filed that did not refer to lawsuit or request a defense was not a tender of defense; tender made eight months later, after judgment was entered, was tardy).

[12] TES Properties, LLC v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 2008 WL 1767713 (S.D.Tex.) (unpublished) held that "in Texas, title insurers are not liable for pre-notice costs," citing Houston Title Guaranty Co. v. Fontenot, 339 S.W.2d 347, 353 (Tex.Civ.App.-Houston 1960) (writ ref'd n.r.e.). The court explained that tender is related to the insurer's right to select and manage counsel, and tardy tender frustrates that right: "Ticor contracted for the right to select counsel, and not to pay the fees of other counsel." In Ogden Plaza Garage Company, LLC v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 6704366 (N.D.Ill.) (unpublished), the court held that a title insurer that accepted the insured's tender of defense and hired a firm other than the insured's choice of counsel was not required to pay the fees of the insured's law firm, not even the time spent by that firm in getting the insurer-retained firm up to speed. See also Nilesh Enterprises, Inc. v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 2009 WL 2998204 (W.D.Tex.) (unpublished) (no duty to pay for cost of litigation incurred before tender); San Jancinto Z, L.L.C. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2014 WL 1317696 (Cal.App. 4 Dist.) (unpublished), modified on denial of rehearing (April 24, 2014), rev.den. June 18, 2014 (insurer had no duty to defend lawsuit concluded before tender was made by insured as to several related lawsuits because there is no duty to pay for fees incurred before tender and there was nothing left to defend when tender was made). However, in Ventana Partners, LLC v. Lanoue Development, LLC, 267 Or.App. 15, 340 P.3d 107 (Or.App. 2014), the court held that the insurer had a duty to defend a lawsuit settled in principle six days before the insured tendered its defense to the insurer, on the slim argument that the case was not really settled before the tender. The court did not hold that the insurer had a duty to pay pre-tender fees, however. In Mulhearn v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 2014 WL 213554 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), rev.den. Apr. 9, 2014, the court found that the insurer was obligated to pay the nominal attorneys' fees incurred by the insured in the six weeks between tender and acceptance. In CH Properties, Inc. v. First American Title Ins. Co., 43 F.Supp.3d 83 (D.P.R. 2014), recons.den. 2014 WL 7140507 (D.P.R. Dec. 15, 2014), the court found that a title insurer had a duty to defend an insured from the time it became aware of a lawsuit, not from date of the tender that came much later, because it was already monitoring the suit, was defending another insured in the same suit, and used the law firm it had already hired to represent the second insured after the tender was made. The court ignored the language of the policy. It focused instead on the notion that the insurer was not "prejudiced" by the late tender, despite the fact that there is no prejudice limitation in the ALTA policy defense provision. However, in a later decision in the same case, the court said that the insurer was not required to pay the fees incurred by the insured for a second attorney retained by the insured to oversee the work of the counsel retained by the insurer. CH Properties, Inc. v. First American Title Ins. Co., 204 F.Supp.3d 416 (D.P.R. 2016). In Wei v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2018 WL 1870400 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), the court held that the insurer had no duty to pay for pre-tender defense fees under Condition 5(c) of the Homeowner's policy, which says "We are required to repay You only for those settlement costs, attorneys' fees and expenses that We approve in advance." The court said that "Stewart Title was not obligated to pay any fees it did not approve in advance, whether they were incurred pre-tender or afterwards."

> the insured might make a claim under the policy. For example, an insurance company employee might, in the course of handling a claim filed by one of the company's insureds, learn of facts that could give rise to a claim against another party. Unless the employee, however, has reason to know that the other party is insured by the same company, the insurer should not be deemed to have obtained notice of a claim by that insured.[14]

In rejecting the defense of one insured, the insurer should avoid any suggestion that it is rejecting the defense of insureds who have not tendered. If more than one insured is a defendant, the non-tendering insured's policy coverage may be different. Also, the title insurer has no database of current insureds, since no renewal premiums are paid, and does not know if other defendants are its insureds. An insurer that obtains notice of a lawsuit that might affect insureds' titles has no duty to investigate the suit to determine if it should be defending any of the parties, which the court said would impose a duty on the insurer "in terms of seeking out the identity of an unknown."[15] However, a decision construing the 1970 ALTA policy found that a tender by some was adequate notice on behalf of other insureds, all of whom were identically situated.[16]

4.4 Scope Of Duty To Defend

FORM 2, Appendix A
Retainer of counsel--no reservation of rights

The title insurance policy creates a duty to defend the insured in "litigation."[17] The term "litigation" has been held to cover a motion for an injunction that would affect the insured

[16] Allison v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 907 F.2d 645 (7th Cir. (Wis.) 1990). The court reached that conclusion based largely on the fact that the insurer's denial letter implied that the insurer would also reject a tender of defense by any other insured. The rejection letter stated that the company did not find a duty to defend "any" of the unit owners. It implied that the insurer had investigated the titles and believed that it had current policies on all units. The insureds argued successfully that any further tenders of defense would have been "futile," given the insurer's perceived intent to deny every tender.

[17] In Ogden Plaza Garage Company, LLC v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 6704366 (N.D.Ill.) (unpublished), the court ruled that the duty to defend begins when a lawsuit is filed, not when the insured receives notice that there is a controversy that might lead to litigation. Since the ALTA policy does not define "litigation," the court looked to Black's Law Dictionary to establish the word's plain and ordinary meaning. That definition is "[t]he process of carrying on a lawsuit; a lawsuit itself." Black's defines "lawsuit" as "[a]ny proceeding by a party or parties against another in a court of law." The court agreed with First American that the term "litigation" means "the filing of a lawsuit."

improvements and an adversary proceeding in bankruptcy.[18] However, the duty to defend does not ordinarily extend to administrative proceedings.[19]

State law provides the test by which the existence of a duty to defend is determined. A common test is as follows:

> The existence of an obligation to defend is, in general, determined by the allegations of the complaint. If the allegations of the complaint state a cause of action or facts that would support a cause of action within the coverage of the policy, the insurer must defend.[20]

This is sometimes known as the "four corners" test.[21] Other courts have correctly pointed out that the test really involves eight corners, since the allegations made in the four corners of the complaint must be compared to the terms found within the four corners of the policy.[22]

There is a duty to defend only when there is a potential for coverage under the policy. One text states:

Idaho) (unpublished) (land use contested case hearing over building permit application was not "litigation" and did not attack title, even though lack of access right was a reason for denying the permit, and therefore the insurer was not obligated to defend the insured in that proceeding). However, in 212 Marin Boulevard, LLC v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 8849641 (N.J.A.D. 2015) (unpublished), cert.den. 223 N.J. 280 (Oct. 5, 2015), the court held that the insurer was required to pay for non-litigation work that was in aid of the insured's defense in litigation, including attendance at public meetings, lobbying work, and tax advice. The court incorrectly said that "[t]here is nothing about the policy language to suggest that the promise to pay costs incurred in the defense of title would be strictly limited to the particular confines of the underlying lawsuits and would not extend to other efforts to vindicate the title conveyed." The court admitted that some courts have criticized the rule because it "allows an insurer to plead Sergeant Schultz's 'know nothing' defense, and 'thereby successfully ignor[e] true but unpleaded facts within its knowledge that require it, under the insurance policy, to conduct the putative insured's defense.'" As a result, some states have created an exception to the rule when the insurer knows that the "true facts" vary from the allegations in the complaint and suggest potential policy coverage.

(Pa.) 2018), the Third Circuit Court of Appeals gave an extended explanation of the four-corners rule, observing that the rule "is about administrative ease; it ensures courts can 'efficiently determine an insurer's duty to defend, which results in less distraction from the merits of the underlying suit.'" Also, the rule does not allow courts to "rewrite the contractual duty to defend to be triggered whenever any claim is made rather than only those claims covered under the actual policy terms."

> [T]he insurer must defend if, but only if, any of the allegations against the insured could result in a judgment that the insurer would be obligated to pay.[23]

If none of the possible outcomes of the lawsuit would result in coverage, there is no duty to defend the insured.[24]

The insurer is not relieved of a duty to defend the insured against claims because they are untenable; thus, the duty is not extinguished if there is little likelihood that the plaintiff will prevail, or if the allegations against the insured are frivolous.[25] The duty to defend also is not based on the actual outcome of the case, or the court's determination as to whether the allegations had been proven.[26] The duty is invoked if there would be a potential for coverage if the adverse claimant were to prove its allegations.[27]

However, if there is no such potential for coverage, the insurer does not owe a defense.[28]

[24] For example, in N E Properties, Inc. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 660 A.2d 926 (1995), the only possibilities were that the matter would be proven to be excluded or not a defect in title. The insurer had no duty to defend the insured. Similarly, in Insured Titles, Inc. v. McDonald, 275 Mont. 111, 911 P.2d 209 (1996), an insurer had no duty to defend or prosecute a suit on behalf of an insured after it had obtained title to the land insured. The court cited several Montana authorities for its ruling that "if the asserted claim is not covered by the policy, then the insurer has no duty to defend the insured." See also Buss v. Transamerica Ins. Co., 16 Cal.4th 35, 65 Cal.Rptr.2d 366, 939 P.2d 766 (1997) ("in an action wherein none of the claims is even potentially covered, the insurer does not have a duty to defend").

[25] Capital Bank v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 861 S.W.2d 84 (Tex.App.-Houston 1993). In Weber v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 169 Or.App. 24, 7 P.3d 714 (Or.App. 2000), the insured was sued by neighbors claiming an easement over his land to taxi their airplanes to a private airport. The insurer denied the defense, arguing that the "unrecorded easements" exception removed any potential for coverage. The easement was shown on a subdivision plat not in the insured's chain of title. The court held that there was a duty to defend because the plaintiff claimed a recorded easement, and the chain of title was a defense to be asserted in favor of the insured to defeat the plaintiff. See §9.1.3.1 for a full discussion of the rules of construction for the title insurance policy.

[26] See Casero v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2018 WL 830225 (D.Md.) (unpublished) (duty to defend not based on outcome of suit and decision on duty to defend should not be delayed until underlying case is decided, even when allegations of the parties are fluid).

Co*., 2018 WL 3992147 (Cal.App. 4 Dist.) (unpublished) (insurer had duty to defend although most claims and potential outcomes fell under exclusions).

[28] For example, an insurer had no duty to defend its insured when the bankruptcy adversary complaint alleged that the insured sale-leaseback was actually intended to grant a mortgage, rather than fee simple title as insured, in Ticor Title Ins. Co. v. FFCA/IIP 1988 Property Co., 898 F.Supp. 633 (N.D. Ind. 1995). The court said that the allegations in the complaint, if proven, would not invoke coverage under the title insurance policy. In Haley v. Hume, 448 P.3d 803 (Wash.App. 1 Div. 2019), the court held that there was no possibility of coverage for a lawsuit because of a survey exception, and therefore there was no duty to defend.

There is no duty to defend based on the speculation that the plaintiff might have some other right in the insured parcel even if it did not prove its allegations, when the right alleged in the complaint does not create the potential for coverage.[29]

The 2006 and 1992 ALTA policies explicitly adopt the "eight corners" test, by limiting the duty to defend to matters for which there would be a duty to indemnify. The policies specifically state that there is no duty to defend matters excluded from coverage. The 1970 policy also was found not to create a duty to defend matters excluded from the policy.[30] The policies also do not obligate the insurer to prosecute lawsuits or claims against third parties on behalf of its insured.[31]

The duty to defend is determined from the pleading in effect when the tender is made, and the duty ceases when the claims that create the potential for coverage are withdrawn, dismissed or otherwise cease to be asserted.[32] The duty to defend may only be triggered by the allegations in the complaint, not allegations that might be made if the complaint were amended.[33] Thus, one court said:

> An insured may not trigger the duty to defend by speculating about extraneous 'facts' regarding potential liability or ways in which the third party claimant might amend its complaint at some future date... . A corollary to this rule is that the insured may not speculate about unpled third party claims to manufacture coverage.[34]

Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co.*, 977 F.Supp.2d 1237, 24 Fla. L. Weekly Fed. D 192 (S.D.Fla. 2013), the court held that the insurer's duty to defend came into being when a third party filed a pleading that attacked the insured lien. He later amended the pleading, and the insured tendered after the amendment. The insurer asserted that the amended pleading invoked an exclusion. The court found that the exclusion did not eliminate all potential for coverage, and thus the amendment did not negate the duty to defend.

[33] Miller v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2006 WL 2440850 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished) (when complaint could not even be amended to bring the pleading within potential coverage, insurer had no duty to defend).

The insurer's first step in analyzing a tender of defense is to carefully read the pleading to determine if it creates the potential for a judgment against the insured for which there would be a duty to indemnify. One way to analyze the pleading is to begin with the prayer for relief, to determine if the adverse party seeks a remedy that would affect title as insured; then analyze the nature of the causes of action, to determine whether or not they assert claims that invoked covered risks as opposed to non-covered claims; then review the allegations of fact, to determine if there are recitals that appear to affect or challenge title as insured. The insurer should not base its decision on the duty to defend based only on its own interpretation of the plaintiff's intent, or on the subjective interpretation by the insured.[35]

The insured must establish that the allegations of the complaint invoke a covered risk or an affirmative coverage given by endorsement; if no coverage is invoked, there can be no duty to defend.[36] The duty to defend is determined by the nature of the rights or claims alleged. The mere

CV Reit, Inc.*, 588 So.2d 1075 (Fla.App. 1991), the insured lender was sued on "a collection of claims" by subdivision homeowners charging that the lender "was a co-developer of the project and that it received certain monies from the homeowners that it did not properly apply to the benefit of the homeowners and the homeowner's association." The insured tendered its defense to the insurer, asserting that it was "evident" that the homeowners sought an equitable lien prior to the lender's mortgage lien. The court disagreed, saying: "We do not find it 'evident' at all that such relief has been requested. Furthermore, whether or not a duty to defend exists arises from the allegations of the complaint itself, … not on some conclusions drawn by the insured based upon a theory of liability which has not been pled. … Since the allegations of the initial complaint did not allege facts which would bring the case within the coverage of the title insurance policy, it was error to enter partial summary judgment" in favor of the insured. 588 So.2d at 1075-6. Likewise, in Blaser v. DeVries, 2011 WL 5965762 (Mich.App.) (unpublished), the court said the question was "whether the underlying complaint arguably falls under the insurance policy, not whether a legal question regarding coverage will arguably be decided in favor of the insured. The fact that the insured credibly argued that the claims come within the policy coverage is irrelevant." In Banner Bank v. First American Title Ins. Co., 916 F.3d 1323 (10th Cir. (Utah) 2019), the Tenth Circuit refused to adopt the reasoning of the insured, that the allegations of the complaint should be read through the lens of the terms used in the later settlement agreement between plaintiff and defendant. The settlement agreement reframed the plaintiff receiver's allegations using terms designed to invoke policy coverage. The court said: "First, the Bank's position is inconsistent with Utah law. The duty to defend is broader than the duty to indemnify, but the duty to defend is determined from the face of the Receiver's complaint. If the Receiver's complaint was not enough to establish a duty to defend, how could the settlement agreement later create liability for indemnification? The Bank's position reverses the normal timeline, and it would effectively allow the duty to defend to attach retroactively. Second, we are hesitant to look to the settlement agreement for guidance because the parties certainly have an incentive to negotiate a settlement agreement that will create liability for the insurer, regardless of the true nature of the action."

[36] In Feduniak v. Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 6603253 (N.D.Cal.) (unpublished), the court found that the insurer had no duty to defend the insured in an action in which the plaintiff governmental body did not assert a defect in title but, rather, sought penalties for the insured's misconduct in failing to comply with its orders. In Sabatino v. First American Title Ins. Co., 308 Ill.App.3d 819, 721 N.E.2d 693, 242 Ill.Dec. 414 (Ill.App. 2 Dist. 1999), the complaint did not invoke a Covered Risk by asserting the tortious interference with an easement by the insured owners, without seeking a judicial determination as to the rights of the easement holder in the insured parcel. In Pete Lien & Sons, Inc. v. First American Title Ins. Co., 478 N.W.2d 824 (S.D. 1991), the insured asserted that there was a duty to defend based on the provisions of an ALTA 9 or comprehensive endorsement. In San Jancinto Z, L.L.C. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2014 WL 1317696 (Cal.App. 4 Dist.) (unpublished), modified on denial of rehearing (April 24, 2014), rev.den. June 18, 2014, the court found that a title insurer had a duty to defend the insured owner in a condemnation action brought after the policy date, because a lender asserted the right to be paid the condemnation award. The condemnor did not attack title.

reference to a recorded instrument in a pleading is not an assertion of rights under that instrument, and does not invoke a duty to defend without more.[37]

If the pleadings fall within the scope of the covered risks, the insurer reviews the exclusions and exceptions to analyze whether or not they take away any potential for coverage. If an exclusion has been modified by an endorsement coverage, the exclusion is analyzed considering the effect of the endorsement.[38] The insurer has the burden of proving that an exclusion applies.[39]

Many states broaden the four corners test to say that there is a duty to defend when the facts revealed by an investigation disclose the potential for coverage, even if the complaint does not implicate coverage. In those states, the insurer's third step is to evaluate any extrinsic facts believed by the insured to establish coverage.[40] The extrinsic evidence rule is further discussed at §4.4.3.

The duty to defend may also be triggered by an answer, cross-claim or counterclaim.[41]

The court said the lender put title in dispute by asserting that it was entitled to the award. In CH Properties, Inc. v. First American Title Ins. Co., 43 F.Supp.3d 83 (D.P.R. 2014), recons.den. 2014 WL 7140507 (D.P.R. Dec. 15, 2014), the court found that the insurer had no duty to defend the insured owner, CH Properties, in a declaratory judgment action brought by another insurer to a party named Sunshine, in which CH Properties was named solely because its contractual rights against Sunshine might determine Sunshine's rights under its title insurance contract. The court said that there was no possible outcome in that suit that could affect the insured's title.

Co.*, 585 So.2d 952 (Fla.App. 1991), in which the insured filed an action and the defendant counterclaimed to quiet title, and the counterclaim was held to create a duty to defend. In Associated Bank, N.A. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 881 F.Supp.2d 1058 (D.Minn. 2012), the court held that an answer that challenged the validity of the insured mortgage triggered the duty to defend. In San Jancinto Z, L.L.C. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2014 WL 1317696 (Cal.App. 4 Dist.) (unpublished), modified on denial of rehearing (April 24, 2014), rev.den. June 18, 2014, the court found that a lender's answer asserting that it had the sole right to be paid a condemnation award was a pleading that invoked a duty to defend, since that answer implicitly attacked the owner's title. In First Clover Leaf Bank v. National Land Title Ins. Co., 2015 WL 392728, 2015 IL App (5th) 120442-U (Ill.App. 5 Dist.) (unpublished), app.den. 32 N.E.3d 673 (Table) (May 27, 2015), the title insurer acknowledged that a counterclaim challenging the priority of the insured mortgage created a duty to defend; the court agreed with the insurer, however, that

However, an affirmative defense raised by a defendant in an action filed by the insured does not create a duty to "defend" the insured.[42] A general denial by a defendant to the allegations of the insured's complaint does not create a duty to prosecute the suit, although a general assertion of a right by the adverse party may.[43] The duty to defend may be invoked when the insured brings an action to quiet title to the insured property that is contested,[44] in which case the duty to defend springs from the adverse party's responsive pleading rather than the complaint.[45] However, as in a lawsuit in which the insured is the defendant, the insurer has no duty to defend against the pleading if the allegations against the insured do not invoke a covered risk.[46]

It is frequently stated that the duty to defend is broader than the duty to pay. This rubric seems inconsistent with the rule that there is a duty to defend only those matters for which there is a duty to indemnify. However, the two rules are compatible. The "broader duty" of defense means that the insurer has a defense duty for actions in which (a) the allegations of the complaint trigger an exclusion but the insured's counter-allegations would, if proven, not invoke the exclusion (see §4.4.1); (b) the complaint is so broad or ambiguous that it might support a claim for which the policy provides coverage (see §4.4.2); (c) the allegations in the complaint do not invoke a covered risk or do invoke an exclusion, but extrinsic facts suggest that a covered risk would be invoked or that the exclusion does not apply (see §4.4.3); or (d) the allegations that invoke a covered risk are frivolous (see §4.4.4). In each of these situations, there will be no duty to indemnify, but there may be a duty to defend. These four situations will be discussed in turn. Obviously, the insurer's duty to defend is broader than its duty to indemnify. But, just as obviously, it is not unlimited. It extends beyond claims that are actually covered to those that are merely potentially so--but no further. Both the duty the obligation to defend the counterclaim did not create a duty in the insurer to take over prosecution of the insured's foreclosure action.

[42] In Philadelphia Indem. Ins. Co. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 771 F.3d 391 (7th Cir. (Ill.) 2014), the court held that an affirmative defense, unlike a counterclaim, does not create a duty to defend. The policy limits the insurer's defense obligation to "litigation in which any third party asserts a claim adverse to the title or interest as insured." The court said that an affirmative defense is not a "claim." Likewise, in Yarbrough v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2015 WL 7451193 (D.Or.) (unpublished), the court held that an affirmative defense by the defendant that touched on a covered risk did not create a duty to "defend" the plaintiff-insured, because an affirmative defense is not a claim in litigation. The court relied on Philadelphia Indemnity for its ruling.

[43] For example, when the insured lender foreclosed and the borrower generally denied the validity of the mortgage, such a general denial did not obligate the insurer to prosecute the suit. Pioneer Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. Fourth Commerce Properties Corp., 487 So. 2d 1051 (Fla. 1986). However, in Hart v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 126 Hawai'i 448, 272 P.3d 1215 (Hawai'i 2012), the insured filed a lawsuit seeking to combine two parcels. The State of Hawai'i answered the complaint by stating that it reserved any claim to the land by escheat, which claim it later withdrew by an amended answer. The state supreme court reversed two lower courts to find that this perfunctory pleading obligated the insurer to pay for the insured's lawsuit.

to indemnify and the duty to defend are in fact dependent on coverage--the former on actual coverage, the latter on at least potential coverage.[47]

4.4.1 Insured's Defense Bringing Suit Within Coverage

In some cases, the allegations of the complaint, if proven, would not invoke a covered risk or would trigger an exclusion, but the insured makes allegations in response that would invoke a covered risk or which would cause the exclusion not to apply.

Many states find a duty to defend in these situations. A common title insurance example is when the plaintiff asserts a lien or title interest, and alleges that the insured was not a bona fide purchaser or encumbrancer for value without notice, but the insured asserts that he or she had no such notice. The plaintiff's version of the facts would invoke Exclusions 3(a) or 3(b), but the exclusions do not apply if the insured proves its case.[48]

The insurer should make its own investigation of the facts. If there is support for the insured's position, some states require the insurer to assume the defense. The insurer may be entitled to require the insured to deliver a written statement or affidavit attesting that its version of the facts is true. This is part of the insured's duty to cooperate with the insurer in the provision of a defense. The duty of cooperation is further discussed at §4.10. The insurer will want to reserve the right not to pay any judgment against the insured if the plaintiff's allegations are proven, and to retender the defense if it becomes apparent through discovery that there is no reasonable basis for the insured's position. See §4.9 regarding reservations of rights. In some jurisdictions, the insurer may also require the insured to indemnify the insurer for all attorney fees expended in the event that the finder of fact does not accept the insured's version of the story.

[48] "An insurer is not relieved of its duty to defend against a claim merely because the insured may be entitled to assert a valid affirmative defense such as the 1986 settlement agreement. Rather, we look to the face of the underlying complaint and try to determine therefrom whether any of the alleged claims fall within the title policy's coverage." Ticor Title Ins. Co. v. American Resources, Ltd., 859 F.2d 772, 774 (9th Cir. Hawaii 1988). In Premier Homes, Inc. v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 76 F.Supp.2d 110 (D.Mass. 1999), the insurer accepted a defense with a reservation of rights based on an allegation that the insured was not a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. The insured's motion for summary judgment was denied, after which the insurer retendered the defense. The insured settled the case five days later, and sued for breach of the duty to defend. The court found the insurer was obligated to defend the insured. A successful defense would have proven the falsity of the allegations that raised the policy coverage issue. Therefore, the insurer retendered prematurely.

4.4.2 Ambiguous Pleadings

Most states follow the doctrine that an insurer has a duty to defend the insured if the allegations of the complaint are so ambiguous or broad that they could support a cause of action for which there is the potential for policy coverage.[49] The ambiguous pleading is a particular concern under the liberal rules of notice pleading created by the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure, and state laws which emulate the federal rules. It is not uncommon under such rules for the pleading to be so broad and conclusory that it is impossible to determine the nature of the causes of action that are pled. Also, when the complaint does not make many factual allegations, it can be difficult to establish that they invoke an exclusion.

When the allegations in the complaint could support a covered claim, there is the potential for coverage and thus a duty to defend the insured.[50] However, when the allegations cannot support a

[49] Allan D. Windt, Insurance Claims and Disputes: Representation of Insurance Companies and Insureds, Sixth Edition, §4.2, Resolution of doubts and ambiguities, Thomson Reuters. For example, in Szelc v. Stanger, 2009 WL 4573425 (D.N.J.) (unpublished), the court found that a complaint that alleged a number of causes of action was sufficiently ambiguous so that "it is at least possible that the evidence produced at trial will show that Gottesman had no knowledge of the scheme or responsibility for the scheme, but that his title is nonetheless at risk.... Since the duty to defend exists whenever there is a possibility that the insurer will be liable to compensate for the underlying claims, and First American may turn out to be liable on those claims that do not allege Gottesman's knowledge of or participation in the forgery scheme, First American owes Gottesman a duty to defend those claims which do not depend upon Gottesman's knowledge or participation." Id. at *2. In Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. Stribling, 294 Ga.App. 382, 670 S.E.2d 154 (Ga.App. 2008), the insurer was found obligated to defend a lawsuit in which the vague complaint alleged the right to use a driveway or road, despite the fact that the policy excepted one recorded easement across the insured property and also contained a general exception for unrecorded easements. The court said the complaint might encompass some other right in the insured property. In Investors Warranty of America, Inc. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2018 WL 3992147 (Cal.App. 4 Dist.) (unpublished), the court held that the insurer had a duty to defend the insured although most claims and potential outcomes in the suit fell under the exclusions and the potential coverage depended on a loose reading of a vague complaint. In Banner Bank v. First American Title Ins. Co., 916 F.3d 1323 (10th Cir. (Utah) 2019), the court observed the Utah formulation of the rule that, when the complaint is ambiguous about the nature of the legal basis for the claim made, the insurer owes a duty to defend at least "until those uncertainties can be resolved against coverage." It cited Benjamin v. Amica Mut. Ins. Co., 140 P.3d 1210, 1215 (Utah 2006). The court said that the nature of the claim made against the insured was not uncertain, and plainly invoked Exclusion 6, the creditors' rights exclusion.

[50] See, for example, Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. Graham Mortgage Corp., 2010 WL 2635074 (E.D.Tex.) (unpublished), report adopted by 2010 WL 2635089 (E.D.Tex.) (unpublished), in which a seller holding a purchase money mortgage alleged that she subordinated her lien to three later mortgages based on misrepresentations by the buyer "and/or" the insured lender; the court found that the insurer had a duty to defend the lender against the ambiguous pleading that did not clearly describe any conduct attributable to the lender that would invoke the exclusion. See Allison v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 907 F.2d 645, (7th Cir. 1990); modified 979 F.2d 1187 (7th Cir. 1992), in which the insurer was found to have a duty to defend a complaint that did not specify the cause of action or legal theory on which it was based, although the cause of action identified by the insurer would be excluded. In Perry v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 48 N.E.3d 1168, 2015 IL App (2d) 150168, 2015 WL 6859167 (Ill.App. 2 Dist. 2015), the court found a duty to defend based on the faulty logic that a complaint that sought to prohibit the insureds from paving an easement path was tantamount to a blockade of the access right, although the plaintiff did not attack the recorded easement grant, and therefore the insurer had a duty to defend the action, under the general rubric that the duty to defend is broader than the duty to indemnify. The same faulty argument was rejected in BV Jordanelle, LLC v. Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 830 F.3d 1195 (10th Cir. (Utah) 2016). In that case, the court held that the ambiguous pleading rule was not invoked by a claimed ambiguity in the policy language as opposed to the complaint, and that a mere election to read the policy broadly did not create the potential for coverage that would trigger a duty to defend.

claim that would trigger a covered risk, or clearly invoke an exclusion, there is no duty to defend the action.[51]

4.4.3 Extrinsic Evidence

The duty to defend is ordinarily determined solely from the pleadings and the policy terms. However, if the insurer also has knowledge of facts extrinsic to the pleading that would bring the action within coverage, many jurisdictions require that the insurer defend.[52] The purpose of the extrinsic evidence rule is to assure that the words used in the complaint do not negate a duty to defend an action in which the substance of the dispute invokes the potential for coverage. Thus, if the complaint does not make a covered allegation, and the insurer has no independent knowledge that such fact exists, there is no duty to defend the insured on the mere assertion that the complaint could be amended to make the covered allegation.

In many jurisdictions, an insurer may not base its decision to deny a defense on information it learns that is contrary to what is alleged in the complaint.[53] Certain other jurisdictions permit the

In Weber v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 169 Or.App. 24, 7 P.3d 714 (Or.App. 2000), the insured was sued by neighbors claiming an easement over his land to taxi their airplanes to a private airport. The insurer denied the defense based on an exception for "unrecorded easements." The court held that there was a duty to defend because the plaintiff claimed a recorded easement. Although most states that have adopted the extrinsic evidence rule limit such evidence to facts known by the insurer at the time the tender is made or which the insured tells the insurer at the time of tender, some states also require that the insurer "further investigate the potential claim" when appropriate. Associated Bank, N.A. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 881 F.Supp.2d 1058 (D.Minn. 2012). See also; Fischer v. First American Title Ins. Co., 388 S.W.3d 181 (Mo.App. W.D. 2012) (insurer has duty to investigate facts beyond four corners of complaint and defend if investigation reveals facts creating potential for coverage; no such potential in this case). The danger of abuse of this investigation doctrine is illustrated in Morgan v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 65 Fed.Appx. 184, 2003 WL 21212656 (9th Cir.(Hawai'i) 2003) (unpublished), in which the court found a duty to defend despite the complaint's allegation that the insureds had knowledge of her interest in the property, based on the fact that further investigation might have disclosed that the insureds disputed the allegation. In Haley v. Hume, 448 P.3d 803 (Wash.App. 1 Div. 2019), the court noted that Washington follows the rule that an insurer is required to consider evidence beyond the four corners of the complaint that suggests the potential for coverage, but cannot use such extrinsic evidence as a basis to deny a defense. The court said that the insurer was not using extrinsic evidence in denying the defense by analyzing the scope of the survey exception based on the ALTA/NSPS survey standards.

[53] Allan D. Windt, Insurance Claims and Disputes: Representation of Insurance Companies and Insureds, Sixth Edition, §4.4, Thomson Reuters; see also Penney v. Capitol City Transfer, Inc., 707 A.2d 387 (Me. 1998) (insurer may not deny defense on extrinsic evidence that land in dispute was only mistakenly included in policy). In Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. National Westminster Bank, U.S.A., 1998 WL 31512, 134 F.3d 377 (Table) (9th Cir. Cal.) (unpublished), the insured asserted that the trial court had violated the "no hindsight" rule. In that case, a policy endorsement contained an exception for construction work "in progress or recently completed." The insured argued that the court found no duty to defend against a construction lien based on testimony as to the date on which the work was performed. The appellate insurer to rely on at least undisputed extrinsic facts in addition to the four corners of the complaint.[54] Other states have refused to expand the duty to defend to cover facts beyond the allegations in the complaint that suggest the potential for coverage.[55]

4.4.4 Frivolous Claims

The duty to defend is triggered even when the covered count or allegations are frivolous, meritless or asserted in bad faith.[56] There is such a duty even though the policy does not explicitly say that the insurer will defend groundless claims:

court found no evidence that the court relied on such testimony. Rather, the complaint's allegation that the claimant "achieved substantial completion" five days after the endorsement date meant that, as of the endorsement date, "work would still be considered to be 'in progress'... as of September 20th as the term is ordinarily understood." Thus, there was no need to resort to extrinsic evidence to establish the lack of policy coverage.

[54] California adopted this position in Montrose Chemical Corp. v. Superior Court, 6 Cal.4th 287, 24 Cal.Rptr.2d 467 (1993). Indiana permits the insurer to consider extrinsic evidence both to support a duty to defend or to suggest that such duty is negated by an exclusion. See Schram v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 2017 WL 168920 (N.D.Ind.) (unpublished). Cases from all jurisdictions are collected in Allan D. Windt, Insurance Claims and Disputes: Representation of Insurance Companies and Insureds, Sixth Edition, §4.4, Thomson Reuters.

[55] The Pennsylvania Supreme Court so refused, in Kvaerner Metals Div. of Kvaerner U.S., Inc. v. Commercial Union Ins. Co., 589 Pa. 317, 908 A.2d 888 (2006), as noted in the title insurance decision of Lupu v. Loan City, LLC, 903 F.3d 382 (3rd Cir. (Pa.) 2018). A federal court in Pennsylvania also refused to broaden the duty to defend based on extrinsic evidence in 631 North Broad Street, LP v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 2018 WL 4051798 (E.D.Pa. 2018) (unpublished), aff'd 2019 WL 3383878, 778 Fed.Appx. 164 (3rd Cir. (Pa.) 2019) (unpublished), in which the court also refused to consider statements made in a letter attached to the complaint when those same assertions were not made in the allegations of the complaint.

[56] In McFarland v. First American Title Ins. Co., 595 F.Supp. 630 (D.Mont. 1984), for example, the court stated: "The duty to defend exists whether or not the adverse claim has merit. The title insurer must assume that the allegations of the adverse claimant have merit in deciding whether to defend. If the claim does not have merit, the insurer still bears the risk of paying the litigation costs to establish the lack of merit to the adverse claim." In Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. Stribling, 294 Ga.App. 382, 670 S.E.2d 154 (Ga.App. 2008), the insurer was found obligated to defend a lawsuit in which the vague complaint alleged the right to use a driveway or road, despite the fact that the policy excepted one recorded easement across the insured property and also contained a general exception for unrecorded easements. The court said the complaint might encompass some other right in the insured property, or might simply be making a frivolous claim to an easement that was not excepted. Thus, in McMinn v. Damurjian, 105 N.J.Super. 132, 251 A.2d 310, 315 (Ch. 1969), the court found the insurer's refusal to defend the insured was wrongful because the denial was based solely on the grounds that the claimed adverse interest was void or unenforceable: "[i]t is immaterial that the McMinns' claim against the Damurjians proved to be baseless; the fact remains that defendant did nothing to protect plaintiffs' title when it was put in dispute." In accord is Jarchow v. Transamerica Title Ins. Co., 48 Cal.App.3d 917, 122 Cal.Rptr. 470 (1975). Jarchow involved a claimed duty to clear rather than defend title. However, it drew upon existing case law on the duty to defend in reaching its conclusion. In Premier Homes, Inc. v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 76 F.Supp.2d 110 (D.Mass. 1999), the insurer accepted a defense with a reservation of rights based on an allegation that the insured was not a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. The insured's motion for summary judgment was denied, after which the insurer retendered the defense. The insured then settled the case and sued for breach of the duty to defend. The court found the insurer was obligated to pay for the insured's defense that the allegations were untrue. If the defense had succeeded, the insured would have proven the falsity of the allegations that raised a question about policy coverage. Therefore, the insurer retendered prematurely. The court detected that the bona fide purchaser allegation was made "merely because [the plaintiff] anticipated" that it needed to make such a claim to dislodge the insured from title. The

> Noting that the title policy contains no provision requiring the Company to defend against "groundless, false or fraudulent" claims, the Company argues that it breached no duty to defend against these patently insubstantial claims. This contention is rather weak. The policy provides that the Title Company shall defend "in all litigation" of the relevant type, not simply that which involves a "viable claim." Beyond this, while the purportedly trivial claims may not have had much to recommend them, they had to be met by Jesko in order to avoid default judgment. The Title Company's refusal to offer a defense certainly did not mean that a defense was unnecessary. We therefore reject the Title Company's argument that the estate's claims were outside the scope of its duty to defend Jesko.[57]

4.5 Defense Of Certain Typical Classes Of Title-Related Lawsuits

Certain types of title-related lawsuits recur with some frequency, and thus have generated case law regarding whether or not the policy obligates the insurer to defend those classes of suits. This section reviews the most common of these types of suits. A complete review of the classes of matters protected against by the policy is found in Chapter 9, which discusses the insuring provisions. Exclusions are discussed in Chapter 11, exceptions in Chapter 12.

court thus seemed confident that the allegation was not only false but made in bad faith, although there were no facts to support the statement. In Countrywide Home Loans, Inc. v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 2011 WL 666188 (W.D.Pa.) (unpublished), an insurer was found obligated to defend an insured in a quiet title action in which the seller and borrower-buyer claimed a deed and mortgage were invalid, after having been rejected for recording because they conveyed a parcel created by a land division map that was not approved and filed. The court said the duty to defend was triggered by the allegation that the mortgage was invalid, even if there was no good faith basis for the seller to disclaim the conveyance.

[57] Jesko v. American-First Title & Trust Co., 603 F.2d 815 (10th Cir. 1979) (footnote omitted).

A complaint alleging that the insured obtained title by fraud does not create a duty to defend.[58] The leading modern case is Safeco Title Ins. Co. v. Moskopoulos,[59] in which the insured obtained title by first slandering it and then forcing a sale to himself. He was found not to be entitled to a defense in the subsequent suit for rescission, fraud and similar remedies. The court held:

> The allegations in the Klass complaint allege intentionally tortious conduct by appellant, not a defect in his title. There is not a suggestion in the record or the briefs of any matter constituting a defect in or lien or encumbrance on the record title to the Mulholland property, except as disclosed in the policy. Nor is there any suggestion of any off-record risk in the chain of title coming within the policy coverage, such as a forged, altered or improperly delivered deed, incompetency, incapacity, marital rights, or irregularities in any probate proceeding.[60]

Thus, the lawsuit was found not to allege a defect in title at all, and therefore was not within the scope of the insuring provisions. Further, the court found that the action was removed from any possible coverage by Exclusion 3(a). Moskopoulos and its progeny are also discussed under Exclusion 3(a), at §11.2.7.

The title insurer also has been found not to have a duty to defend the insured in litigation asserting that the insured was alleged to have conducted fraud or intentional torts related to the title to the property, or entered into an agreement about title that would divest it of the insured title interest.[61] The insurer has no duty to defend a lender against a claim that the insured mortgage is a fraud on creditors.[62] Further, a local church which bought title insurance to cover actions it took to Co.*, 2015 WL 6758365 (N.J.A.D.) (unpublished), the court found that the insurer had no duty to defend its insured in a lawsuit brought by her four siblings in which they said the sister broke an agreement to give them each one-fifth interests in the property after their credit scores improved. The court said the insured "created" the agreement and failed to disclose it to the insurer, invoking Exclusion 3(a).

[62] In Banner Bank v. First American Title Ins. Co., 916 F.3d 1323 (10th Cir. (Utah) 2019), the Tenth Circuit held that a title insurer had no duty to defend a lender against a lawsuit brought by a receiver appointed by the SEC, who attacked the insured mortgage as being part of a Ponzi scheme that defrauded investors. The court held that the receiver's allegations fell under the creditors' rights exclusion.

claim title to land in a dispute with the denomination, and which became the subject of a lawsuit, was not entitled to a defense because it was "not alleged that there was some defect in the title when the policy was issued." Rather, the dispute involved the actions of the local church to put itself in title.[63] Also, a lender that obtained title by foreclosure and was accused of an unconscionable failure to disclose to the former owner that he could have obtained a release of his property from the mortgage was not entitled to a defense.[64] Similarly, an insured whose seller sued for rescission based on fraud and economic coercion involving a deed/option back transaction was not entitled to a defense.[65] A suit to overturn a deed based on allegations of fraud and undue influence was found excluded by Exclusion 3(a).[66] The insurer was found not to have a duty to defend the insured against claims grounded in fraud, claiming that the insured conspired with others to strip the seller of his equity in the property.[67] However, the court ruled that the insurer did have a duty to defend the insured against a claim that the equity-stripping or "foreclosure rescue" transaction was unconscionable, because that cause of action does not require proof of intentional tortious conduct by the insured.[68]

When it was claimed that the insured intended to obtain a different title interest than the one insured, and the claim was to recharacterize the interest, the insured was not entitled to be defended.[69] There is also no duty to defend against a claim that the insured negligently

Under the pleadings in this case there was no possibility that any loss could fall within coverage because the insurer is not required to compensate the insured for a loss which she brought upon herself. Thus there was no duty to defend."

It said that "[n]egligence on the part of the insured will not trigger a "created-or-known" exclusion. … [A] claim of unconscionability does not require such proof, so it is plausible that Gottesman may be entitled to coverage on this count." The court did not analyze the other 3(a) terms, such as matters "agreed to" by the insured. The court found its conclusion bolstered by the doctrine that an insurer has a duty to defend an ambiguous pleading that might create the potential for coverage.

misrepresented the status of title.[70] An action by a borrower against the insured lender based on negligence, constructive fraud and RICO, claiming that the lender forged signatures and altered loan documents, did not create a duty to defend.[71]

However, when the allegations are couched in alternative counts of fraud, one excluded and the other not, the insurer will ordinarily have a duty to defend the covered count.[72] Barring special circumstances, the fact that the insured successfully defends against the allegations of fraud does not change this conclusion.[73]

The policy also does not obligate the insurer to defend the insured against allegations that the insured has tortiously or intentionally interfered with property rights of others. Such lawsuits concern the insured's conduct, not the title to the property. Examples include slander of title, forgery, trespass, and damage to neighbors' property.[74] See §9.2 regarding forgery, and §9.3 regarding trespass in the context of the scope of the insuring provisions. In Sabatino v. First American Title Ins. Co.,[75] the insureds built an addition to their home. They were sued by their neighbor, Mr. Hershenhorn, for cutting, rerouting and generally playing havoc with his sanitary sewer line, which ran under the surface of the Sabatino property. A title insurer had no duty to defend an insured accused of slandering another person's title. Co*., 2016 WL 4370052 (W.D.N.C. 2016) (unpublished), the court held that the insurer had no duty to defend its insured lender against a suit by a junior lien holder asserting that the insured entity was controlled by the property owner, and was a strategic lien intended to frustrate the junior lender's ability to foreclose on the property. The court found that the claims invoked Exclusion 3(a). In Cherry Hills Farm Court, LLC v. First American Title Ins. Co., ___ F.Supp.3d ___, 2019 WL 6682835 (D.Colo. 2019) (not yet released for publication), appeal filed January 6, 2020, the court held that an insurer was not required to defend the insured owner against the neighbors' claim of set-off, for the value of structures they had built on the insured parcel, because that claim for money did not assert an interest in the title to the property and thus did not invoke policy coverage.

Sabatinos' "deliberate, wrongful and intentional" disruption of the easement, but not a declaration of the easement itself. The court held that the lawsuit concerned the insured's interference with the claimed easement, rather than a judicial determination of the encumbrance's existence, and therefore did not trigger policy coverage. In addition, it found that the tortious conduct complained of all occurred after the date of policy and was thus excluded by the post-policy exclusion:

> First, the underlying complaint does not seek a judicial determination of the existence of an implied easement. Rather, Hershenhorn seeks injunctive relief due to plaintiffs' intentional interference with his easement. Moreover, the purpose of title insurance is to protect a transfer of real estate from the possibilities of loss through defects that may cloud title. ... In this case, Hershenhorn's claims are not made against plaintiffs because defendant failed to find an unrecorded easement. Hershenhorn's claims against plaintiffs have arisen because of plaintiffs' allegedly tortious conduct in interfering with Hershenhorn's easement. Such claims are ancillary to the purpose of the title insurance policy. ...
> In sum, the gravamen of the complaint is not the allegation of an unrecorded easement, but the redress for plaintiffs' intentional and wrongful conduct that occurred after the date of the policy. The complaint in the underlying action presumes the existence of an unrecorded easement by implication and only seeks injunctive relief due to intentional actions that occurred after the policy was issued. Because the policy excludes the type of conduct complained of and provides defendant with the option of establishing a value reflecting the impact of the unrecorded easement on plaintiffs' property, defendant's rejection of plaintiffs' tender of defense was proper. Accordingly, we find that defendant has no duty to defend ... .[76]

Similarly, in Miller v. First American Title Ins. Co.,[77] the title insurer was found not to have a duty to defend an insured and former owner of the property against allegations that he misrepresented and concealed facts about a neighbor's claim to an easement for the use of some expensive beachfront. Although the lawsuit concerned an easement, as in Sabatino, the complaint asserted concealment and misrepresentation, and did not attack the insured based on covenants of warranty. The court said this took the lawsuit outside of coverage:

> The omission of the word "fraud" from the text does not change the basis for both easement related causes of action, which stem from appellant's alleged conduct in concealing and/or failing to disclose the easement. The fact that evidence suggested that the easement at issue was in fact a recorded easement does not change the fundamental nature of the allegations or give rise to a duty to defend. The trial court properly determined that the allegations based on fraud, concealment, and failure to disclose, were outside of the possible coverage of appellant's title insurance policy.

4.5.2 No Title Defect

There is no duty to defend an action which does not attack title.[78] Nor is there a duty to defend the insured lender when the borrower asserts that the insured mortgage may not be foreclosed due to the invalidity of the debt or other matters that do not attack the insured lien.[79] For example, when the priority of two deeds of trust was challenged on the grounds that the lender had negligently disbursed the loans for the wrong purpose, there was no duty to defend, since the complaint "did not allege any defects or liens at the time Nations' title policy took effect."[80] There was also no duty to defend an insured lender against a suit claiming money owed to the plaintiff subdivision owners, but not contesting the lender's mortgage lien.[81] There was no duty to defend a suit brought by the subdivision developer for the cost of providing water service, which did not affect title to the land.[82] Likewise, in Steinle v. Knowles,[83] the insured seller took back a mortgage. The buyers sued the seller-insureds for misrepresentation in the sale of the property, because they had conveyed more land than they owned. The lien of the insureds' mortgage was not attacked, however, and the real estate had sufficient value to secure it, and thus the insurer was not obligated to defend the insured. The Kansas Supreme Court adopted the trial judge's statement that the insured had "two hats on. And she was sued in that suit, as the seller in the transaction, not as the mortgagor ... ."

In Carrington v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2015 WL 6758365 (N.J.A.D.) (unpublished), the court held that a title insurer had no duty to defend its insured in a lawsuit brought by her four siblings in which they said the sister broke an agreement to give them each one-fifth interests in the property after their credit scores improved. Duty to Defend

An insurer has been found not to be required to defend an insured against the assertion of an instrument that would affect title, but which is void and unenforceable.[84] The insurer also has no duty to defend the insured against a matter excepted in Schedule B of the policy.[85]

The insurer is not obligated to prosecute a suit on behalf of the insured.[86] This is especially true as to actions that do not have as their main object the clearing of title. In Summer Pond Properties, Inc. v. Transamerica Title Ins. Co.,[87] the insured sued the seller for breach of warranties. The seller had conveyed to the insured a railroad spur track parcel that it did not own. The court found that the policy does not create an obligation to prosecute a lawsuit, and the action did not affect title:

> SPP asks us to extend the insurer's duty to defend to include a duty to prosecute claims on the insured's behalf. ... But the policy in this case imposes the duty to provide only "the defense" of the insured when a third party asserts a claim adverse to the insured's title as covered by the policy. …Transamerica is obligated to pay SPP's legal expenses "in defense of the title, as insured[.]" But rather than suing WWA to quiet title or to otherwise protect its title, SPP merely sought damages based on the seller's admitted mistake in conveying land that it did not own. … SPP's lawsuit against WWA did nothing to establish its right to coverage under the title policy, and its expenses were not incurred "in defense of title[.]" SPP had no basis under the policy to recover its WWA litigation fees and costs from Transamerica.[88]

[84] In Hauck Holdings Columbia SC, LLC v. Target Corp., 2010 WL 1258103 (S.D. Ohio) (unpublished), the court said there was no duty to defend or indemnify the insured as to a supplement to a declaration of restrictions, because it was unrecorded and thus not effective, either by law or under the terms of the original declaration. The court said the supplement could only be enforced against the insured if the plaintiff alleged and proved that the insured had actual knowledge of the document, which would invoke Exclusion 3(b). It thus rejected the insured's assertion that the insurer should have to defend the action, because the complaint did not invoke a covered risk and would have to invoke an exclusion to succeed. Nations Title Ins. of New York, Inc*., 912 F.Supp. 28)." The Eliopoulos case is further discussed at §3.4, regarding the insurer's option to clear title.

4.5.3 Survey And Possession Matters

Several courts have held that, when the policy contains the standard exceptions for survey matters, a complaint based on a boundary line dispute, gap parcel or overlap does not give rise to a duty to defend.[89] However, an insurer was found not entitled to summary judgment as to the duty to defend an overlap, when the dispute was created by a recorded deed.[90]

Similarly, a complaint based on either a claim of prescriptive easement[91] or accretion not described in Schedule A[92] is beyond the duty to defend when the policy contains the survey exception. There is also no duty to defend an action based on an unrecorded easement, when the standard exception for unrecorded easements is in Schedule B.[93] Likewise, when the standard exceptions are in the policy, there is no duty to defend an action in which the plaintiff claims either by adverse possession or an easement by implication.[94]

There was no duty to bring or pay for an action against a trespasser.[95] An ambiguous

However, the court specifically held that the issue of the duty to defend was not before the court.

counterclaim probably based on adverse possession, in the insured's action for trespass, was found to create a duty to defend, however. The duty was triggered by the fact that the basis for the counterclaim could not be definitely limited to an off-record claim of interest.[96]

4.5.4 Suit By Insured Against Insurer

The policy duty to defend is limited to defending the insured when it is named as a defendant in a lawsuit filed by another that invokes policy coverage. The insurer has no duty to reimburse the insured for attorneys' fees incurred in making a policy claim or in suing the insurer for coverage.[97] In one such case, an insured demanded that the insurer remove a lien, which it declined to do. The insured sued the insurer, and the insurer satisfied the lien. The insured sought the cost of its action against the insurer. The court refused, stating:

> There is no provision in the policy by which Safeco agreed to pay attorney's fees incurred in litigation against the insurer itself. By paragraph 6(b) Safeco agreed to pay only such fees incurred in litigation against third parties as is specifically authorized by the insurer.[98]

4.5.5 Affirmative Assurances

When the insurer is willing to indemnify against a defect, but not until there is a court order establishing that the defect exists, the assurance is commonly phrased as protection against a "final order of a court of competent jurisdiction." In BancOhio Nat'l Bank, N.A. v. Security Union Title Ins. Co.,[99] the court held that such a coverage also creates a duty to defend the insured. The BancOhio policy excepted an existing lawsuit affecting the property, but contained an affirmative "note" assurance using the above phrase. The court held:

> While this provision is exclusionary in part, it expressly provides coverage for any loss sustained by way of a final order in Katz. Reading all provisions together, it is clear that the policy "insures against" loss arising out of a Katz decision. Paragraph 3(A) specifically obligates Security Union to defend in matters "insured against" by the policy. Security Union cannot now avoid its obligation by denying BancOhio a Utah 2017) (unpublished), which held that the title insurer was not required to pay the insured the attorneys' fees it expended in making a claim on the policy. The insured based this demand on Condition 8(c) of the 2006 ALTA owner's policy, which says that the insurer will "pay those costs, attorneys' fees, and expenses incurred in accordance with Sections 5 and 7 of these Conditions." Condition 5 is the duty to defend provision. Condition 7 says the insurer may pay a loss to the insured, and in doing so will also pay any attorneys' fees it had authorized and that were incurred before the loss was paid. Thus, none of the policy provisions stated that the insurer would pay the fees incurred by the insured in making a policy claim.

defense in the Katz case.[100]

In BancOhio, the insured was immediately made a party to the excepted lawsuit, which both insurer and insured apparently anticipated at the time the "note" assurance was given. The insurer was found not to be responsible for reimbursing the insured for its voluntary settlement of the case short of any adverse final order.

4.6 Parties For Whom Defense Is Owed

The duty to defend is a policy benefit enjoyed only by the insured. The policy provides that a transferee by operation of law becomes the insured, and thus is entitled to a defense. In addition, the insurer may owe a defense duty to parties related to the named insured who are sued in connection with the real estate. These subjects are fully discussed in Chapter 7.

4.7 Defense Of Covered Claims Only

FORM 66, Appendix A
Apportionment of fees

FORM 6, Appendix A
Acceptance of partial defense--retention of separate counsel

FORM 7, Appendix A
Acceptance of partial defense--apportionment of fees--one counsel

The current ALTA policies limit the insurer's duty to defend the insured in litigation to those "stated causes of action alleging a defect, lien or encumbrance or other matter insured against by this policy." The 1970 ALTA policy was found to permit the insurer to provide a defense of covered counts only.[101]

The policy language is opposed to the public policy adopted in many states as to general liability insurance policies that requires the insurer to defend all claims if any of them invoke coverage, known as the "in-for-one, in-for-all" or "complete defense" rule. A leading commentator notes that the reasoning often given for imposing the "complete defense" rule as a matter of public policy is not very strong.[102]

[101] Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. JDC (America) Corp., 818 F.Supp. 1543 (S.D. Fla. 1993), affirmed 52 F.3d 1575 (11th Cir. 1995). The court relied on the phrase in Conditions & Stipulations 3(a) stating that the insurer need only provide a defense "to the extent that such litigation is founded upon an alleged defect, lien, encumbrance, or other matter insured against by this policy." Id. at 1545.

[102] "Courts rarely discuss the rationale behind the general rule requiring a 'complete' defense. Two reasons, however, can be offered in support of that rule. First, ordinarily, there is no reasonable means of prorating costs of defense between covered and noncovered items. Second, separate representation for covered and noncovered items is not feasible. The latter problem is insoluble. The former problem, however, depending on the circumstances, may not be." Allan D. Windt,

Most states that have considered the issue have found the policy's covered-counts-only provision to be enforceable as written, and have refused to invoke the "complete defense" rule to override the policy's plain defense limitation.[103] One federal court gave this survey of the jurisdictions:

> We note that courts have taken a strong stand against holding insurers liable for the defense costs of claims their policies do not cover, even when those claims are joined with covered claims. For example, the Fifth Circuit has joined the Sixth Circuit in holding that an insurer should be held liable for the defense of covered and

[103] In GMAC Mortgage, LLC v. First American Title Ins. Co., 464 Mass. 733, 985 N.E.2d 823 (Mass. 2013), the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court held that that title insurance is "fundamentally different" from general liability insurance in that it eliminates or reduces existing risks rather than assumes future risks. It ruled that the in- for-one, in-for-all rule does not apply in the "unique title insurance context." The Massachusetts high court reiterated this ruling in Deutsche Bank Nat'l Ass'n v. First American Title Ins. Co., 465 Mass. 741, 991 N.E.2d 638 (Mass. 2013). The Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals also held that the rationale of the in-for-one rule does not apply to title insurance. The court said: "[t]he complete-defense rule reflects and enforces the broad defense promise in standard general liability policies and makes sense given the comprehensive coverage provided by this kind of insurance. Title insurance is much narrower. A title insurer only assumes risks associated with defects in property title." Philadelphia Indem. Ins. Co. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 771 F.3d 391 (7th Cir. (Ill.) 2014). That court was influenced by the GMAC decision. New Jersey also has held that the title insurer is required to defend covered counts only. Szelc v. Stanger, 2009 WL 4573425 (D.N.J.) (unpublished), later decision 2010 WL 2925847 (D.N.J.) (unpublished) (allocation permitted; court to apportion fees when case is done); Szelc v. Stanger, 2011 WL 5864047 (D.N.J.) (unpublished) (court makes apportionment of attorneys' fees based on complicated but logical formula). Similarly, in Lupu v. Loan City, LLC, 903 F.3d 382 (3rd Cir. (Pa.) 2018), the Third Circuit Court of Appeals predicted that Pennsylvania would disagree with the GMAC and Philadelphia decisions, and would impose the in-for-one rule on title insurers. The public policy underpinning the in-for-one rule is that, by "preventing insurers from breaking a case into covered and non-covered pieces, courts avoid the potential waste and impracticality of a bifurcated defense." However, the Third Circuit noted that Massachusetts and Illinois courts have already rejected the in-for-one rule as to title insurance because it is not as difficult in a title lawsuit to have two different lawyers defend different claims. It relied on the Massachusetts Supreme Court decision of GMAC Mortgage, LLC v. First American Title Ins. Co., 464 Mass. 733, 985 N.E.2d 823 (2013), which said that "title issues are discrete, [and] they can be bifurcated fairly easily from related claims." The court also noted that the limited defense provided by a title insurance policy is one reason why "title insurance premiums are remarkably low." In Cherry Hills Farm Court, LLC v. First American Title Ins. Co., ___ F.Supp.3d ___, 2019 WL 6682835 (D.Colo. 2019) (not yet released for publication), appeal filed January 6, 2020, the court held that the complete-defense rule adopted in Colorado for liability policies does not apply to title insurance, "which differs from general liability insurance in significant ways." It adopted what it termed the majority rule of GMAC, Philadelphia Indemnity and Lupu and rejected the reasoning of Little Italy and Lawyers Title v. Graham that had imposed the complete-defense rule on title insurers. The court also noted that the rationale behind the complete-defense rule does not apply in the context of title insurance, saying: "[t]he complete defense rule is premised on the idea that it is not feasible to bifurcate multiple claims in a single suit. See 1 Allan D. Windt, Insurance Claims and Disputes § 4:13 (5th ed. 2010). Yet as the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court noted in GMAC Mortgage, 'because title issues are discrete, they can be bifurcated fairly easily from related claims.' 985 N.E.2d at 829." > noncovered claims only where "there is no reasonable means of prorating the costs of defense between the covered and not-covered items."[104]

However, other states have imposed the "in-for-one, in-for-all" rule on title insurers, finding that title insurance is not sufficiently different from general liability insurance as to warrant different treatment.[105] California requires an insurer to defend non-covered counts, but permits the insurer to reserve the right to seek reimbursement from the insured for those fees and expenses.[106] Some courts

[105] In City of Sharonville v. American Employers Ins. Co., the Ohio Supreme Court held, similarly: "[a]n insurer has an absolute duty to defend an action when the complaint contains an allegation in any one of its claims that could arguably be covered by the insurance policy, even in part and even if the allegations are groundless, false, or fraudulent. Once an insurer must defend one claim within a complaint, it must defend the insured on all the other claims within the complaint, even if they bear no relation to the insurance-policy coverage. An insurer need not defend any action or any claims within the complaint when all the claims are clearly and indisputably outside of the contracted policy coverage." 109 Ohio St.3d 186, 846 N.E.2d 833, 837 (Ohio 2006). Sharonville was followed in Little Italy Development, LLC v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2011 WL 2532663 (N.D.Ohio) (unpublished), in which the court, also citing Buss, held that the language of the ALTA policy providing a defense for covered counts only had been trumped by Ohio's public policy statement that all insurers in Ohio must defend all counts: "Chicago Title argues that, pursuant to the express terms of the policy, it agreed to provide less coverage than the coverage required by City of Sharonville. In other words, Chicago Title claims that the Ohio Supreme Court's pronouncement may be modified by agreement between the parties. This Court disagrees. Chicago Title's argument would be meritorious if the Ohio Supreme Court based its decision on contract interpretation principles. If the decision relied on the underlying insurance agreement to determine the scope of the duty to defend, then the parties would be free to contract for varying degrees of coverage in that regard. The court, however, does not even reference the policy language in its opinion. The holding in City of Sharonville is undoubtedly broad--it expressly requires insurers to defend claims 'even if they bear no relation to the insurance policy coverage.'" 2011 WL 2532663 at *3. Little Italy was rejected by the Seventh Circuit in the GMAC Mortgage decision and by a Colorado court, as is discussed above. In Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. Graham Mortg. Corp., 2010 WL 2635074 (E.D. Tex. Apr. 16, 2010), report and recommendation adopted, 2010 WL 2635089 (E.D. Tex. June 28, 2010), the court also applied the complete-defense rule to a title insurance policy. However, in Cherry Hills Farm Court, LLC v. First American Title Ins. Co., ___ F.Supp.3d ___, 2019 WL 6682835 (D.Colo. 2019) (not yet released for publication), appeal filed January 6, 2020, the court refused to follow that decision, stating that the Graham court had "merely stated the complete defense rule without any analysis, including any explanation of its applicability in the context of title insurance."

[106] In Buss v. Transamerica Ins. Co., 65 Cal.Rptr.2d 366, 939 P.2d 766 (1997), the California Supreme Court held that the insurer is entitled to be reimbursed by the insured for the cost of the defense of claims not potentially within coverage. The court reasoned: "Under the policy, the insurer does not have a duty to defend the insured as to the claims that are not even potentially covered. With regard to defense costs for these claims, the insurer has not been paid premiums by the insured. It did not bargain to bear these costs." In Bar-K, Inc. v. Security Title Corp., 2010 WL 3333391 (Cal.App. 1 Dist.) (unpublished), First American provided its insured with a full defense, including the defense of numerous non-covered counts. It appealed the trial court's refusal to order the insured to reimburse First American for the cost of litigating the non-covered issues. The appeals court affirmed, however, stating that Buss requires the insurer to reserve this right of reimbursement when it accepts the defense, or it is waived. The court found that First American had not made the reservation, and thus had waived its right to reimbursement.

have not acknowledged the express policy limitation of the duty to defend to covered claims only.[107]

In those jurisdictions in which the law is not settled on apportionment of fees or the right to defend the insured as to covered claims only, the insurer may wish to immediately seek a declaration by the court on the issue. Otherwise, an insured might argue that the insurer's acceptance of some claims only, and apportionment of fees, is a rejection of the tender or a bad faith act.[108] See §4.14 regarding declaratory judgment actions.

There are two means by which the insurer can provide a partial defense: by providing separate counsel for the covered counts only, or by apportioning the counsel's fees between covered and non-covered counts. Each approach has advantages and disadvantages.

Separate "covered matter" counsel is appropriate when the covered and non-covered counts are sufficiently distinct so that duties can be broken down between two counsels.[109] The advantage to the insured in such an arrangement is that it can retain counsel of its choice for the non-covered counts. That counsel may also advise the insured on coverage matters.[110] The insurer may, in most jurisdictions, choose counsel for the covered counts. See §4.8 regarding choice of counsel. This kind of arrangement usually causes discovery and resolution of the covered matters to progress expeditiously. If the matters are resolved in the insured's favor, the insured is then free to conduct the balance of the litigation without any supervision of or duty of cooperation to the insurer. If the insured loses the dispute, the insurer settles with the insured or the plaintiff, and frequently the litigation is effectively concluded.

Apportionment of one counsel's fees is less difficult to coordinate. For the counsel, the process can be cumbersome and may present real or perceived ethical dilemmas. Most problems are overcome if the insurer and insured agree on a flat percentage split of fees at the beginning of the case. The ratio can be adjusted if the relative amount of time spent on covered and non-covered matters changes.

There is no right to seek apportionment of a settlement between covered and non-covered

[107] In 212 Marin Boulevard, LLC v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 8849641 (N.J.A.D. 2015) (unpublished), cert.den. 223 N.J. 280 (Oct. 5, 2015), the court held that the insurer was required to pay for a counterclaim by the insured against the plaintiff city for malicious prosecution, and for non-litigation work including attendance at public meetings, lobbying work, and tax advice. The court incorrectly said that "[t]here is nothing about the policy language to suggest that the promise to pay costs incurred in the defense of title would be strictly limited to the particular confines of the underlying lawsuits and would not extend to other efforts to vindicate the title conveyed."

[108] In Brown v. Guarantee Title & Trust/ARTA, 1996 WL 488004 (Ohio App. 5 Dist.) (unpublished), the insured's experts opined that the entire suit was covered by the policy, and further that the refusal to accept the full defense "was unreasonable, contrary to industry standards, and constituted bad faith." To this, the experts added that the insurer had failed to "meaningfully respond" to the insured's demand for payment. The court affirmed the finding of the jury that the insurer had acted in bad faith, and its award of attorney's fees.

[109] In First Clover Leaf Bank v. National Land Title Ins. Co., 2015 WL 392728, 2015 IL App (5th) 120442-U (Ill.App. 5 Dist.) (unpublished), app.den. 32 N.E.3d 673 (Table) (May 27, 2015), the court affirmed the insurer's right to select separate counsel for an insured lender to defend against a covered counterclaim by the borrower in the foreclosure action. The lender's foreclosure counsel continued his representation of the lender for the prosecution of the action and against non-covered counterclaims by the borrower.

[110] This arrangement was made in KL Group v. Case, Kay & Lynch, 829 F.2d 909 (9th Cir. (Hawaii) 1987).

counts if the insurer has refused the defense, however.[111] This is in keeping with the rule that the wrongful rejection of a defense makes the insurer liable for the full settlement amount. See §4.15 regarding the effects of a wrongful rejection of a defense.

Unless a partial defense is barred by state case law, the insurer should propose a practical means of apportionment. It should seek to obtain a written agreement with the insured.[112] The insurer must be plain and practical in the method it suggests for division of labor and billing, or the intent of the agreement and the splitting of the fees can become a contentious matter.[113] If there is a dispute, the insurer must prove that it was possible to allocate fees as requested.[114]

4.8 Insurer's Right To Select Counsel

The 1992 and 2006 ALTA policy forms state that the insurer has the right to select counsel to defend the insured when the insurer assumes an obligation to defend, and to manage and direct that defense.[115] When the insurer appoints counsel to defend the insured, it is not also obligated to pay the fees incurred by the insured for privately-retained counsel who represents the insured concurrently with the insurer-retained counsel.[116] Many states consider the insurer to be an interested party in the suit against its insured, so that counsel represents the interests of both insurer and insured.[117]

[117] This tripartite relationship is discussed, for example, in Atlanta Title & Trust Co. v. Fulkalb, Inc., 56 Ga. App. 742, 193 S.E. 796 (1937). See also, Allan D. Wills*, 717 N.E.2d 151 (Ind. 1999) (holding that insurer is "co-client" with insured when insurer undertakes defense of insured).

When the insurer defends the insured without a reservation of rights, most courts agree that the insurer's and insured's interests are sufficiently aligned so that one counsel may represent the interests of both.[118] The counsel retained by the insurer to defend the insured in litigation has an attorney-client relationship with the insurer also, and the attorney-client privilege applies to communication between that counsel and the insurer.[119] In these cases, most issues about possible conflicts can be resolved by following the local ethical rules on informed consent. Most states that have considered the issue have held that insurer staff attorneys may defend insureds when they are sued by parties other than the insurer in litigation covered by the policy.[120]

Under certain circumstances discussed below, typically when the insurer reserves rights, the insurer and insured may have conflicting interests as to how the suit should be defended. This conflict may be actual or presumed by law. In many jurisdictions, the insurer is obligated to pay for either the insured's own choice of counsel or "independent" counsel when there is a conflict of interest, despite the policy language.[121] Under such circumstances, the insurer also typically loses the right to control the defense.[122]

A conflict may be created by a complaint which alleges alternate causes of action, one covered and one not. A conflict is also found when the action is not covered if the plaintiff prevails, but is covered if the insured wins. An example is when the plaintiff alleges that the insured was not a

The 39-page decision traces the history of insurers' use of in-house litigation counsel, and recites ABA opinions, law review articles and numerous decisions from other jurisdictions, noting that a number of states permit the practice, by court decision, ethics rules or statutes, but that courts in two states—Kentucky and North Carolina—have issued ethics opinions concluding that the use of staff attorneys to defend insureds is prohibited as the unauthorized practice of law by a corporation.

[122] Stonewell Corp. v. Conestoga Title Ins. Co., 2009 WL 3075661 (S.D.N.Y.) (unpublished), later decision 678 F.Supp.2d 203 (S.D.N.Y. 2010), for example, recited the rule in New Jersey that "'if [an insurance] carrier wishes to control the defense [of a claim against the insured] and simultaneously reserve a right to dispute liability, it can do so only with the consent of the insured.' … The insurer can infer consent from 'an insured's failure to reject an offer to defend' upon the terms set forth by the insurer. … However, 'to spell out acquiescence by silence, the letter [in which the insurer offers coverage] must fairly inform the insured that the offer may be accepted or rejected.'" bona fide purchaser for value because he or she knew of the disputed matter; but the insured defends on the basis that it had no such knowledge, and record title is free of the plaintiff's claim. In this type of situation, the courts presume that if the insurer directs the counsel, its own self-interest will incline it to encourage the litigator to skew the defense so that the matter is ultimately not covered.

Some courts go further, finding that a conflict of interest exists whenever the insurer reserves rights because of a possible coverage defense.[123] However, not every reservation of rights creates an actual conflict of interest. For example, if the suit involved a construction lien, and the coverage question was whether or not the tendering parties took by operation of law from the named insured, the coverage defense would not create an actual conflict of interest for defense counsel. The facts surrounding the transfer to the defendants would not be litigated in the construction lien suit. No amount of direction from the insurer in the litigation would have an effect on coverage.

The "automatic conflict" view begins with the false assumption that the insurer will always act against the interest of the insured. The "automatic conflict" rule has the practical effect of denying the insurer its contractual right to control the insured's defense whenever it makes a reservation of rights.[124] If the jurisdiction follows this rule, the claims handler will likely be required to retain either independent counsel or the insured's own counsel whenever the insurer reserves rights.

The majority, and more logical, view is that the reservation of rights creates a conflict of interest only when the lawsuit against the insured will turn on the same issues as does the coverage question, creating a "true" conflict of interest.[125]

When a conflict of interest exists between insurer and insured, most jurisdictions hold that the attorney for the insured may not represent the insurer.[126] Thus, to the extent that the insurer has a separate interest in the lawsuit or in subrogation or recoupment later, it must retain separate counsel to represent itself. Counsel for the insured is retained for the limited purpose of representing the insured in the action attacking title.

[125] The "true conflict" position was adopted, for example, in Native Sun Investment Group v. Ticor Title Insurance Co., 189 Cal.App.3d 1265, 235 Cal.Rptr. 34 (1987), in which the court so limited the holding of *San Diego Navy Federal Credit Union v. Cumis Ins. (Mo.) 2018), in which the court held that the insurer had the right to manage the defense of mechanic lien litigation conducted under a reservation of rights, and that the insured had failed to prove its claim that the insurer tortuously interfered in the relationship between insurer-appointed counsel and the insured, when the coverage issue had no bearing on the way the mechanic lien defense should be conducted.

Counsel retained for the insured should not advise either the insurer or the insured as to coverage matters. That counsel is typically ethically bound not to disclose to the insurer any client communication that could have an impact on coverage.[127] Counsel's disclosure of such privileged information may even be imputed to the insurer to make it liable to the insured for consequential and punitive damages.[128]

A New York case held that the insured had the right to control its defense because the court assumed that the insured and insurer would have different interests in the urgency with which the litigation should be pursued, creating a conflict of interest. In 69th Street & 2nd Avenue Garage Associates v. Ticor Title Guar. Co.,[129] the insurer offered to defend the matter, but on the condition that the insurer have control of the suit, including choice of counsel. The insured's lawyer was willing to allow the insurer's chosen counsel to act as co-counsel, but would not substitute out of the suit. When neither side relented, the insured defended the matter itself and then sued the insurer for its fees. The court required that the insurer pay the fees. It found that the insured's desire for quick resolution, to keep the title matter from interfering with use of the property, would "conflict" with the insurer's assumed proclivity to "proceed leisurely" with defense of the title, and that therefore the insured had no duty to surrender control of the suit to the insurer.

69th Street & 2nd Avenue Garage Associates provides an interesting counterpoint to Allison v. Ticor Title Ins. Co.[130] The Allison court held that an insurer had a duty to defend insureds who did not tender their defense, as long as they gave up control of the suit to the insurer. The Allison court read the policy to mean that "[i]f Ticor appears, the insureds shall secure to Ticor the control of the defense, but this language does not imply formal tender. It means only that the insureds must move over, must cede control to Ticor."[131] These inapposite results illustrate the extent to which the duty to defend is molded by state law, despite the fact that the policy forms are essentially uniform

In Historic Smithville, the counsel hired by the insurer then brought a cross-claim against the insurer. The insurer sought to review attorney-client documents, on the grounds that the attorney represented both insured and insurer. The court found that the conflict of interest precluded the insurer from seeing the documents.

[128] For example, in Lake Havasu Community Hosp. v. Arizona Title Ins. & Trust Co., 141 Ariz. 363, 687 P.2d 371 (App. 1984), the attorney warned the insurer that his client might be arranging a collusive settlement. He urged the insurer to make a reservation of rights regarding Exclusion 3(a). The court found the attorney to be the insurer's agent. It found it likely that the attorney swayed the insurer not to settle for policy limits. The court held: "[W]hen an attorney, who is an insurance company's agent, uses the confidential relationship between an attorney and a client to gather information so as to deny an insured coverage under the policy[FN5], such conduct constitutes a waiver of any policy defense, and is so contrary to public policy that the insurance company is estopped as a matter of law from disclaiming liability under an exclusionary clause in the policy. This applies to liability above the policy limits, as well as cases defended under a reservation of rights." nationwide. California has developed an elaborate set of rules regarding conflict of interest and defense, stemming in large part from the decision in San Diego Navy Federal Credit Union v. Cumis Ins. Society.[132] The Cumis case and its progeny have been much debated and elucidated,[133] and are beyond the scope of this work.

An insured's counsel faces an ethical issue when he or she receives information that would support a coverage defense against the insured client. Ethics rules prohibit the attorney from revealing information relating to representation of the client unless the client gives informed consent.[134] Based on a review of case law and codes of ethics, one scholar offers the following options:

> 1. If the information relates to information which the insurer is entitled to know and is detrimental to the insured's separate interests, then the insured client must be advised as to the ramifications of maintaining secrecy as a possible breach of the insured's contractual obligation to cooperate. The defense counsel must also disclose her own relationship to the insurer. If the insured consents to disclosure after advice, then the attorney has met her ethical obligations and she may disclose the information and continue in the relationship.
> 2. If the insured will not consent to disclosure, then the defense counsel must assess whether consent to withhold the information to the insurer can be obtained without violating the insured's right to confidentiality. If such consent can be obtained, then the defense counsel can continue in the relationship.
> 3. If the defense counsel cannot make the request for consent because to do so would violate the right to confidentiality, then defense counsel must advise the insured to retain separate coverage counsel to protect the insured's rights in an eventual breach of cooperation action brought by the insurer. The defense counsel must maintain the insured's request for secrecy, but cannot continue in the tripartite relationship. Defense counsel must determine whether withdrawal can be sought without violating the insured's right to confidentiality.[135]

[132] San Diego Navy Federal Credit Union v. Cumis Ins. Society, 162 Cal.App.3d 358, 208 Cal.Rptr. 494 (Cal.App. 4 Dist. 1984). The Cumis decision has been codified in California by Cal.Civ. Code §2860, which states that an insured must be offered independent counsel "at the time the insured is informed that a possible conflict may arise or does exist." It adopts the "true conflict" position that "a conflict of interest does not exist as to allegations or facts in the litigation for which the insurer denies coverage; however, when an insurer reserves its rights on a given issue and the outcome of that coverage issue can be controlled by counsel first retained by the insurer for the defense of the claim, a conflict of interest may exist." The insurer may require that "counsel selected by the insured possess certain minimum qualifications which may include that the selected counsel have (1) at least five years of civil litigation practice which includes substantial defense experience in the subject at issue in the litigation, and (2) errors and omissions coverage." The insurer's duty to pay fees "is limited to the rates which are actually paid by the insurer to attorneys retained by it in the ordinary course of business in the defense of similar actions in the community where the claim arose or is being defended." Fee disputes must be arbitrated, even when insured suing for bad faith. See Compulink Mgmt. Center, Inc. v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 169 Cal.App.4th 289, 87 Cal.Rptr.3d 72 (Cal.App. 2 Dist. 2008). In Bank of America, N.A. v. Superior Court of Orange County, 212 Cal.App.4th 1076, 151 Cal.Rptr.3d 526 (Cal.App. 4 Dist. 2013), the court found that counsel retained to file an action to clear title under a reservation of rights was not Cumis counsel, because no actual conflict existed.

Mr. Windt takes a similar but not identical view.[136] Notwithstanding these helpful formulations of rules, the attorney must always follow the ethical code and case law of the jurisdiction. There can also be a disclosure issue for defense counsel asked to disclose attorney's fee statements to the insurer's outside bill auditor. The time entries on the invoices may signal a coverage defense, and the auditor is not a client.[137] the acceptance of the defense.[138] While the reservation may be oral,[139] it is much preferable to put it in writing.

As discussed above, the reservation of rights may create a conflict of interest, and in some states it is considered an automatic conflict. In many or most states, the insurer loses the right to control litigation when it accepts the insured's defense under a reservation of rights.[140] If a conflict exists, the insurer is obligated to hire "independent" counsel for the insured, as further discussed above.[141]

Most courts hold that an insurer's acceptance of the defense with a specific reservation of rights is not a rejection of the defense.[142] One commentator has said this, in support of this view:

> An insured should not be allowed, without breaching the contract, to reject a tendered defense that is otherwise proper simply because the carrier sends the insured a reservation of rights letter. Whether or not the reservations specified are justified, absent a breach of contract by the carrier, ... the insured should be obligated to accept the defense. By reserving its rights, the insurer is not imposing conditions on its defense. The defense remains unqualified; the insurer, by reserving its rights, is merely putting the insured on notice of what the insurer believes are its existing rights under the policy.[143]

However, some states have formed rules regarding the type of disclosures that must be made to the insured in such a reservation of rights, so that the insured's acceptance of the defense is deemed informed, and the failure to so inform the insured has been deemed by some such courts as a

Co*., 137 Hawai'i 104, 366 P.3d 160 (Hawaii 2016), the Hawaiian Supreme Court ruled that a title insurer defending under a reservation of rights has an "enhanced" duty of good faith, which it can breach if it instructs counsel to defend the insured in litigation after the insurer has determined that there is no meritorious defense, particularly if its motivation in so doing is to delay payment to the insured. The Anastasi court did not find that Fidelity acted in bad faith, but only that there was a genuine issue of material fact "as to whether Fidelity met the enhanced standard of good faith." Thus, it sent the case back down to the trial court.

rejection of the defense.[144] Some states follow the principle that the insured may reject a defense under a reservation of rights, if the defense offered is by the insurer's choice of counsel.[145] Therefore, the insurer must be conscious of applicable state law regarding the reservation of rights before seeking to make such a reservation. Similarly, when an insurer sent a reservation letter that suggested that the insured hire an attorney, and the insurer did not agree to pay for independent counsel, the court deemed the reservation a rejection of the defense.[146]

Further, in some jurisdictions, the insurer may not require the insured to enter into a nonwaiver agreement as a condition to the insurer's provision of a defense. In a nonwaiver agreement, the insurer and insured agree that the insurer may raise any defense to coverage later, and the provision of an attorney waives no coverage defenses. Such an agreement is generally not considered to be an unconditional offer of a defense in some jurisdictions. In those states, the insured may refuse the offered defense, or the nonwaiver agreement itself may be found unenforceable.[147] Thus, in those jurisdictions, the insurer may not avoid making a specific reservation of rights.[148]

Coverage defenses not reserved may be waived. If the insurer is aware of facts which form a basis for a coverage defense when the defense is tendered, its failure to reserve rights may preclude the insurer from raising the defense later.[149] However, the corollary to this rule is that policy

[148] In Houston Title Guaranty Co. v. Fontenot, 339 S.W. 2d 347 (Tex.App. 1960), the court held: "The offer of appellant to work with appellees' counsel, provided a non-waiver agreement in form acceptable to it was executed, was not an offer to defend. The obligation "to defend" was clearly intended to mean that the title company would relieve the insureds of the duty and expense of having counsel in court, and that such company would assume the responsibility and burden of the defense. An offer merely to help was in effect a refusal to defend, especially in view of the statement that appellant recognized no liability in the matter under the circumstances. ... [A]ppellant in its offer to work with appellees' counsel, attached a condition not contained in the policy, namely that a nonwaiver agreement in from acceptable to the company be furnished."

[149] "When the appellant undertook the appellees' defense in the Bailey lawsuit, with full knowledge of the facts and without disclaimer, it was precluded from subsequently avoiding liability on the grounds of non-coverage." Arizona Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Pace, 8 Ariz. App. 269, 445 P.2d 471 (1968). Similarly, in Sisco v. Nations Title Ins. Co., 278 A.D.2d 479, 718 N.Y.S.2d 82, 2000 N.Y. Slip Op. 11841 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept. 2000), the court held that the insurer's "failure to assert the general exclusion in its original disclaimer letter may give rise to an estoppel, if the insured suffered prejudice ... [T]he notice of disclaimer must promptly apprise the claimant with a high degree of specificity of the ground or coverage cannot be created merely by estoppel. One court explained that:

> The rule is well established that the doctrines of implied waiver and of estoppel, based upon the conduct or action of the insurer, are not available to bring within the coverage of a policy risks not covered by its terms, or risks expressly excluded therefrom, and the application of the doctrines in this respect is therefore to be distinguished from the waiver of, or estoppel to assert, grounds of forfeiture. ... Accordingly, plaintiffs' reliance on the fact that defendant's staff attorney who handled plaintiff's claim testified that he never reserved rights or denied coverage and that he acted consistent with the contractual duties of the insurer in the event of a claim for which the defendant might have been liable, not only fails to establish the prerequisite element of reliance for the doctrine of estoppel ... , but most significantly is of no consequence because of the inapplicability of the doctrines of estoppel or waiver.[150]

Thus, the insurer's failure to reserve rights may not create coverage where none would otherwise exist.

On the other hand, the insurer should not make a reservation when no basis exists for a coverage defense. By reserving rights, in some jurisdictions, the insurer loses its right to control and direct the litigation. Therefore, the insurer should not make a reservation based on conjecture. See §4.8 regarding the right to direct counsel.

The reservation of rights letter must be calculated to inform the insured of the basis for and effect of the reservation. The letter should clearly state the facts and policy terms on which the reservation is based. It should then plainly state that the insurer will not pay a judgment or settlement if there is no coverage.

Insurers sometimes reserve the right to retender the defense to the insured. The insurer may withdraw a defense under certain circumstances, as further discussed at §4.11. The right to retender defense ordinarily may be exercised whether or not such right has been reserved.

In certain jurisdictions, an insurer may be reimbursed for its defense costs, if it is later determined that there is no coverage.[151] The allowance of recovery of defense costs is a minority rule, however.[152] Where the rule does apply, the insurer may have the obligation to specifically grounds on which the disclaimer is predicated. Absent such specific notice, a claimant might have difficulty assessing whether the insurer will be able to disclaim successfully."

retain this right in either its reservation of rights letter or a nonwaiver agreement.[153] The rule has been stated thus:

> Reimbursement is available to an insurer if it has either secured a nonwaiver agreement from the insured [footnote omitted] or made an adequate reservation of rights ... . When an insurer chooses to defend a lawsuit under reservation of rights, it typically sends a letter to the insured stating its intention to assert noncoverage and seek reimbursement if it later shows it had no duty to defend the action. In such cases, "[t]he insurer need only notify, or attempt to notify, the assured that is conducting the investigation and defense ... under a reservation of the right to assert policy defenses at a later time, and the assured's silence will usually be deemed acquiescence.[154]

Thus, in jurisdictions which permit reimbursement of defense costs, the acceptance by the insured of the defense with this reservation is considered to be "an implied agreement to the right to reimbursement... ."[155]

4.10 Cooperation Of Insured

The insured has a duty to cooperate with the insurer in the conduct of his or her defense. The insured's duties are described in some detail in Condition 6 of the 2006 ALTA policies (Conditions & Stipulations 4(d) of the 1992 ALTA policies). If the insured fails to cooperate, that breach cancels the insurer's further duties under the policy.[156] However, the insurer may not assert the insured's breach of the cooperation provision if it has already breached its duty to defend the insured.[157]

Coverage is voided by intentional conduct by the insured to frustrate the insurer-retained counsel's efforts to solve the title problem. For example, in Monterey Development Corp. v. Lawyers

[153] Knapp v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 932 F.Supp. 1169, 1171 (D.C.Minn. 1996) [relying on *Walbrook Ins. Co. Ltd. v. However, other California decisions are contra: State Farm Fire & Cas. Co. v. Thomas, 756 F.Supp. 440, 445-6 (N.D.Cal. 1991); *Reliance Ins. Co. v. [156] Allan D. Windt, Insurance Claims & Disputes: Representation of Insurance Companies and Insureds, Sixth Edition, § 4:28, Insurer's withdrawal of defense of insured, Thomson Reuters.

[157] For example, the insurer's belated acceptance of defense was found to be a breach, precluding any argument that the insured breached its duty to cooperate, in Rajchandra Corp. v. Title Guaranty Co., 558 N.Y.S.2d 1001 (Sup.Ct.A.D. 1990).

Title Ins. Corp.,[158] the insureds manipulated the situation, after counsel was retained for them, in order to avoid having an order entered clearing their title. They then filed suit to collect from the insurer for the "loss." The court held that the insureds "have attempted to make a mockery of the district court's judgment," and denied their claim. The appeals court also affirmed the district court's Rule 11 sanctions against the insureds.[159]

The insurer and insured may differ as to what the insured must do to cooperate. Several decisions have held that an insured holding a junior mortgage does not have to bid in at the foreclosure sale of the senior mortgage in order to preserve its position while the insurer litigates the title issue:

> The defendant has ... provided neither contractual nor case law authority which equates the "duty to aid" with a duty to bid in at a foreclosure sale. Rather, plaintiff has cited case law from other jurisdictions to wit: Trigiani v. American Title Ins. Co., 392 Pa.Super 427, 573 A. 2d 230 (Pa. Super. 1990) and Wheeler v. Equitable Trust Co., 206 Pa. 428, 55 A. 1065 (1908), which reject the argument that an insured junior mortgagee is obligated to bid at a foreclosure sale of a senior mortgage.[160]

The court thus denied the insurer summary judgment as to its duty to indemnify.

The insurer must show actual prejudice caused by the insured's failure to cooperate.[161] In four reported cases, "defense" was tendered after judgment had been entered against the insured. In three out of four cases, the cooperation and tardy notice defenses were found ineffective, albeit on differing grounds.

In the first case, Chrysler First Financial Services Corp. of America v. Chicago Title Ins. Co.,[162] tender of a defense after judgment was entered in a foreclosure action, compounded by the insured's attendance at the sheriff's sale without bidding, was found to cause prejudice:

> The delay of plaintiff in giving defendant notice of this foreclosure action prejudiced defendant as a matter of law since defendant was improperly deprived under condition 2(b) of the policy, of its right to defend said foreclosure action, and of its right to prevent or reduce any loss. Under the circumstances, the defendant is relieved of any liability in the second cause of action.[163]

However, the same decision found a delay in tender of six months as to a second foreclosure action not prejudicial, since there were still five months remaining before the foreclosure sales.[164] In Griffith v. Safeco Title Ins. Co.,[165] even the fact that a default judgment was entered against the insured was not automatically prejudicial. The insured argued that the insurer had some notice of the suit before judgment was taken. This allowed the insured to survive summary judgment, with the court ruling that:

> [T]he evidence created a question of fact as to whether defendant was sufficiently apprised of the action, whether it took reasonable measures in response to the information and whether it was prejudiced by any noncompliance with the policy on [the insured's] part.[166]

Similarly, in Costagliola v. Lawyers Title Insurance Corp.,[167] the court refused to negate the duty to defend, because the insurer did not prove that the late notice caused it "appreciable harm." Rather, the court found that the insured avoided prejudice by prevailing in the underlying suit.[168] In Worthey v. Sedillo Title Guaranty Inc.,[169] the court found prejudice because the lawsuit was first tendered a month after judgment was entered against the insured, denying the insurer its "right to protect the title it insured and also to mitigate its damages."[170] However, the court required the insurer to prove the dollar value of the rights lost by the insured:

> We agree with [the insureds] that the prejudice with which we are here concerned is prejudice measured in terms of money, since the Title Company's obligation under its policy was expressed in terms of dollars. Plaintiffs have asserted, the Title Company takes no issue therewith, and we agree that the burden was on the Title Company to establish actual prejudice to it and the extent of such prejudice.[171]

Thus, to prevail on the prejudice issue, the insurer commonly must establish that it would have been better able to defend the title, or would have incurred less expense had it obtained prompt notice of the suit. See §4.3 regarding the insured's duty to promptly tender his or her defense in litigation to the insurer.

4.11 Withdrawal Of Defense; Pay-And-Walk Provision

There are several circumstances in which the insurer has the right to cease to defend its insured in litigation. The insured's refusal to cooperate in its own defense may justify the insurer in withdrawing that defense, as further discussed in §4.10. Also, in some jurisdictions, the duty to defend will cease if the allegations which created the potential for coverage are removed or, in some jurisdictions, negated by discovery or admission.[172] In such cases, when the jurisdiction so permits, the insurer has the right to withdraw its defense of the insured.[173] The same reasoning applies when the plaintiff clarifies an ambiguous pleading so that it clearly does not invoke coverage. Since the pleading invoked the duty to defend, its removal or modification may dispatch the duty. Thus, the insurer may work out of a duty to defend an ambiguous pleading. Conclusory or vague pleadings normally are refined to identifiable causes of action during the discovery process or by summary judgment motion. If the cause of action as later stated by the plaintiff in an amended pleading no longer makes allegations that create the potential for coverage, the insurer typically has the right to cease to defend of the insured.

However, proof through discovery that the plaintiff's position is without a valid basis in fact or law does not cause the pleading to cease to invoke the potential for coverage, and thus such evidence that the plaintiff's claim is groundless does not permit the insurer to withdraw from the defense of its insured. In such cases, the duty to defend is extinguished only when the insured obtains a final judgment defeating the plaintiff's claim. See §4.4.4 above regarding frivolous claims against the insured in litigation.

[172] For example, in Insured Titles, Inc. v. McDonald, 275 Mont. 111, 911 P.2d 209 (1996), an insured had brought suit to quiet its title. The insurer then offered the insured the land for which it had contracted. However, the insured elected to pursue its lawsuit to attempt to also obtain title to another parcel, which the insured had added to its deed by alteration. The insurer retendered the suit to the insured, and the court approved that action. It said: "As McDonald himself points out, an insurer may step out of a suit once it clearly and unequivocally demonstrates that the plaintiff's claim against the insured no longer falls within the policy's coverage. [citations omitted] Further, TRW argues that the case does not involve a duty to defend, rather, it involves TRW's prosecution of a quiet title action on McDonald's behalf. We conclude that the District Court did not err in determining that by negotiating the two acre settlement with Jones, TRW had satisfied its obligations under the policy and it did not breach its duties." 911 P.2d at 212. In Premier Homes, Inc. v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 76 F.Supp.2d 110 (D.Mass. 1999), the insurer accepted a defense with a reservation of rights based on an allegation that the insured was not a bona fide purchaser for value without notice. The insured's motion for summary judgment was denied, after which the insurer retendered the defense. The insured then settled the case and sued for breach of the duty to defend. The court found the dismissal of some of the complaint and the ruling on summary judgment did not amount to a judicial determination of facts which would establish coverage or lack thereof. Rather, the insurer was obligated to pay for the insured's defense that the allegations were untrue. If the defense had succeeded, the insured would have proven the falsity of the allegations that raised a question about policy coverage. Therefore, the court held, the insurer retendered prematurely. It called the insurer's action "hollow opportunism."

[173] For example, in Kirwan v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 9 Neb.App. 372, 612 N.W.2d 515 (Neb.App. 2000), aff'd 261 Neb. 609, 624 N.W.2d 644 (2001), the insurer withdrew from defending the insured when discovery established that there was no potential for coverage because the adverse title claim had been disclosed to the insured before closing and not revealed to the title insurer. The insurer did not bring a declaratory judgment action. The insured sued for breach. The court approved the insurer's withdrawal, finding no duty to defend or indemnify.

Duty to Defend

The insurer is permitted to withdraw from defending a party in litigation when that party ceases to be the insured under the policy.[174] See §7.3 on termination of the owner's policy. The ALTA loan policy states that each successor owner of the Indebtedness becomes a successor insured. When an insured sells the loan, the assignee becomes the insured, and the insurer's duty to defend the assignor ceases, as discussed in full at §7.4.

The 2006 and 1992 ALTA policies also permit the insurer to withdraw from the defense of an insured when the insurer pays the insured either policy limits or its actual loss.[175] This is sometimes known as a pay-and-walk provision. The Homeowner's policy contains language similar to that found in the 2006 and 1992 ALTA policies.[176] The Residential policy contains a less specific provision, which suggests that the duty to defend terminates only on payment of policy limits.[177]

The language of the policy on pay-and-walk has changed over time, and the policy provisions have been interpreted differently. In Batdorf v. Transamerica Title Ins. Co.,[178] the policy stated that "[t]he Company may at any time pay this policy in full, whereupon all liability of the Company shall terminate." The insurer defended the insured for a time, then paid policy limits and retendered defense to the insured. The court permitted the insurer to exercise the pay-and-walk provision on payment of policy limits, saying: "By paying up, the insurer removed all of its further liability. Therefore, attorneys' fees, incurred after the payment, were incurred about a 'claim' which was no longer covered by the policy."

However, an older form of title insurance policy was found not to have a clear-cut pay-and-walk provision, and therefore the insurer was not entitled to withdraw its defense of the insured on payment of policy limits. In Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. The Kent School Corp., [179] the policy stated

[175] See First Tennessee Bank, N.A. v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 282 F.R.D. 423 (N.D.Ill. 2012) (duty to defend insured ceases on payment of policy limits). In Mortensen v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 149 Idaho 437, 235 P.3d 387 (Idaho 2010), the Idaho Supreme Court held that a 1992 owner's policy allowed the insurer to pay policy limits and refuse to appeal a decision adverse to the insured. The court also said that the policy gave the insurer the right to choose whether or not to appeal. The court quoted Conditions & Stipulations § 4(c) regarding appeals, and § 6 concerning pay-and-walk, and concluded that "[u]nder the plain language in the insurance policy, Stewart Title had the contractual ability to abandon Mortensen's appeal and to instead tender full payment of the policy to Mortensen."

[176] The ALTA Homeowner's policy describes the insurer's various choices in resolving a covered claim, which include: "(5) End the coverage of this Policy for the claim by paying You Your actual loss resulting from the Covered Risk, and those costs, attorneys' fees and expenses incurred up to that time which We are obligated to pay. …(7) End all coverage of this Policy by paying You the Policy Amount then in force, and those costs, attorneys' fees and expenses incurred up to that time which We are obligated to pay. … When We choose the options in paragraphs 4.a. (5), (6) or (7), all Our obligations for the claim end, including Our obligation to defend, or continue to defend, any legal action."

[177] The ALTA Residential policy says that one of the insurer's options is to "[c]ancel this policy by paying the Policy Amount, then in force, and only those costs, attorneys' fees and expenses incurred up to that time which we are obligated to pay."

"[i]n every case where claim is made for loss or damages this company … (2) may terminate its liability hereunder by paying or tendering the full amount of this policy… ."[180] The court found that the term "liability," as used in that policy, was undefined and referred only to the insurer's indemnity obligation. Thus, the insurer was deemed not to be entitled to terminate its separate duty to defend even on payment of policy limits. The court rejected Batdorf because the policy in that case had different language. However, the court acknowledged that the language of the 1992 ALTA policy contains an enforceable pay-and-walk provision.[181]

The 1992 and 2006 ALTA policy forms also say that the insurer is released from its defense obligation on payment to the insured of the loss caused by a defect, lien or encumbrance, in an amount that is less than policy limits. Often, in neighbor dispute cases, the cost of defense will far exceed the value of the property rights at issue, but is still less than policy limits. The insurer typically wishes to pay the insured the diminution in value, as if the insured had lost the disputed property. Conditions & Stipulations 6(b)(ii) of the 1992 ALTA policy and Condition 7(b)(i) of the 2006 ALTA policy permit the insurer "to pay or otherwise settle with the insured claimant the loss or damage provided for under this policy, together with any costs, attorneys' fees and expenses incurred by the insured claimant which were authorized by the Company up to the time of payment and which the Company is obligated to pay." When the insurer has paid "the loss or damage" to the insured,

> … the Company's obligations to the Insured under this policy for the claimed loss or damage, other than the payments required to be made, shall terminate, including any liability or obligation to defend, prosecute, or continue any litigation.

Conditions & Stipulations 6(b), 1992 ALTA policy; Condition 7(b), 2006 ALTA policy.

One court upheld the insurer's right to withdraw from defense of an insured on payment of the amount of the diminution in value.[182] Another court, however, issued a series of decisions in which it wavered in its rulings about the insurer's right to withdraw from defense after paying a loss of less than policy limits. In Fleishour v. Stewart Title Guar. Co.,[183] the insureds were sued by their neighbor over a minor disputed strip of land. They tendered their defense to Stewart Title, which offered to pay them $1,000 for diminution in value in lieu of defending them. The insureds sued Stewart Title, seeking an order requiring it to defend them. In a 2009 decision issued before trial, the court seemed to declare that Stewart Title was entitled to pay diminution and walk. The court noted

[182] In Toste v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2012 WL 1023360 (Cal.App. 3 Dist.) (unpublished), the court construed an ALTA Residential policy. It said that the insurer was not required to appeal an adverse decision for the insureds because it paid the loss: "When this option is exercised, First American's obligations toward the claim ends, including its obligation to defend any legal action. First American chose this option. Upon doing so, First American had no duty to appeal the adverse judgment against the Tostes."

that Condition 5, which creates the duty to defend, "clearly indicates that there are some limitations on Defendant's duty to defend, as it expressly states that the obligation is subject to the options detailed in Section 7 of the Policy." The court also said that Condition 7 warns the insured of the insurer's right to pay diminution and walk. The court said that it needed evidence in order to determine if the payment tendered by Stewart Title had fully compensated the insured for the loss. It reiterated, however, that if Stewart is later found to have paid the full loss, "the Policy unambiguously states that the duty to defend terminated." After trial, however, the court issued a second decision,[184] ruling that the insurer was not entitled to pay diminution in lieu of defense, because the final determination clause says that no loss is payable until the lawsuit is over:

> … [Stewart Title] had no option to pay the amount of Plaintiffs' "loss or damage" in the face of Silberman's threatened or pending lawsuit because until that suit was concluded, Plaintiffs had not sustained any actual "loss or damage" under the policy—a contract of indemnity—for which Defendant could indemnify them. … The plain language of the policy supports this conclusion. The portion of Section 8 that precedes the means of calculating "loss or damage" states that "this policy is a contract of indemnity against actual monetary loss or damage sustained or incurred by the Insured Claimant who has suffered loss or damage by reason of matters insured against by this policy." (emphasis added). Thus, Defendant could not elect its Section 7(b)(ii) option--paying to the insured the "loss or damage" provided for in the policy--and then resort to Section 8(a) to calculate the extent of its liability for "loss or damage," because no "actual monetary loss or damage" had at that point been sustained. …
> If Defendant's interpretation were correct--that it is entitled to pay the anticipated loss to satisfy its duty to defend--then it would only ever provide an insured's defense in cases in which it concludes both that (1) the third party's claim has no merit; and (2) the anticipated litigation costs are less than the insured's anticipated loss--an absurd result that is contrary to a title insurance purchaser's understanding of the product. … Generally speaking, in situations in which Defendant concludes that a claim has merit, it would never have any reason to incur any litigation expenses under its interpretation because it could simply pay the amount of the insured's loss should the claimant's suit be successful. In cases in which it believes that the claim has no merit, Defendant would look to the anticipated litigation costs, and if those costs are greater than the anticipated loss, it would likewise choose to pay the anticipated loss. This result seems especially unfair in cases such as this where the insureds are faced with a pending lawsuit that they cannot settle. … In short, the Court finds that an interpretation of this policy that precludes a duty to defend against meritorious claims, and against meritless claims where the anticipated litigation costs are greater than the anticipated loss, would be an "absurd" result that distorts the purpose of title insurance.

[184] Fleishour v. Stewart Title Guar. Co. 743 F.Supp.2d 1060 (E.D.Mo. 2010).

> The Court therefore finds that Defendant could not relieve itself of its duty to defend against Silberman's adverse possession suit by paying to Plaintiffs, its insured, their anticipated loss should Silberman's claim have been successful. The plain language of the policy does not give Defendant the option to indemnify its insureds for losses that have not yet been sustained, and this interpretation is supported by common sense and the reasonable expectations of purchasers of title insurance.[185]

The Fleishour conclusion is not mandated by the policy's language, and in fact renders the entire provision meaningless.

The purpose of the diminution pay-and-walk provision is exactly as Fleishour stated it, to allow the title insurer to pay the insured the value of the disputed land in lieu of spending many times that amount to litigate over its ownership, and when the disputed land is worth far less than policy limits. That issue was highlighted in First American Title Ins. Co. v. Grafton Partners, LLC.[186] That case involved a 1992 policy in the amount of $16 million. There was a dispute over a small strip of land. The insurer got a diminution appraisal valuing the disputed land at $26,300, and tendered that amount to the insured. The court issued a decision, but for some reason only addressed Conditions & Stipulations 6(a), which permits the insurer to retender defense on payment of "the amount of insurance under this policy." Not surprisingly, the court found that First American would have to pay policy limits to extinguish its duty to defend under that provision:

> First American assumes…that 'the amount of insurance' is equivalent to the amount of 'loss' that Grafton would suffer, [which First American] asserts is determined by the appraised value it obtained for the disputed portion of the Property. … Reading Section 6(a) according to the provision's plain meaning, "[t]o pay or tender payment of the amount of insurance under this policy" would require First American to tender $16,000,000 to Grafton.

The court simply addressed the wrong policy provision. At the end of the decision, the court wrote: "As discussed with the parties at the hearing on this motion, the potential exists that summary judgment may be available under Section 6(b)(ii) if First American can establish as a matter of law that its tender, while less than the amount of insurance required under Section 6(a), nevertheless constitutes the loss or damage provided under the policy." The court set a new briefing schedule on paragraph 6(b)(ii), but never issued a second decision.

The title insurer's right to pay and walk as specified in the policy may be tempered by a state law that limits such provisions. Some states do not permit an insurer to cease defending an insured on payment of policy limits, or impose limitations on that right, such as that tender cannot be made an unreasonably short time before trial. Other states permit such provisions to be enforced only when they are highlighted in the text of the policy.[187] The rationale employed by some such states is that the duty to defend is independent of the duty to indemnify, and therefore cannot be terminated by payment of policy limits.

Note, also, that the settlement of a lawsuit against the insured is not the same as payment to the insured of policy limits. Therefore, such a settlement has been found not to extinguish the duty to defend a second suit against the insured.[188]

4.12 Right Or Duty To Appeal

The insurer may wish to appeal an adverse ruling because a reversal will establish title as insured. The policy gives the insurer that right.[189] See §3.4.8 for a full analysis of the right to pursue litigation to a final determination, including the right to appeal.

4.13 Insurer's Settlement Of Lawsuit

Generally, an insurer has a duty to settle a lawsuit against the insured, based on a covered cause of action, which could otherwise result in a money judgment in excess of policy limits. This duty comes into play more frequently with general liability policies than title policies, given the fact that an adverse ruling in a title suit does not ordinarily result in a money judgment against the insured. Further, it is well established that the title insurer has the right in its sole discretion to establish title as insured. Therefore, the "duty to settle" does not apply in most title insurance cases.

When there is the possibility of a money judgment against the insured in excess of policy limits, the title insurer has a duty to settle if there is no reasonable basis for contesting the suit. However, when there are reasonable grounds to contest, the insurer may insist on litigating to a judgment.[190]

Construction liens are a frequent subject of the claimed duty to settle. Many times, there are valid defenses to the liens. However, lien claims also tend to hang up construction projects in mid-stream, creating time pressure. It is well established, however, that the insurer has the right to dispute the liens as long as it acts with reasonable alacrity. For example, an insured did not have a right to an

However, the result should be different under the terms of the 1992 or 2006 ALTA policy forms. Condition 7(b)(i) of the 2006 ALTA policies (Conditions & Stipulations 6(b)(i) of the 1992 ALTA Owner's policy) permits the insurer "to pay or otherwise settle with other parties for or in the name of an Insured Claimant any claim insured against under this policy," upon which all policy duties are extinguished.

[189] Condition 5(c) of the 2006 ALTA policies states: "[w]henever the Company brings an action or asserts a defense as required or permitted by this policy, the Company may pursue the litigation to a final determination by a court of competent jurisdiction, and it expressly reserves the right, in its sole discretion, to appeal any adverse judgment or order." Conditions & Stipulations 4(c) of the 1992 ALTA policies contained a very similar provision.

Arizona Title Ins. & Trust Co.*, 141 Ariz. 363, 687 P.2d 371 (App. 1984) ("the extent of Arizona Title's liability to Community Hospital was 'fairly debatable' and ... there existed a 'reasonable basis' for Arizona Title's refusal to pay over the policy limit.").

injunction precluding the insurer from interposing the voluntary settlement defense as to an insured's settlement of construction lien claims, when the insurer wished to litigate the lien claims instead.[191] The insurer's right to clear title is not a duty, and the insurer is not required to settle an adverse lien claim rather than defend the litigation.[192] See §3.4 for a full analysis of the right to clear title, and the conditions under which that right can become a duty. When the insurer retained counsel to defend the insured's position against liens that were apparently invalid, it had no duty to pay the liens instead as demanded by the insured.[193]

An insurer is not obligated to settle claims not covered by the policy. This is particularly so when there is little likelihood of liability on the covered counts. The insurer may consider its own economic interest in such a situation.[194] The insurer may not enter into a settlement designed to let the insurer profit at the insured's expense.[195]

Denial of defense and filing of declaratory judgment

When the insurer believes it has no duty to defend, its response to the insured will depend on the requirements of the law of the jurisdiction. In many jurisdictions, the only response required is a letter explaining the basis for the company's decision. In other states, however, a simple declination is not enough.

In some jurisdictions, an insurer is required to bring a declaratory judgment action to determine its duty to defend whenever it rejects a tender of defense, or face the possibility that it will [citation omitted] Nor does it require an insurer to pay 'meritless claims.'" 235 Cal.Rptr. at 41.

[195] Thus, when the insurer settled that part of the lawsuit affecting title, in exchange for the plaintiff's agreement to repay the insurer by diligently pursuing non-title claims in the same lawsuit, the insurer violated its "duty of 'a fiduciary nature' not to benefit at the expense of its insured." *Matison v. be estopped to deny coverage. In such states, the insurer must defend the insured until a ruling is made as to the duty to defend. See §4.13 regarding estoppel to deny coverage. In other states, the insurer may wish to bring a declaratory action if it appears likely that it will also need a ruling as to the duty to indemnify. The declaratory judgment suit is often consolidated with the main action.[196] The insurer may be further required by state law to seek a ruling on coverage in advance of trial on the underlying action, by bifurcated trial if necessary.[197] The majority rule is that attorney's fees are not awarded to the prevailing party in a declaratory judgment suit. However, some states have specific statutes on the subject or case law granting fees in certain circumstances. State law should always be consulted on the subject.[198]

The insurer sometimes brings a declaratory judgment action as to the duty to indemnify, especially when the claim presents complicated or untested issues about policy coverage. By asking for a court declaration about coverage, the insurer is putting the issue of its duty to the insured in the hands of the court. Because the insurer has not denied the claim, it cannot have refused to pay the claim in bad faith.[199]

A declaratory judgment action may be brought in federal court if the court would have jurisdiction over the matter.[200] If the action is brought in state court, the policy dictates the [196] In David & Sheri Elter, LLC v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2016 WL 6472647 (W.D.La. 2016) (unpublished), report and recommendation adopted by 2016 WL 6462170 (W.D.La.) (unpublished), the insurer brought a declaratory judgment in federal court. The insured resisted, seeking to drive the case back to the state court that would hear the underlying action. The federal court ruled that it did not have jurisdiction because the insurer could not establish objectively that there was at least $75,000 at issue. The court ruled that the claimed diminution in value, not the policy amount, was the basis for the amount in controversy.

[197] For example, in Penney v. Capitol City Transfer, Inc., 707 A.2d 387 (Me. 1998), the court recited the bifurcation method used in Maine, which is to decide the duty to defend, then the underlying action, and finally the duty to indemnify.

[198] See Allan D. Windt, Insurance Claims & Disputes: Representation of Insurance Companies and Insureds, Sixth Edition, § 9:24, Thomson Reuters. The majority rule was followed in the title insurance case of Yaffie v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 1998 Me. 77, 710 A.2d 886 (Me. 1998).

[199] In Terry v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 390 S.E.2d 123 (Ga.App. 1990), the insurer accepted defense under a reservation of rights and a non-waiver agreement. It then filed a declaratory judgment action as to the duty to defend. The insured counterclaimed in the declaratory relief action, claiming that the suit had been brought in bad faith "without cause, without any basis, for the purpose of delay and harassment, and for the purpose of causing this defendant unnecessary trouble and expense." The court found that it was proper for the insurer to bring the action, even though it had accepted the defense under a reservation of rights. Similarly, in Transamerica Title Ins. Co. v. Superior Court, 188 Cal.App.3d 1047, 233 Cal.Rptr. 825 (Cal.App. 6 Dist. 1987), the insured sued for bad faith when the insurer filed a declaratory judgment action. The court did not address the merits of the bad faith claim, but did decide that the insurer's communications with its attorneys during the course of the lawsuit were not discoverable. The insured had sought to defeat the privilege because the insurer asserted that it had filed the declaratory judgment action on the advice of counsel.

[200] In Jury v. WFG Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 2018 WL 1912713 (N.D.Tex. 2018) (unpublished), which concerned an insurer's duty to issue a policy, the federal court had diversity jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1332 because all parties were residents of different states. The court ruled that the $75,000 amount-in-controversy threshold was satisfied based on the face amount of the policy demanded by the claimant. The court said that the usual rule that "the jurisdictional amount in controversy is measured by the value of the underlying claim—not the face amount of the policy," as stated in appropriate venue and choice of law as to claims on the policy.[201] As to claims not controlled by a policy choice of forum provision, the parties must establish that venue in a particular state court is appropriate, and that the state has jurisdiction over all of the parties.[202]

The insurer may assert in a declaratory judgment action that it has no duty to defend or indemnify the insured for a variety of reasons. Those bases include, but are not limited to, the following: the lack of policy coverage for the asserted matter (see Chapter 9 concerning policy coverage and §4.5); that the claimant is not an insured (see Chapter 7); that the claimant has not established the existence of a policy (see §2.3.4); that the insured has submitted a tardy tender of defense or notice of claim (see §2.3.3 regarding tardy notice of claim and §4.3 concerning policy term stating that insurer has no duty to pay for pre-tender defense costs); that the applicable statute of limitation has run (see §2.15); that the insured has voided coverage by failing to cooperate with the insurer in clearing title (see §2.8); that the insurer has cleared title, which extinguishes all policy duties (see §3.4.5); that the insured released the insurer for the subject matter of the claim (see §2.11); or that coverage for the insured's claim is barred by an applicable policy exclusion (see Chapter 11) or exception (see Chapter 12).

The insurer may also assert that the insured is barred as a matter of law from making a claim under the policy.[203] The insured may also lose the right to sue the insurer based on doctrines intended to bring finality to litigation.[204] The insurer may be entitled to a setoff in the amount of the Hartford Insurance Group v. Lou-Con, Inc., 293 F.3d 908, 911 (5th Cir. 2002)), did not apply, because in this case the essence of the dispute was the existence and validity of the insurance contract.

[201] Condition 17 of the 2006 ALTA policies, entitled Choice of Law; Forum, says: "(a) Choice of Law: The Insured acknowledges the Company has underwritten the risks covered by this policy and determined the premium charged therefor in reliance upon the law affecting interests in real property and applicable to the interpretation, rights, remedies, or enforcement of policies of title insurance of the jurisdiction where the Land is located. Therefore, the court or an arbitrator shall apply the law of the jurisdiction where the Land is located to determine the validity of claims against the Title that are adverse to the Insured and to interpret and enforce the terms of this policy. In neither case shall the court or arbitrator apply its conflicts of law principles to determine the applicable law. (b) Choice of Forum: Any litigation or other proceeding brought by the Insured against the Company must be filed only in a state or federal court within the United States of America or its territories having appropriate jurisdiction." The 2015 versions of the ALTA closing protection letter has a similar provision. The 1992 and 1970 versions of the ALTA policies did not contain a choice of law and forum provision.

[202] In Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. Bell, 549 S.W.3d 550, 61 Tex. Sup. Ct. J. 1288 (Tex. 2018), involving a fraudulent transfer action brought by a title insurer, the Texas Supreme Court said that Texas had no personal jurisdiction over the defendant, who lived in Louisiana, despite the fact that she received the proceeds from the sale of Texas real estate, lent money to a Texas woman secured by Texas property, and repeatedly wired money to the woman in Texas. In Buhl Building, L.L.C. v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 2019 WL 3916615 (Del.Super.) (unpublished), in construing an ALTA policy that did not contain a choice of law provision, a Delaware court ruled that the law that controlled a bad faith claim was that of the state in which the insured property was located.

[203] In Agha-Khan v. Mortgage Electronic Registration Systems Inc., 2018 WL 3745814 (D.Nev. 2018) (unpublished), appeal filed August 17, 2018, the court held that an insured was estopped from suing a title insurer and title agent for title-related claims because she had not disclosed those claims in her bankruptcy schedules.

[204] For example, in Mocco v. Frumento, 710 Fed.Appx. 535, 2017 WL 4231556 (3rd Cir. (N.J.)) (unpublished), the court employed the "entire controversy" doctrine to bar the insured from adding the title insurer to longstanding litigation insured's recovery from other parties for the same claimed loss.[205]

A declaratory judgment action is expensive and time-consuming for both insurer and insured. To some extent, it makes the insurer and insured adversaries. It also may affect the underlying action, or determine the insured's property rights vis-à-vis other parties.[206] In discovery, the facts favorable to the insurer are often also beneficial to the adverse party, which causes the insurer to build the case against the insured as it seeks to determine coverage. Given these disadvantages to the insured, it is often preferable to the insured as well as the insurer to settle any disagreement as to the duty to defend. The insured may release the insurer from the duty to provide the defense. Such a release should state that the insurer does not waive the policy provisions regarding voluntary settlement or prejudice of the insured's rights by its conduct in the litigation. The release may further state that any claimed duty to indemnify is not being released, or provide a mechanism by which the duty to indemnify will be resolved (which could include by arbitration).

4.15 Damages For Breach Of Duty To Defend

When the insurer denies a defense without a sufficient basis, it may become liable for several types of damages. First, the insurer is responsible for a judgment entered against the insured in the litigation that is based on a claim covered by the policy. Second, an insurer that wrongfully refuses to defend an insured must pay the cost of that defense.[207] This merely reimburses the insured for the defense cost incurred by the insured that the court has determined the insurer should have paid.

over title on the eve of trial. New Jersey's entire controversy doctrine dictates that "a party cannot withhold part of a controversy for separate later litigation even when the withheld component is a separate and independently cognizable cause of action." The doctrine "applies in federal courts when there was a previous state-court action involving the same transaction." The purposes of the rule are to avoid piecemeal decisions about the same controversy, to promote fairness to all parties in the dispute and to avoid waste and delay. The court noted that the insurer had been harmed by being named years into the litigation in part because all claims that it might have brought against others were already time-barred.

[205] In Sky View at Las Palmas, LLC v. Mendez, 555 S.W.3d 101, 61 Tex.Sup.Ct.J. 1268 (Tex. 2018), a lender sought to collect its debt from various parties, under assorted theories. The court held that the money it collected from the title insurer and others was properly credited against the judgment the lender obtained against the borrower. Setoff should apply in the other direction also. In Sky View, the Texas Supreme Court provided a lengthy analysis of both the one-satisfaction rule and the collateral source rule.

[206] In Swinger v. Vanderpol, 2016 WL 7470091 (Wash.App. 1 Div.) (unpublished), the insured filed suit against the insurer to assert coverage for the insured's claim that he did not have access to three acres of land on the other side of the river from his main parcel. Swinger claimed to own the three acres because he said that area was an oxbow that was cut off when the river changed course in an avulsive movement. The court ruled that Swinger had not established that he owned the oxbow. Later, Swinger sued the owner of the land on the other side of the river, and the court held that the ruling about title in the coverage action was collateral estoppel binding on Swinger, and was in effect a ruling that he was not the owner of the disputed land. The coverage action thus had a dispositive adverse effect on the insured's rights in the property.

[207] See Banner Bank v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2017 WL 1378021 (D. Utah) (unpublished), which found the insurer liable for the cost of defending the insured in an action that the court said the insurer wrongly refused. The decision was on appeal as of January 5, 2019. However, the Tenth Circuit reversed, finding no duty to defend and no duty to pay the cost of that defense. 916 F.3d 1323 (10th Cir. (Utah) 2019).

An insurer that wrongly rejects a defense also typically becomes liable for paying the amount of a settlement entered into by the insured, absent evidence of collusion.[208] See §2.14.4 for a discussion of settlement after rejection of a defense.

Also, several jurisdictions hold that the insurer is precluded from enforcing certain policy terms after a wrongful rejection of defense, under a doctrine termed estoppel to deny coverage.[209] This principle is based on the idea that an insurer that wrongfully rejects a defense is later estopped to contest policy coverage. In states that have adopted the estoppel rule, an insurer that wrongly rejects a defense may also be liable for a judgment against the insured even in excess of policy limits.[210]

Finally, in jurisdictions recognizing the tort of bad faith breach of an insurance contract, the insurer may also be sued for bad faith penalties or punitive damages for its failure to defend. See Chapter 16 for a full discussion of bad faith actions.

The decision was on appeal as of January 5, 2019. However, the Tenth Circuit reversed, finding no duty to defend and no duty to reimburse the insured for the settlement amount. 916 F.3d 1323 (10th Cir. (Utah) 2019).

The authors point out that the doctrine has different ramifications in each state. The states they list as having adopted estoppel to deny are Alaska (citing *Sauer v. Home Indem. 5 Recoupment

This chapter discusses the three main means of recoupment of a loss payment by an insurer: subrogation rights, salvage, and enforcement of indemnities. The underlying principles of subrogation claims are discussed in §5.1 through §5.6. The insurer's subrogation rights against various classes of third parties are described in detail at §5.7. Recovery against a bankruptcy debtor, including the issue of whether or not the debt is dischargeable, is covered in §5.11. The related subject of an insurer's rights in pursuing indemnitors is discussed at §5.10. Section 5.13 discusses recovery for policy losses under reinsurance treaties or contracts, liability policies issued to title insurers and letters of indemnity issued by one insurer to another. Another related subject, recovery by the title insurer against a title agent and/or its errors and omissions carrier, is discussed in §17.8.

5.1 Subrogation

Subrogation is an equitable remedy applied according to the facts of the particular case. State law varies in some respects as to an insurer's rights of subrogation. Thus, every case in which the insurer considers pursuing third parties by subrogation must begin with a careful analysis of the basic equities of the case between the insured, insurer and third party. Each case must also take into account any particular variations on the subrogation doctrine which exist in the state.

This chapter discusses the following subjects:

1. Has the insured been made "whole"?

2. Does the policy provide for subrogation rights against the third party in question?

3. Does the insured have any rights to pursue against the third party?

4. What defenses does the third party have against the insured?

5. What defenses does the third party have against the insurer as subrogee?

5.2 Principles Of Subrogation Generally

Subrogation is an equitable doctrine. When a party (the subrogor) suffers damage, and is entitled to compensation from two different parties, the party making compensation (the subrogee) "stands in the shoes of" the subrogor.[1] As stated in Fidelity National Title Ins. Co. v. Miller,

> "[E]quitable assignment or right of subrogation is a creature of equity and applies to all cases where one party involuntarily pays a debt for which another is primarily liable and which in equity and good conscience should have been paid by the latter [citations]." (In re Marriage of Shore (1977) 71 Cal. App. 3d 290, 297, 139 Cal. Rptr. 349.) "Subrogation carries with it the right of the subrogee to pursue an equitable lien possessed by the subrogor." [Citation.][2]

The equitable purpose of subrogation is to prevent unjust enrichment.

> An equitable lien, like a constructive trust, is a remedy designed to enforce restitution so as to prevent unjust enrichment.[3]

For example, recovery against a seller was permitted when the deed to the seller was declared a mere mortgage, and moreover was void even as a mortgage because the underlying debt had been paid. The sellers would have been unjustly enriched if allowed to keep the proceeds on a sale of the property.[4] Also, an insurer was permitted to recover against a buyer who paid too little as a result of the escrowee's mistake on the closing statement.[5] Likewise, an insurer was allowed to recover from the owners for a lien missed on a title commitment.[6] The owners, the Nissells, were the daughter and Co., 21 Wash.2d 703, 708, 152 P.2d 716 (1944). It is founded in the facts and circumstances of each particular case and on the principles of natural justice. In general, it will be applied wherever any person, other than a mere volunteer, will suffer damage because of the unjust enrichment of another. The doctrine, however, will not be applied if it would work injustice to the rights of those having equal or superior equities; nor will it be enforced against a bona fide purchaser for value without notice or one who, in good faith, has changed his position in reliance upon the act which subsequently is claimed to have been a mistake.' Subrogation is a consequence which equity attaches to certain conditions. It is not an absolute right, but one which depends upon the equities and attending facts and circumstances of each case." Coy v. Raabe, 69 Wash.2d 346, 418 P.2d 728, 731 (1966) [quoting Credit Bureau Corp. v. Beckstead, 63 Wash.2d 183, 385 P.2d 864 (1963)].

son-in-law of Swartz, the former owner who created the lien, and Swartz had advanced the Nissells the funds to buy the property at trustee's sale.

> [T]he Nissells have not shown that they have the "clean hands" required to obtain equitable relief. [citation omitted] ... While [Swartz] owned the property, it was subject to Ticor's lien. It would be inequitable if the law allowed her to finance her daughter's purchase of the property free of the lien after she had defaulted on her debt to Ticor.[7]

Similarly, an insurer was allowed to collect as assignee of a note and mortgage rather than as subrogee, in order to avoid unjust enrichment to a borrower. The court rejected the borrower's claim that the insurer was estopped from enforcing the debt because it failed to discover a senior federal tax lien.[8]

Because subrogation is rooted in basic equity, it does not depend on contract, statute or the common law.[9]

> Subrogation may be defined as the substitution of another person in the place of a creditor, so that the person in whose favor it is exercised succeeds to the rights of the creditor in relation to the debt.
>
> Subrogation does not owe its origin to statute or custom; nor is it a doctrine of the common law. It originated in equity and is a creature of equity, a doctrine of equity jurisprudence which was adopted by equity from the Roman or the civil law.[10]

Recoupment by subrogation will be denied if the subrogee is determined in equity to be the party which should ultimately bear the loss. The subject of the insurer's negligence in omitting an encumbrance, and its effect on the insurer's equitable right to recover, is discussed generally at §5.8 and at §5.9 specifically as to sellers of property. Whenever an insurer seeks subrogation, it is because both the insurer and another party have an obligation to compensate the insured.[11] Once the insured is made whole, the issue is which of the two responsible parties should wind up with the ultimate loss. This analysis is made in equity, and may be thought of in terms of which party owes indemnity to the other.[12] See §5.10 regarding recoupment under indemnities.

In determining who should bear the ultimate loss, the fact that one party stepped in first to make the insured whole is not a factor.[13] However, when the insurer pays the insured without being able to clearly identify the source of its duty, the court may construe payment as voluntary or for goodwill, making the insurer ultimately responsible. Thus, when an insurer made payment on a closing protection letter after an attorney defalcation, the court found the payment "an effort to continue the goodwill of the lender." It held the insurer responsible for the loss, in its suit against the note maker.[14]

An insurer has the right to seek recoupment after paying its insured.[15] The title insurance policy provides subrogation rights against various parties. See §5.5 regarding the language contained in the policy and the insurer's rights under the policy.

insured suffered a loss, that the insurer was not primarily liable for the loss, that it paid the insured, that payment was not as a volunteer, that the insured had a cause of action it could assign, that its loss was caused by the other party, that the insurer's loss can be quantified, and that "justice requires that the loss be entirely shifted from the insurer to the defendant, whose equitable position is inferior to that of the insurer… ." *Fireman's Fund Ins. The right of indemnity rests upon a difference between the primary and secondary liability of two persons, each of whom is made responsible under the law to an injured party. It is a right which enures to a person who, without active fault on his own part, has been compelled, by reason of some legal obligation, to pay damages occasioned by the initial negligence of another, and for which he himself is only secondarily liable. [citations omitted] The Title Company is responsible to the Enrights by virtue of its contractual obligation on its policy of title insurance. The obligation of the Title Company to pay stems solely from the error by Bailey in his survey in mislocating the utility easements. Under the circumstances the Title Company is entitled to full indemnity... ."

[13] "It is well established that where two parties are obligated to indemnify the same person for the same loss, the payment of the obligation by one does not create a right in him superior to the nonpaying party which would justify subrogation if the latter did not cause the loss. (Patent Scaffolding Co. v. William Simpson Constr. Co., 256 Cal.App.2d 506, 64 Cal.Rptr. 187.) In other words, and more simply stated, equity will not by the use of the remedy of subrogation permit one obligor to shift his obligation to another by being the first to pay unless the equities of the situation dictate that the latter ought to bear the onus of the obligation." *American Title Co. v. 5.3 Making The Insured Whole

Most states have adopted the principle that an insurer's subrogation rights do not vest until the insured has been made whole, which means that the insured has recovered his or her entire loss.[16] In a "made whole" doctrine jurisdiction, a payment by the insurer to the insured of less than the insured's full loss, even when such payment is the full amount owed under the policy, may be found to preclude the insurer from standing in the insured's shoes to pursue subrogation rights. Alternately, the insurer's payment to the insured of less than the "made whole" amount may limit the insurer's subrogation rights so that it must share pro rata with the insured from what is recovered from a third party.

The ALTA title insurance policies do not make the insurer's subrogation rights conditional on the insured having been "made whole" by the insurer. The policy states that the insurer is subrogated "[w]henever the Company shall have settled and paid a claim" under the policy. The 1992 ALTA policies stated that the insurer had a pro rata subrogation right if its payment did not make the insured whole:

> If a payment on account of a claim does not fully cover the loss of the insured claimant, the Company shall be subrogated to these rights and remedies in the proportion which the Company's payment bears to the whole amount of the loss.[17]

Therefore, that policy form clearly asserted that the insurer has the right of subrogation on partial payment to the insured. That statement was modified in the 2006 ALTA policies. Conditions 13(a) of the later policies states:

> If a payment on account of a claim does not fully cover the loss of the Insured Claimant, the Company shall defer the exercise of its right to recover until after the Insured Claimant shall have recovered its loss.

The ALTA Homeowner's Policy states that the insurer is subrogated to the insured's rights to the extent of a loss payment made. It goes further by identifying the order in which recoupment Transnation Title Ins. Co.*, 234 Or.App. 115, 227 P.3d 770 (Or.App. 2010), a title insurer's demand that a seller reimburse it for a loss that it had not yet paid led the seller to seek a declaratory judgment that the loss should be borne by the title agent that searched title. The court ruled that the lawsuit was premature until the loss was paid. In Marchetti v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 829 F.3d 498 (7th Cir. (Ill.) 2016), the title insurer was found to have made the insureds whole, and thus to be entitled to subrogation. The insurer defended the insured owners in a quiet title suit. When the insureds lost that action and were divested of title, the insurer paid off their lender and obtained a release of the insureds' personal liability on the loan. The loan amount was more than the value of the real estate, which meant that the insured owners were not entitled to be paid any additional money in order to be made whole for the loss of the title to the property. In Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. Wooden, 2017 WL 2243032 (N.D.Ala.) (unpublished), the court held that the insurer was not vested with subrogation rights against a third party until it made a payment to the insured, citing the made-whole doctrine.

payments will be applied to reimburse the insured and insurer for their losses and expenses. See §5.5 for a complete discussion of the policy provision concerning pro rata recovery by the insurer through subrogation.

The "made whole" rule could be argued as a basis to preclude an insurer from bringing a claim against a third party to recover for an expected policy loss before the insurer pays a loss to the insured. Such claims against third parties should be brought in the name of the insured, and belong to the insured unless and until the insurer pays a loss to the insured or on its behalf. However, some courts permit the insurer to join a third party based on the insurer's contingent liability to the insured, the goal being to expedite and consolidate related litigation.[18] Also, the insurer was found not to have a subrogation claim against the IRS when the insurer had not paid off either the IRS or the insured, but rather had put money in escrow in exchange for the IRS's release of its lien.[19]

An insurer pleading a cause of action against a third party in the insurer's name should be careful to allege that the insured suffered a loss, and that the insurer made it whole. The policy should be attached as an exhibit to the complaint, and/or the subrogation clause quoted in the complaint, to prove the contractual basis for the right of subrogation.[20]

An insurer entitled to subrogation may not collect from a third party more than the amount of loss it has paid.[21] The insurer delivers any such excess recovery to its insured.

The policy does not require the insurer to purchase the insured's interest in the property at the insured's demand, which is properly termed salvage and not subrogation. As one court explained, "subrogation is an option to be exercised at [the insurer's] discretion."[22] If the insurer elects to purchase the insured's interest in the real estate, it obtains either full title or full subrogation rights. See §5.5 regarding the policy's subrogation provisions and §5.12 regarding the insurer's exercise of its salvage rights.

5.4 Suit In Insured's Name; Insured's Duty To Cooperate

The insurer stands in the insured's shoes in making claims against third parties to recover a loss paid to or on behalf of its insured. A formal assignment of the insured's rights is normally not necessary, because the policy states that subrogation works an automatic assignment of rights from the insured to the insurer. However, the insurer is entitled to an assignment of the insured's rights, and may enforce those rights against third parties as an assignee.[23] The insurer's claims against third parties as subrogee are not barred under the notion that the insurer is not in privity with that third party, as long as there was privity between the insured and that party.[24]

Some states have adopted the rule that the insurer should bring suit in the name of the insured.[25] In other states, an insurer may sue in either the insured's name or its own.[26] Still others require that the insurer sue in its own name if the insured has been made whole, or jointly with the insured if not.[27]

[23] Concrete Services, Inc. v. Kanany, 174 Wash.App. 1077, 2013 WL 2181521 (Wash.App. Div. 1) (unpublished) (insurer that took assignment of judgment was an assignee, and did not extinguish the debt as if it were paid in full as asserted by the debtor as a claimed bar to recovery). A court rejected the insurer's argument that rights taken by assignment are "legal" in nature rather than equitable, stripping the third party of its equitable defenses, in Bank of Fort Mill v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 268 F.2d 313 (4th Cir. 1959). A California court held that the "common interest" doctrine applies when the insurer has made an indemnity payment to the insured and is seeking recoupment as the insured's subrogee at the same time the insured is suing the insurer seeking a further payment. The court said the doctrine permitted the insured to see the communication between recoupment counsel and the insurer, despite the lack of an intentional waiver of attorney-client privilege. Feduniak v. Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 3921372 (N.D.Cal.) (unpublished).

[24] In Wolff v. Commercial Standard Ins. Co., 345 S.W.2d 565 (Tex.App. 1961), the insurer paid off liens for the insured, then took an assignment against the seller and sued on warranties. The seller objected that its warranties ran only to the insured. The court dismissed the argument: "Appellees [insurer], who were called upon by said grantees to discharge such liens, were compelled to do so in order to fulfill their contractual obligations under the title policies they had issued. They became subrogated to the rights of the grantees upon payment of the amounts necessary to secure releases of the liens. Having furnished the money for the benefit of their title policyholders and having secured releases of the encumbrances at the request of the grantees as they were required to do, appellees had the legal right to sue appellant in their own names, since under the subrogation provisions in the policies they became, in effect, assignees of the claims, or choose an action accruing to the grantees upon discharge of the liens." Id. at 568. In Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co. v. R&S Rose Creditor Group, 2017 WL 4683968 (D.Nev.) (unpublished), the court held that a title insurer was not in privity with its insured and was not barred by claim preclusion from making misrepresentation claims against a junior lender after the lender insured lost on similar claims. However, in Bank of New York Mellon v. Georg, 175 A.3d 720, 456 Md.App. 616 (Md.App. 2017), the court held that a title insurer that bought the insured lender's loan was not entitled to bring a second action to reform the mortgage because the insured had already brought such an action and the first court had denied reformation. The court held that the insurer and insured were in privity, making the earlier judgment binding on the insurer also.

O'Brien*, 41 P.2d 411 (1935) (same holding); McDonald v. Grassle, 740 P.2d 1122 (Mont. 1987) (insurer must sue in own name after making insured whole); Wolff v. Commercial

The ALTA Homeowner's Policy states that the insurer is subrogated to the insured's rights to the extent of a loss payment made. It goes further by identifying the order in which recoupment payments will be applied to reimburse the insured and insurer for their losses and expenses.

When the insurer takes title to the insured property, it should consider whether title is being transferred merely as an incident to its payment of the claim, or as a purchase in salvage. See §5.12 regarding salvage. The insurer should pursue a breach of warranty claim in the insured's shoes, not in its own right.[28] Therefore, if such a claim is contemplated, the settlement documents should clearly state that the insurer shall have the right by subrogation to pursue all of the insured's rights against the seller for breach of its warranties of title.[29]

An insurer should not attempt to do things "in the insured's shoes" which are beyond the purpose of the subrogation doctrine. For example, the insurer should not attempt to clear the insured's title in the insurer's name, on the notion that it is proceeding by right of subrogation. Such a suit should be brought in the name of the insured, not the insurer. Otherwise, the suit will be open to attack that the insurer does not have a sufficient interest in the property to permit it to bring suit.[30] See §3.4 regarding the insurer's right to clear title, generally.

The insured has a duty to assist the insurer in pursuing it rights of subrogation. If it loses or harms the insurer's ability to recoup, the insured may forfeit its own right to be paid under the policy. See §2.3.3 regarding prejudice.

5.5 Subrogation Rights Under Title Insurance Policies

The title insurance policies contain explicit subrogation rights.[31] The insurer becomes a subrogee on payment of a claim; however, insurers sometimes take specific assignments of subrogated rights from their insureds.[32] An insurer may proceed in the insured's name or its own.[33] In the insurer pursues rights in its own name, it should plead and attach the policy's subrogation provision to establish its conventional (contractual) subrogation rights.[34] See §5.6 regarding conventional or contractual subrogation versus equitable subrogation.

Standard Ins. Co., 345 S.W.2d 565 (Tex.App. 1961) (insurer had right to sue in own name on making insured whole, and after taking assignment of rights); Haueter v. Peguillan, 586 P.2d 403 (Utah 1978) (after insured is made whole, insurer is real party in interest in suit on warranties, and insured may not prosecute that suit).

[28] See American Title Ins. Co. v. M-H Enterprises, 815 P.2d 1219 (Okla. App. 1991) (denying rights as assignee).

[29] See Spalitta v. Silvey, 526 So. 2d 471 (La.App. 1988) (subrogation rights preserved although insured made a "cash sale" to the insurer for a settlement amount).

[30] For example, the insurer's contractual subrogation right did not give it the right to bring a quiet title action to clear an IRS lien. The court found that the insurer had no interest in the real estate, because it had not paid a claim of loss to the insured. Further, it found that there was not even a contingent liability yet, because no loss was payable yet. Therefore, the court dismissed the suit. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co. v. U.S., 759 F.Supp. 87 (D.Conn. 1991).

[31] For example, Conditions 13 of the 2006 ALTA Owner's policy says: "(a) Whenever the Company shall have settled and paid a claim under this policy, it shall be subrogated and entitled to the rights of the Insured Claimant in the Title and all other rights and remedies in respect to the claim that the Insured Claimant has against any person or property, to the extent of the amount of any loss, costs, attorneys' fees, and expenses paid by the Company. If requested by the Company, the Insured Claimant shall execute documents to evidence the transfer to the Company of these rights and remedies. The

Recoupment

The ALTA 1992 policy permits pro-rata subrogation when the insurer has made a payment to the insured that does not make the insured whole.[35] This policy provision alters the general rule that the insured must be made whole before any right of subrogation vests in the insurer. See §5.3 regarding making the insured whole. The 1992 policy provision states that the insurer and insured share pro rata in a recovery from a third party. The 2006 ALTA policies do not contain a pro-rata recovery provision, but rather state that "[i]f a payment on account of a claim does not fully cover the loss of the Insured Claimant, the Company shall defer the exercise of its right to recover until after the Insured Claimant shall have recovered its loss." This deferral provision is more in keeping with the made-whole doctrine, although some states' formulation of that doctrine may still preclude subrogation by an insurer that did not, by its payment, make the insured whole.

The policy also specifies some of the third parties against whom the insurer may seek recovery. This listing of third parties is partly informational. More importantly, perhaps, the policy makes it clear that the title insurer has rights in any "other insurance" available as to the same risk. Under earlier versions of the title insurance policy which were not as specific about "other insurance," title insurers sometimes were unequally matched in pursuing other insurance policies. Some other types of policies state that coverage under such policies is void or limited if an otherwise covered loss is paid by "other insurance." Some title agent errors and omissions policies include provisions of this type. The reference to "other insurance" in the 1992 and later policy forms clearly establishes that the other insurance provisions cancel each other out and make both insurers liable for the loss.[36]

Insured Claimant shall permit the Company to sue, compromise, or settle in the name of the Insured Claimant and to use the name of the Insured Claimant in any transaction or litigation involving these rights and remedies. If a payment on account of a claim does not fully cover the loss of the Insured Claimant, the Company shall defer the exercise of its right to recover until after the Insured Claimant shall have recovered its loss. (b) The Company's right of subrogation includes the rights of the Insured to indemnities, guaranties, other policies of insurance, or bonds, notwithstanding any terms or conditions contained in those instruments that address subrogation rights."

Slip Op. 02454 (N.Y.A.D. 3 Dept. 2007) (insurer subrogated to insured's rights reassigned rights to insured but insured later assigned rights to insurer, and insurer found entitled to proceed as subrogee of insured).

[33] Dennis v. Stanhope, 2008 WL 4560100 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished) (insurer that proceeded in insured's name entitled to collect from liable party for the full amount of its payment).

[34] See Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. Capp, 174 Ind.App. 633, 369 N.E.2d 672 (Ind.App. 1 Dist. 1977), in which the insurer's failure to attach the policy caused the court to rule that the insurer had not proven its contractual right to bring claims in its own name.

[35] Conditions & Stipulations 13(a) of the 1992 ALTA policy states: "If a payment on account of a claim does not fully cover the loss of the insured claimant, the Company shall be subrogated to these rights and remedies in the proportion which the Company's payment bears to the whole amount of the loss."

[36] An insurer may be paid by a malpractice carrier, then assign its rights to the carrier. In such a case, the carrier may pursue the insured's rights against others. Douberley v. Angelini, 240 So.2d 98 (Fla.App. 1970). In Borg v. Transamerica Ins. Co., 47 Cal.App.4th 448, 54 Cal.Rptr.2d 811 (1996), for example, the insurer on a homeowner's policy was found obligated to defend a suit for removal of encroachments by the insured's improvements onto the neighbor's property. As is pointed out in the letter of James N. Laichas, Esq., in the Guest Quarters of The Title Insurance Law Newsletter, Concomitantly, under the loan policy, a party which becomes an owner of the indebtedness because it was obligated to the insured by a bond, insurance policy, indemnity or guaranty does not become an insured. The only exception is for guarantors which are governmental agencies or instrumentalities (VA, FHA, SBA and HUD, principally).[37] Excluded from recovery, therefore, are private mortgage insurers, guarantors who purchase the debt, and sureties on construction loans.

Finally, the subrogation provision states that, if the insured voluntarily gives away its rights against others to recoup the loss, the insurer's duty to pay is either nullified or reduced by the amount of recovery lost. This type of provision has been enforced.[38]

The loan policy provides that the insurer may purchase the indebtedness from the lender.[39] If the insurer elects to purchase the debt, it is both an assignee of the loan and a subrogee; courts sometimes confuse the roles and limit the insurer's rights as a result.[40]

December, 1996, a title insurer should thus consider seeking contribution or recoupment from a homeowner's insurance carrier if a similar action is tendered to the title insurer for defense.

[37] Condition 12(c) of the 2006 ALTA Loan Policy states: "The Company's right of subrogation includes the Insured's rights against non-insured obligors including the rights of the Insured to indemnities, guaranties, other policies of insurance, or bonds, notwithstanding any terms or conditions contained in those instruments that address subrogation rights. The Company's right of subrogation shall not be avoided by acquisition of the Insured Mortgage by an obligor (except an obligor described in Section 1(e)(i)(F) of these Conditions) who acquires the Insured Mortgage as a result of an indemnity, guarantee, other policy of insurance, or bond, and the obligor will not be an Insured under this policy."

Tradesmen's Trust & Saving Fund Co.*, 52 A. 125 (Pa. 1902) (policy voided by second mortgagee-insured's conveyance of foreclosed property to first lender for no consideration); Worthey v. Sedillo Title Guar., Inc., 85 N.M. 339, 512 P.2d 667 (1973) (18-month delay in presenting claim prohibited insurer from catching fraud perpetrators, prejudicing subrogation rights and thus voiding coverage). However, the insurer was not harmed when the insured paid off real estate taxes without notice to the insurer and failed to get an assignment of rights to the insurer. The court found there was no subrogation right against the seller, because the real estate taxes were in rem only, with no personal liability of the owner. Atlanta Title & Trust Co. v. Allied Mortg. Co., 60 Ga.App. 114, 3 S.E.2d 127 (1939); aff'd 64 Ga.App. 38, 12 S.E.2d 147 (1940). See also other cases cited at §2.3.3 above regarding prejudice to insurer because of late notice.

[39] Condition 7(a)(ii) of the 2006 ALTA Loan Policy permits the insurer to " purchase the Indebtedness for the amount of the Indebtedness on the date of purchase, together with any costs, attorneys' fees, and expenses incurred by the Insured Claimant that were authorized by the Company up to the time of purchase and that the Company is obligated to pay. When the Company purchases the Indebtedness, the Insured shall transfer, assign, and convey to the Company the Indebtedness and the Insured Mortgage, together with any collateral security." The 2006 policy has an extensive definition of Indebtedness, a term not defined in earlier policies.

[40] In discussing this provision, one court said: "Upon exercising the option, Ticor becomes subrogated to the Bank's rights according to Paragraph 10. The language of the policy makes it clear that subrogation is an option to be exercised at Ticor's discretion." Falmouth National Bank v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 920 F. 2d 1058 (1st Cir. 1990). In LandAmerica Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co. v. Kolozetski, 159 N.H. 689, 992 A.2d 681 (2010), when a husband used a forged power of attorney to sign a mortgage for his wife on their homestead, the mortgage was valid as to the husband's half interest. The title insurer stepped into his shoes on payment of the loan and was entitled to half of the sale proceeds, over the wife's protests. Another opinion, however, missed the subtleties of the relationships created by subrogation, and held that an insurer was not subrogated when it took an assignment of the loan. In American Title Ins. Co. v. M-H Enterprises, 815 P. 2d 1219 (Okla. App. 1991), the insurer missed a mortgage. It paid off the insured lender and pursued the mortgagor on his warranties. The court refused to admit that the insurer was a subrogee, and held that the insurer was not an assignee of the mortgage and note. It said "American did not purchase the note and mortgage. The payment by

5.6 Contractual Versus Equitable Subrogation

Subrogation is equitable in nature. Subrogation is termed "conventional" when the source of the relationship between the subrogor and subrogee is contractual. In most cases, conventional subrogation involves insurance. Subrogation may also be used to permit one who has paid another's debt, for the benefit of an innocent party, to recover from the debtor. This is termed "equitable" subrogation. Equitable subrogation is imposed to prevent a windfall to the debtor.[41]

Conventional (contractual) subrogation rights must be proven. If the insurer fails to introduce the insurance contract into evidence, and establish that the conditions for contractual subrogation have been met, it will have to rely exclusively on equitable subrogation.[42] The analysis should be the same under either form of subrogation.[43] As explained in Universal Title Ins. Co. v. U.S.,[44]

> While subrogation is generally defined as Athe substitution of one person in the place of another with reference to a lawful claim or right, 73 Am.Jur.2d Subrogation § 1 (1974), there are actually two distinct types of subrogation, "conventional subrogation" and "legal subrogation," which is often confusingly called "equitable subrogation," due to its origin and basis in equity. Conventional subrogation "occurs where one having no interest or any relation to the matter pays the debt of another, and by agreement is entitled to the rights and securities of the creditor so paid." Id. § 9. Legal subrogation, however, "has for its purpose the working out of an equitable adjustment and the doing of complete and perfect justice between the parties by American to Brookwood merely satisfied its obligation under its title policy. American's rights against Appellants are non-existent." 815 P.2d at 1222.

[41] See §3.4.7.3 regarding the use of equitable subrogation to assert that the insured lender or purchaser has stepped into the shoes of a lender whose lien has been paid off by the insured's funds.

[42] The insurer's separate right of equitable subrogation was recognized in Title Ins. Co. of Minnesota v. Costain, Inc., 164 Ariz. 203, 791 P. 2d 1086 (Ariz. App. 1990): "Moreover, an insurer may be entitled to subrogation under proper circumstances, not only when its contract with its insured so provides, but also through the equitable doctrine of subrogation, even in the absence of express provision. See Mosher v. Conway, 45 Ariz. 463, 468, 46 P.2d 110, 112 (1935), cert. denied, 305 U.S. 599, 59 S.Ct. 77, 83 L.Ed. 380 (1938)."

[43] Transamerica Title Ins. Co. v. Johnson, 103 Wash.2d 409 693 P.2d 697 (1985) stated: "Defendant also argues that the trial court erred in refusing to consider equitable defenses to this contractual subrogation claim. Some courts distinguish between legal and conventional or contractual subrogation. With conventional subrogation, subrogation given by agreement or stipulation, those courts measure the parties' rights by the agreement and find that equity has no power to change or unsettle such rights. Mid-Continent Cas. Co. v. First Nat'l Bank & Trust Co., 531 P.2d 1370 (Okla.1975); 16 G. Couch, Insurance SS 61:2 (2d ed. 1983). We, however, follow those courts which hold that 'the better rule is that regardless of the source of the right of subrogation, the right will only be enforced in favor of a meritorious claim and after a balancing of the equities.' Castleman Constr. Co. v. Pennington, 222 Tenn. 82, 97, 432 S.W.2d 669 (1968). We hold that whether arising by operation of law or under contract, subrogation is an equitable remedy subject to equitable defenses."

> securing the ultimate discharge of a debt by the person who in equity and good conscience ought to pay it." Id. § 3 (footnotes omitted). Unlike conventional subrogation, legal subrogation does not depend on contract, assignment, or privity. Id. In either case, however, the right to subrogation is predicated on the full payment of the debt or claim of another by one who is not a mere volunteer or intermeddler. ... Although legal subrogation is a highly favored doctrine, it is not an absolute right, but rather, one that depends on the equities and attending facts and circumstances of each case.[45]

For clarity's sake, this treatise uses the phrase "equitable subrogation" in place of "legal subrogation."

The insurer's failure to prove conventional subrogation rights can be fatal to its claims.[46] For example, in Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. Capp,[47] the insurer did not prove up its policy subrogation rights:

> Lawyers' asserted right of subrogation must originate from either the policy of insurance, or from the operation of the equitable doctrine of subrogation (substitution). Lawyers has failed to include the policy of insurance in the record, and we may therefore look only to the equitable basis of their asserted subrogation, as we are unable to construe documents which are not before us.[48]

The insurer was denied equitable subrogation because the court elected to focus on the insurer's passive error rather than the seller's unjust enrichment. The court found that the insurer's own negligence in accepting a faulty survey for the legal description caused it to assume the risk, and become the ultimate bearer of loss. Capp was cited and expanded in First Federal Savings Bank of Wabash v. United States,[49] which held that an insured-mortgagee was not entitled to equitable subrogation as to a mortgage debt it paid off. The court refused to allow equitable subrogation

[45] 942 F.2d at 1315 (footnotes omitted). A more succinct statement of the doctrine is found in Lange v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 741 P.2d 109 (Wyo. 1987): "Legal subrogation is an equitable doctrine and will be used only to further an equitable result. ... 'Moreover, the equity of the party seeking subrogation must be strong and his rights clear.' 73 Am.Jur.2d, Subrogation § 14 at 608 (1974)."

[46] Courts sometimes seem exasperated by an insurer attempting to be reimbursed by the party who caused the loss. One court expressed the view that "it is the general view that a paid surety has fewer equities than an innocent bank, since the surety company is paid to assume the specific risk. [citations omitted]" Bank of Fort Mill v. Lawyers Title Insurance Corp., 268 F.2d 313 (4th Cir. 1959). because "Indiana courts have been more reluctant to invoke the doctrine [of legal subrogation] in cases where to do so would benefit a negligent title insurer."[50] However, a later Indiana decision, Kelly v. National Attorneys Title Assurance Fund,[51] held that a seller was obligated to reimburse the title insurer for federal tax liens not excepted in his warranty deed.

Most states do not prevent subrogation based on a defense of title search negligence. For example, California holds that an insured's status as a bona fide purchaser for value is not forfeited simply because the title insurer is "behind" the lawsuit to cure title. In Cooper v. Cano,[52] insureds named Cooper brought suit to quiet title as to their seller, Larry, and his ex-wife, Susan. At issue was the legal effect of a quit claim deed Susan had given. Susan argued that the Coopers could not claim the presumption that the deed was a full conveyance because they were not bona fide purchasers. The sole basis for this argument was that the insurer was paying for the lawsuit. The court disagreed:

> Just because the Coopers' title insurer may be behind their lawsuit is no reason to reject the basic legal rules in favor of an equity of subjective intent. Subrogation is not a license to disregard the most basic rules on which stable property titles depend. And it is meaningless that the statement of tentative decision said the Coopers had "no notice" while the actual statement of decision said they had "constructive notice" of Susan's deed of trust; the fact remains that an ordinary person searching title would think that the deed of trust had been released in light of the actual language used in the quitclaim deed. Likewise any negligence on the part of a title insurer really is irrelevant in this case, because the quitclaim deed is the dispositive fact.[53]

In Castleman Construction Co. v. Pennington,[54] the insurer was permitted to recover from the seller despite its error in omitting a deed of trust and an adverse title claim. The court quoted 83 C.J.S. Subrogation § 6, which says:

> Negligence of the subrogee must be more than ordinary negligence, however, in order to bar application of the principle of subrogation, and relief may be allowed notwithstanding the suitor's mistakes and ignorance... .[55]

It concluded that the insurer's negligence in not detecting the title defects did not prevent it from recovering from the seller on warranties:

> We do not say that ordinary negligence of the subrogee may not be taken into consideration in ascertaining whether he be entitled to the equitable relief of subrogation. What we do say is that ordinary negligence alone will not be held to be a complete bar to subrogation where in spite of such negligence the equities are still in favor of the subrogee.[56]

Thus, since the seller would have netted a windfall had the insurer borne the ultimate loss, the insurer was permitted to recoup against the seller. Further, there was no evidence that the insurer's mistake changed the seller's position or enticed her to give the warranties.

An insurer may pursue an equitable subrogation claim against a bankruptcy debtor. This right does not depend on any specific authorization from within the Bankruptcy Code, although certain subrogation rights are codified in Section 509:

> The concept of equitable subrogation is a well recognized principle of equity jurisprudence. ... Equitable subrogation is a creation of equity, not statute and should not be confused with the subrogation rights specifically set forth in section 509.[57]

Thus, an insurer was permitted subrogation against the mortgagor, under the terms of the note and mortgage, for its attorney fees incurred in defending an insured mortgage.

A second equitable theory of recovery is unjust enrichment. An insurer may pursue a party as having been unjustly enriched by the insurer's payment to an insured. However, the insurer must establish all of the elements of unjust enrichment: that the insurer conferred a benefit on the defendant, that the defendant accepted the benefit and that, under the circumstances, it would be inequitable for the defendant to keep the benefit without paying for it.[58] In Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. Farmers Ins. Co.,[59] an insurer paid a lender insured the full amount due on the note in satisfaction of a claim. Later, it discovered that the value of the property at the time payment was made was significantly less than the amount of the debt. It sought the difference between the value and the amount paid in an action based on unjust enrichment. The court disagreed, however, finding no unjust enrichment since the lender was paid no more than it was owed on the note, and the insurer paid it willingly to avoid potential liability in litigation pending at the time the payment was made. In Castania v. Ticor Title Ins. Co. of California,[60] by contrast, Ticor as escrowee paid the seller too much at closing because of a math error on the seller's mortgage payoff. In the transaction, the seller took back a mortgage, which was insured by Ticor. The insurer made up the difference in the seller's loan payoff, then sought to collect from the seller on a theory of subrogation. The court rejected the insurer's demand, citing the rule that:

Weekly D1732 (Fla.App. 3 Dist. 2011), the appeals court reversed a judgment in favor of a title insurer based on unjust enrichment, against a woman who perpetrated significant loan fraud, because the court found no evidence that the insurer had yet paid losses to its insureds as a result of the fraud.

> [s]ubrogation does not arise ... in favor of the insurer against its insured since by definition subrogation arises only with respect to the rights of the insured against third persons to whom the insurer owes no duty.[61]

The quoted rule is merely an enunciation of the verity that, in subrogation, the insurer stands in the insured's shoes to recover from others. The court did not explain why the mere fortuity of Ticor's issuance of a loan policy to the sellers should cut off its right to reimbursement for a claim under the separate owner's policy issued to the purchasers. In any event, the insurer should have been able to avoid the result by seeking recovery as unjust enrichment, since the sellers did not dispute that the money paid by the insurer was their personal debt.

5.7 Classes Of Parties Against Whom Insurer May Claim

The insurer who has made the insured whole obtains to all of the insured's rights against third parties who are obligated to the insured for the same loss.[62] The most common source of recoupment is against the seller based on deed covenants. See §5.9 regarding recoupment against sellers, including the different causes of action which may exist, and the defenses to such actions. Recovery is by no means limited to rights against the seller, however. Reported decisions involve claims against the following classes of third parties:

- Abstractors and agents.[63]

[65] The insurer was successful in pursuing the bank for paying on a bad endorsement in Kansas City Title & Trust Co. v. Fourth Nat'l Bank, 135 Kan. 414, 10 P.2d 896 (Kan. 1932). However, when the insurer sues, courts sometimes are unwilling to find a bank's payment over a forged endorsement to cause the bank to suffer the ultimate loss. Thus, the insurer must be very "clean" to pursue a claim against the payor bank. In Bank of Fort Mill v. Lawyers Title Insurance Corp., 268 F.2d 313 (4th Cir. 1959), the insurer was denied recovery against the bank which accepted a forged endorsement on a fraudulently-obtained loan proceeds check. The court decided that the ultimate loss should remain with the insurer, because the schemer was the insurer's agent, while the bank did not participate in the scheme. Similarly, in New York Title & Mortgage Co. v. First Nat'l Bank, 51 F.2d 485, 77 A.L.R. 1052 (8th Cir. (Mo.) 1931), the court denied recovery because it found the schemer to have been the insurer's agent, and the insurer could have detected various forgeries, while the bank was not negligent even though it accepted the forged endorsements. In Saturn & Mazer Title Services, Inc. v. AmSouth Bank, 2008 WL 151982 (Tenn.App.) (unpublished), a title agent was found entitled to recover from its bank for paying on forged endorsements of escrow checks, done by an embezzling closer, but its recovery was limited because the major loss was paid by the underwriter, not the agent, and because the money stolen did not belong to the agent but its customers.

However, in Missouri Abstract & Guaranty Co., State ex rel. v. Globe Indemnity Co., 222 Mo.App. 918, 9 S.W.2d 668 (1928), an insurer paid off the loss due to a forged mortgage and then sued the notary. It was denied recovery, because payment on the forged check endorsement was the true cause of the problem. "The Westport Avenue Bank had no right to charge these checks to the account of Gaston. A bank has no right to charge to the account of its depositor money paid on forged indorsements." Further, the court insisted that there was no loss, because the check had not really been paid. Rather, "the money of Gaston is still in the Westport Avenue Bank." Missouri Abstract illustrates the importance of naming every alternate source of recovery in one action.

An insurer sued its bank for submitting a loan funding check for payment which had no endorsement. As a result, by the time the insurer's endorsement was added, the lender's account had been depleted by an IRS levy. The insurer argued that its bank should have supplied the missing endorsement or returned the check posthaste. The court found that the loss more properly fell on the insurer, which had failed to endorse in the first place. Charter Title Corp. v. Crown Mortgage Corp., 836 P.2d 846 (Wash.App. Div. 2 1992). See also Title Ins. Co. v. Comerica Bank--California, 32 Cal.Rptr.2d 735, 27 Cal.App.4th 800 (1994) (suit against bank for not preventing endorsement by impostor).

In Simmons v. Lennon, 139 Md.App. 15, 773 A.2d 1064 (Md.App. 2001), the court distinguished between a forged endorsement and a forged drawer's signature. The court noted that the UCC authorizes suit only for forged indorsements, in which case the loss is passed back from the drawee bank to the bank that first accepted and failed to detect the forgery. Conversely, the drawer bank is stuck with the loss caused by a forged drawer's signature. In Simmons, an employee forged an escrow check to buy a car. The time period for suit against the drawer bank had passed, so the account holder sued the person to whom the check was issued, for conversion and negligent failure to detect the forgery. The court found that conversion would be limited to recovery of the check, not the proceeds, and that the payee was not responsible for detecting the forgery and defalcation.

Several decisions denied title insurers recovery against banks for failing to return escrow checks within the time limits set by state "midnight deadline" statutes. In each case, the court found that the title insurer was not a party entitled to seek recovery under the "midnight deadline" statute. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. United American Bank of Memphis, 21 F.Supp.2d 785 (W.D.Tenn. 1998); American Title Ins. Co. v. Burke & Herbert Bank & Trust Co., 813 F.Supp. 423 (E.D.Va. 1993). In Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. Howard Savings Bank, 436 F.3d 836 (7th Cir. 2006), the court found an action against the bank barred because it was not brought within the statutory one-year period after discovery.

In Mellon Bank, N.A. v. National Union Ins. Co. of Pittsburgh, PA, 768 A.2d 865 (Pa.Super. 2001), the contest was between the bank that paid over the bad endorsement and the theft insurer for the company that issued the check. The bank argued that the loss should fall on the insurer because the bank was also a victim, while the insurer had been paid a premium to take this risk. This is the "compensated surety" or "superior equities" doctrine. The appeals court found that the analysis was not that simple, however. The trial court was instructed to examine whether or not the bank's actions caused or contributed to the loss, and then balance the overall equities between the bank and insurer. The court gave numerous useful citations to similar cases in other states.

In Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. Dearborn Title Corp., 993 F.Supp. 1159 (N.D.Ill. 1998), later decision 22 F.Supp.2d 820 (N.D.Ill. 1998), a title insurer sought an order requiring a bank to disgorge about half a million dollars paid by a title agent for what were allegedly phony closing services. The bank claimed that the fee of $200 per closing was valid payment for use of its building for the closings. The court found that the payment was an illegal inducement to steer title work. The payment came to light because Dearborn Title stole money from its escrow account, and the insurer funded the account because it had issued closing protection letters. The insurer then sought recovery from the bank at which the escrow account was located, under the Illinois Fiduciary Obligations Act, 760 I.L.C.S. 65/1, et seq. In the decision found at 993 F.Supp. 1159 (N.D.Ill. 1998), the court denied the bank summary judgment and remanded to the trial court. In Dearborn Title, the insurer also sued the bank under RESPA. It claimed that the excessive closing fees paid were kickbacks under that Act, and that the insurer was harmed when it funded the shortfall in that escrow account from which the kickback check was written. The court found that the insurer had a cause of action under RESPA, but the claim was barred by the applicable one-year statute of limitations. 22 F.Supp.2d 820 (N.D.Ill. 1998). Finally, the insurer claimed that the kickback check was a fraudulent transfer. Because the check "did not discharge any debt" legally owed, Dearborn received no consideration for it. The check either was written when Dearborn was already insolvent, or made it so, satisfying the second requirement for a fraudulent conveyance action. Therefore, the insurer was allowed to pursue that cause of action against the bank.

The Virginia Supreme Court held that a title agency was barred from suing its bank for paying on counterfeit checks because the title company did not give notice within 60 days, per its contract with the bank. UCC provides a one-year notice period. The court held that it was not "manifestly unreasonable" for the bank to shrink the statutory time period by contract. National Title Ins. Corp. Agency v. First Union Nat'l Bank, 559 S.E.2d 668 (Va. 2002). However, a New Jersey court said that a bank agreement shrinking the one-year statute of limitations to 60 days was too short, and thus unenforceable, in In re Clear Advantage Title, Inc., 438 B.R. 58 (Bkcy.D.N.J. 2010). That court also found that an account agreement that said that only certain people were authorized check signers created a heightened duty by the bank to detect checks used by a closer to steal money, but the court warned that the title agent had a corresponding duty to promptly review the bank statements and detect unauthorized disbursements.

[66] In New Jersey Title Ins. Co. v. Caputo, 163 N.J. 143, 748 A.2d 507 (N.J. 2000), the state supreme court reversed an appellate decision [318 N.J.Super. 311, 723 A.2d 994 (N.J.Super.A.D. 1999)], that had found a bank not liable to an underwriter for allowing a title agent to obtain a series of certified checks payable to himself drawn on his escrow account. The agent gambled the money away, and he repeatedly discussed his gambling with the tellers and branch manager. The Supreme Court found that the underwriter deserved a trial on the merits, because such conduct by the bank might rise to the level of "bad faith." The court said: "We hold that bad faith denotes a reckless disregard or purposeful obliviousness of the known facts suggesting impropriety by the fiduciary. It is not established by negligent or careless conduct or by vague suspicion. Likewise, actual knowledge of and complicity in the fiduciary's misdeeds is not required. However, where facts suggesting fiduciary misconduct are compelling and obvious, it is bad faith to remain passive and not inquire further because such inaction amounts to a deliberate desire to evade knowledge." An Ohio bank, on the other hand, was found not liable for permitting the holder of an escrow account to divert funds for personal reasons, because its knowledge did not rise to the level of bad faith conduct. Nations Title Ins. of New York, Inc. v. Bertram, 2000 WL 739262 (Ohio App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished). An appeal to the Supreme Court drew amicus briefs from both the Ohio Land Title Association and the Community Bankers Association. The high court accepted the appeal, then reconsidered and denied refused to accept the appeal, stating only that the appeal was dismissed as "having been improvidently allowed." 91 Ohio St.3d 1246, 745 N.E.2d 432 (2001). In Go-Best Assets Limited v. Citizens Bank of Massachusetts, 79 Mass.App.Ct. 473, 947 N.E.2d 581 (Mass.App. 2011), despite the bank's plea that such a ruling would "change the landscape of the banking industry and is plainly unworkable as a matter of public policy," a Massachusetts court held that a bank may be liable to a victim for allowing withdrawals from an attorney trust account that was chronically negative. The court cited a New York case for the principle that "[i]nsufficiency of funds in a trust account is a reliable signal that funds in that account are at risk of misappropriation, 'revealing as it does a telling disparity between entrusted funds and fiduciary expenditures which, in turn, may be, and often is, indicative of trust withdrawals for nontrust purposes.'" Home Sav. of Am., FSB v. Amoros, 233 A.D.2d 35, 41, 661 N.Y.S.2d 635 (N.Y. 1997). In Norwest Mortgage, Inc. v. Dime Savings Bank of New York, 280 A.D.2d 653, 721 N.Y.S.2d 94, 2001 N.Y. Slip Op. 01673 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept. 2001), a suit by a mortgage lender against a bank for allowing a closer to steal from his escrow account was dismissed because the defrauded lender did not allege a pattern indicating foul play. The court said that, in New York, "The general rule is that a depositary bank has no duty to monitor fiduciary accounts maintained at its branches in order to safeguard funds in those accounts from fiduciary misappropriation. ... Liability may be imposed if a depositary bank has actual knowledge or notice that a diversion will occur or is ongoing. Facts sufficient to cause a reasonably prudent person to suspect that trust funds are being misappropriated will trigger a duty of inquiry on the part of a depositary bank, and the bank's failure to conduct a reasonable inquiry when the obligation arises will result in the bank being charged with such knowledge as inquiry would have disclosed. … Such facts include a chronic insufficiency of funds, or payment of the fiduciary's personal obligations to the depositary bank from the escrow account… . Small overdrafts are generally insufficient to trigger a duty of inquiry." In First American Title Ins. Co. v. Eddings, 2014 WL 106691 (M.D.Ga. 2014) (unpublished), subsequent decision, 2014 WL 869553 (M.D.Ga. 2014) (unpublished), the court held that a title agent that stole closing money from his lawyer trust account was liable to the insurer for the losses caused by the theft, as was his wife, and that the bank that handled the escrow account might also be liable, because it discovered that the agent was covering his negative balances with false documents. In Chang v. JPMorgan Chase Bank, N.A., 841 F.3d 914 (11th Cir. (Fla.) 2016), the Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals allowed a lawsuit to proceed against a bank in which the principal to an escrow asserted that a bank officer knowingly allowed the escrowee customer to steal from an account titled as an "escrow account." Although Florida generally says that a bank owes no duty to a non-customer, it has adopted the limited exception to that rule that the bank may be liable when its customer owes a fiduciary duty to the non-customer, the bank knows or ought to know of the fiduciary relationship, and the bank knows that the customer has stolen money belonging to the non-customer. This rule was adopted in Atlanta & St. A.B. Ry. Co. v. Barnes, 95 F.2d 273, 276 (5th Cir. 1938). In Florida, an escrowee owes a fiduciary duty to the principals to an escrow. Watkins v. NCNB Nat'l Bank of Fla., N.A., 622 So.2d 1063 (Fla.App. 1993).

[67] In Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. Allfirst Bank, 394 Md. 270, 905 A.2d 366 (Md. 2006), when a borrower hand-delivered a mortgage loan payoff check to his bank but directed the bank to deposit the money into his personal account rather than to pay off the loan, the bank accepting the check was found liable to the title company's bank. See §13.5.1 regarding loan payoff disputes generally. In Dillon v. Southern Management Corp. Retirement Trust, 2014 UT 14, 326 P.3d 656 (Utah 2014), the Utah Supreme Court held, in a case of first impression, that an insured owner that prevailed against a lender for slander of title due to the lender's refusal to honor a partial release agreement was also entitled to be paid its attorneys' fees. The court rejected the lender's claim that the owner should not recover because its title insurer paid the legal bill.

[68] In Choice Escrow and Land Title, LLC v. BancorpSouth Bank, 2013 WL 1121339 (W.D.Mo.) (unpublished), a hacker planted a Trojan horse that captured a title company's escrow account and wire transfer password, and used that information to initiate a wire to Cypress. The title company and not the bank bore the loss, because the title agent had declined a safer wire transfer option offered by the bank. In an earlier decision, the court noted that the UCC allows the bank to escape liability if its security procedure is commercially reasonable or the bank authorized the wire according to written procedures, citing Section 202(b) of the UCC. A bank was found liable for failing to promptly notify the title insurer that its customer's wire had arrived, in Moody Nat'l Bank v. Texas City Devel. Ltd., Co., 46 S.W.3d 373 (Tex.App.-Hous. 1 Dist. 2001). The bank did not call the title insurer on the wire's arrival, and failed to locate the wire on numerous inquiries from the title company and its customer. The appellate court found that section 404(b) of the UCC sets a standard for notice of wire transfers ("payment orders"). That section says: "If a payment order accepted by the beneficiary's bank instructs payment to an account of the beneficiary, the bank is obliged to notify the beneficiary of receipt of the order before midnight of the next funds transfer business day following the payment date." The court found that "[m]isinforming the parties was tantamount to failing to send proper notice," making the bank liable to the customer. However, the court threw out a jury award for lost profit. Section 404 says that the exclusive penalty for failure to give notice is payment of interest from the day the notice should have been given to the day the customer learns of its receipt by the bank. In Belle Meade Title & Escrow Corp. v. Fifth Third Bank, 282 F.Supp.3d 1033 (M.D.Tenn. 2017), the bank to whom a title agent wired money, based on a phony check, was not liable to the title company for the fraud. The title agent told its own bank not to send the wire out from its account until the deposited check had cleared, which instruction that bank violated. The receiving bank, however, had no duty to the title agent, which was not its customer.

[69] In National Title Agency LLC v. JPMorgan Chase Bank, NA, 429 P.3d 758, 2018 UT App 145 (Utah App. 2018), a creditor of a title agency successfully garnished the title agent's escrow account. The court found the bank not liable to either the title agency or its customers for having handed over $600,000 of trust account money to the creditor without approval from the title agency.

[70] In California Land Title Co. v. Emslie, 175 Cal.App.3d 1001, 221 Cal.Rptr. 332 (Cal.App. 4 Dist. 1986), a real estate broker fraudulently obtained a loan on her clients' property. The insurer paid, and sued the broker and others. The reported decision involves only the subrogation claim against the property owners.

Craven*, 2013 WL 3778388 (E.D.Pa.) (unpublished) (title insurer may sue borrower and complicit title company closer for fraud for losses caused by failure to record mortgages and except them on policies, but RICO claim dismissed). In In re Pazdzierz, 718 F.3d 582 (6th Cir. (Mich.) 2013), a title insurer that took an assignment of a loan to resolve a policy claim was permitted to stand in the lender's shoes to sue the borrower for fraud, and the debt was found nondischargeable in bankruptcy. In Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. 2485 Calle Del Oro, LLC, 2018 WL 3222610 (S.D.Cal. 2018) (unpublished), the court granted judgment to the insurer on a note and loan guaranty that were assigned to the insurer by the insured after payment of the claim. In Uddin v. Cunningham, 2019 WL 4065273 (Tex.App.-Houston) (unpublished), the title insurer was entitled to recover from a loan guarantor despite numerous defenses raised by the guarantor, including that the insurer had no standing to sue him on the guaranty before it paid the lender's claim. In Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co. v. Prado, 176 A.D.3d 1164, 111 N.Y.S.3d 619, 2019 N.Y. Slip Op. 07766 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept. 2019), after the insured mortgage was declared void because the borrower had violated the law by transferring the property from a non-profit organization to himself, the insurer took an assignment of the loan and was entitled to enforce the debt against the borrower.

Courts sometimes mix contractual subrogation with equitable remedies to permit the insurer to collect from the borrower or to impose a lien on real estate. In Tower City Title Agency, LLC v. Flaisman, 2001 WL 409528 (Ohio App. 11 Dist.) (unpublished), an Ohio court used equitable subrogation to order borrowers to pay back a title agency for a shortage on a loan payoff. It rejected the borrowers' argument that the agency's mistake barred recovery. The court noted that the twin purposes of equitable subrogation are "the prevention of frauds and relief against mistakes… ." Noting that the borrowers had, "in effect, received a $1,000 interest-free loan from" the title agent, the court found that both equitable subrogation and unjust enrichment applied. The court rejected the Flaismans' argument that Tower City's negligence should keep it from being repaid. "In the instant case, there is no innocent third party, which would be harmed by the application of equitable subrogation. The [lender] has received all the monies it is due. [The Flaismans] have received an extra $1,000 to which they were not contractually entitled, and [Tower City] is $1,000 short." Similarly, in Fidelity National Title Ins. Co. v. Harlow, Adams & Friedman, P.C., 2016 WL 4507356 (Conn.Super.) (unpublished), a title insurer that paid part of a loan debt in order to secure a lien release to protect its lender insured was found entitled to a judgment against the borrower based on unjust enrichment and equitable subrogation. In Allen v. Union Fed. Mortgage Corp., 204 F.Supp.2d 543 (E.D.N.Y. 2002), app.dism. 71 Fed.Appx. 82, 2003 WL 21728999 (2nd Cir.(N.Y.) 2003), a title insurer that bought a loan because the mortgage was not recordable was entitled to enforce an equitable lien against the borrowers, despite their attempt to use the defect to their advantage and their claim that they were "duped" into borrowing the money. Similarly, in In re Klinger, 2008 WL 740310 (D.Conn.) (unpublished), when a title insurer bought the mortgage note from its insured lender to resolve a bankruptcy trustee's claim that the lien was void because the mortgage had not been recorded, the borrower had no right to object to the insurer's claim in the estate simply because it had not taken a judgment against him. In Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. Vontell, 2019 WL 4513087 (Conn.Super.) (unpublished); companion decision 2019 WL 4514237 (Conn. Super.) (unpublished), when the wrong loan was paid off at a refinance closing, and the title insurer had to pay the right lender for a subordination to protect its insured lender, the court rejected all of the borrowers' equitable defenses to the insurer's claims against them for reimbursement.

The title insurer is permitted to collect from the borrower all sums that the lender could collect under the terms of the note, which may include more than principal and interest. In Brant v. Hargrove, 129 Ariz. 475, 632 P.2d 978 (App. 1981), when a title insurer paid for the attorney who conducted the foreclosure and defended against the claimed defect in title, the attorney's fees were found properly added to the amount of the foreclosure judgment. The court rejected the owner's argument that he should not have to pay those fees, since the lender had been reimbursed for them by the insurer. The identical ruling was made in The Business Bank v. Hanson, 2011 WL 1546406 (Minn.App.) (unpublished).

- Currency and coin sellers or providers whose coins are bought by fraudsters in order to avoid a paper trail for the use of the stolen proceeds.[72]

- Errors and omissions carriers for title insurance agents.[73]

Borrowers raise various defenses to the insurer's pursuit under the note as subrogee. In Transnation Title Ins. Co. v. Livingston, 2004 WL 203075 (Mich.App.) (unpublished), the court rejected the borrower's claim that the insurer that purchased a second mortgage debt to protect its insured lender was not a holder in due course entitled to enforce the debt. An insurer's recovery for breach of mortgage warranties was denied in American Title Ins. Co. v. M-H Enterprises, 815 P. 2d 1219 (Okla.App. 1991) because the insurer was found to have violated an Oklahoma statute requiring that "no policy of title insurance shall be issued in the State of Oklahoma except after examination of a duly-certified abstract of title prepared by a bonded and licensed abstractor as defined herein." 36 O.S.1981 § 5001(C). As Professor Palomar points out, however, the M-H borrower may have had actual knowledge, since the decision "did not mention whether the mortgagor knew of the prior first mortgage or the foreclosure action." Palomar, Title Insurance Law, §8.05, p. 8-39. Thus, the mortgagor was not required to show any reliance on the title commitment or policy, making the error negligence per se. A North Carolina decision imposed conditions on the title insurer's pursuit of a borrower on the note after it was purchased by the insurer. In Investors Title Ins. Co. v. Montague, 142 N.C.App. 696, 543 S.E.2d 527 (N.C.App. 2001), the borrower sold the property to a buyer who assumed a loan secured by a deed of trust. The insurer missed the deed of trust, bought a loan and sued the original borrower on the note. The court invented the rule that the borrower, Montague, was entitled to buy the loan and enforce the deed of trust rather than merely pay off the debt. The court said "[i]f [Montague] is called on to pay the Note, however, she is entitled to all the rights and privileges contained in the Deed [of trust], including the right to foreclose on the property named in the Deed." The court understood the dilemma that it had thus created for the title insurer, noting that "[i]t does appear, however, it would be unlikely for [Investors] to assign the Deed to [Montague], as this would result in the foreclosure of the property which it insured." In In re Leone, 2015 WL 4939868 (Bkcy.M.D.Pa.) (unpublished), recons.den. 2015 WL 6598423 (Oct. 29, 2015) (unpublished), an insurer's bankruptcy claim against borrowers for their equity loan advances the insurer had paid was barred because the insurer did not sue within the limitations period. In Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. Worthington, 344 P.3d 156, 779 Utah Adv.Rep. 177, 2015 UT App 19 (Utah App. 2015), the court dismissed a title insurer's claims against a borrower-purchaser for fraud and misrepresentation based on the borrower's failure to inform the insurer that it faced a significant mechanic lien risk on the half-built house, because the owner was not asked to sign an affidavit or make a representation to the insurer at the loan closing. In First American Title Ins. Co. v. Branyan, 2016 WL 634103 (Cal.App. 4 Dist. 2016) (unpublished), the court held that a title insurer that bought the insured lender's loan was entitled to recover from the borrower on the note, and rejected the borrower's claim that Arizona's anti-deficiency statute should block recovery. In Bank of New York Mellon v. Georg, 175 A.3d 720, 456 Md.App. 616 (Md.App. 2017), the court held that a title insurer that bought the insured lender's loan was not entitled to bring a second action against the borrower to reform the mortgage because the insured had already brought such an action and the first court had denied reformation. The court emphasized that the insurer and insured were in privity with each other, which the court said made the earlier judgment binding on the insurer also.

[72] Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. JM Bullion, Inc., 2019 WL 2004303 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished) (when people borrowed against property they did not own and then bought gold coins with the money, title insurer that paid claim was not entitled to recover its loss from the gold coin dealers, because insurer had not proven that dealer had sufficient knowledge of fraud, despite expert testimony that real estate fraudsters use gold coins to avoid leaving a paper trail).

[73] See §17.10 for a complete discussion of claims under errors and omissions policies. Representative cases include: Safeco Title Ins. Co. v. Gannon, 774 P.2d 30 (Wash.App. 1989); First American Title Ins. Co. v. Nat'l Union Fire Ins. Co. of Pittsburgh, Pa., 695 So.2d 475 (Fla.App. 1997). In National Union Fire, the carrier denied liability when the claim was presented, but the insurer told the agency to notify it if suit were brought. The agent did not give notice of the suit until it was resolved, which was found to violate the cooperation clause of the E&O policy, voiding coverage.

[74] In Ticor Title Ins. Co. v. Mundelius, 887 S.W.2d 726 (Mo.App.E.D. 1994), the insurer made a mistake on the closing statement and the buyer paid too little. The court granted judgment by subrogation, on the grounds of unjust enrichment. It cited the Restatement of Restitution § 9 (1937) in its conclusion: "'The right to restitution for unjust enrichment presupposes: (1) that the defendant was enriched by the receipt of a benefit; (2) that the enrichment was at the expense of the plaintiff; (3) that it would be unjust to allow the defendant to retain the benefit.' ... Here, there is no question the defendant paid $2,000 less than he should have paid for the real estate due to an error Ticor made in the settlement statement. ... He therefore received a $2,000 benefit for which he did not pay. This enrichment came at Ticor's expense. To allow him to retain this benefit without full payment would be unjust." The court rejected the notions that the insurer's payment of the shortage was either a compromise settlement or as a volunteer. It concluded that parties to the escrow have duties to the escrowee to reimburse for their proper expenses: "In this case, Ticor's relationship with the defendant gave Ticor reason to believe it would be reimbursed. Ticor was acting in its capacity as defendant's escrow agent for the real estate purchase, and as such, had reason to believe that defendant would reimburse it for costs associated with the purchase. Therefore, Ticor should be allowed to recover the $2,000 shortage from defendant." In White Family Companies, Inc. v. Dayton Title Agency, Inc., 468 B.R. 258 (S.D. Ohio 2012), a title agency's bankruptcy trustee was not permitted to avoid and recapture money paid by a title company from its escrow account, although the $5 million check funding that transaction bounced. Relying on Stevenson v. J.C. Bradford & Co. (In re Cannon), 277 F.3d 838 (6th Cir. 2002) and Begier v. IRS, 496 U.S. 53, 110 S.Ct. 2258, 110 L.Ed.2d 46 (1990), the court held that escrow money is held in an express trust for other people's benefit and is not property of the estate of the title company escrowee. Therefore, the money was beyond Dayton Title's trustee's avoidance powers.

See Chapter 13 for discussion of escrowee's liability. See §10.2.5 for further discussion of recovery against a construction escrowee.

[76] Recovery is based on the statutory framework for foreclosure, and the insurer must establish that it is a party entitled to protection or receipt of the money. In Board of Managers of the Coronado Condominium v. Silva, 54 Misc.3d 775, 42 N.Y.S.3d 742, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 26377 (N.Y.Sup.Ct. 2016), a title insurer bought a senior mortgage to protect its insured, who purchased at a condominium lien foreclosure sale and believed he was taking title free of liens. The court ruled that the insurer was not entitled to be reimbursed from the surplus money paid by its insured at the foreclosure auction, because the insurer was not the owner or a creditor holding a junior lien, and the surplus was not a general asset of the owner who had granted the mortgage. In Diediker v. Peelle Financial Corp., 60 Cal.App.4th 288, 70 Cal.Rptr.2d 442, 97 Cal. Daily Op.Serv. 9622 (Cal.App. 2 Dist. 1997), reh.den, an insurer was denied recovery against a trustee who conducted a non-judicial foreclosure sale in California without giving notice of the sale to the IRS as lien holder. The court found that the insurer, which had insured a grantee from the purchaser at sale, was not a party to whom the trustee owed a statutory duty. The trustee had obtained a trustee's sale guarantee that did not disclose the tax lien, and had no actual knowledge of the lien, which the court found precluded a claim against him for negligent misrepresentation.

[79] American Sav. & Loan Ass'n v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 793 F.2d 780 (6th Cir. 1986) (indemnity of owner against construction liens). Technically, any pursuit of the owner under a construction lien indemnity would not be by subrogation but by the insurer in its own right, since such indemnities run to the insurer. See §5.10 for a complete discussion of indemnities. See also §10.1 regarding construction lien claims. In Premier Title Co. v. Donahue, 328 Ill.App.3d 161, 765 N.E.2d 513, 262 Ill.Dec. 376 (Ill.App. 2 Dist. 2002), a seller gave a title insurer a secured indemnity to protect against unpaid taxes. The insurer used some of the money to pay some of the taxes, and mistakenly returned the balance to the seller. The court found that the indemnitor's obligation continued even after the return of the funds, because the indemnity said the indemnitor would "forever" defend against the taxes. In Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. Haire, 2004 WL 225088 (D.Md. 2004) (unpublished), aff'd, 107 Fed.Appx. 375 (4th Cir. (Md.) 2004) (unpublished), the insurer bought the insured lender's loan and was found entitled to collect against the borrower on an affidavit given to the lender. An insurer was permitted to take a personal judgment against the corporate officer who signed a false judgment affidavit, in Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. P.R.T. Enterprises, Inc., 65 Va.Cir. 271, 2004 WL 1714892 (Va.Cir.Ct. 2004). The decision was based in large part on evidence that the officer diverted the sale proceeds to his personal account, and therefore personally benefitted by not paying the corporation's debt. The court refused to award attorneys' fees, however, although the affidavit/indemnity so provided. However, a corporate officer was found not to be personally liable on a mechanic lien indemnity he signed, and further the indemnity was void for fraud in the inducement, on a finding that the escrow officer presented only the signature page of the indemnity to the officer, and made the indemnity sound routine. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. Marks, 2004 WL 2386830 (Cal.App. 1 Dist. 2004) (unpublished). In Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. 2485 Calle Del Oro, LLC, 2018 WL 3222610 (S.D.Cal. 2018) (unpublished), the court granted judgment to the insurer on a title affidavit containing indemnity language that falsely stated that title was free and clear, when in fact the indemnitor and others had forged reconveyances of deeds of trust.

[80] In Kazi v. State Farm Fire and Casualty Co., 70 Cal.App.4th 1288, 83 Cal.Rptr.2d 364 (Cal.App. 4 Dist. 1999), the court found that, by alleging encroachment and trespass, the complaint against the property owner "alleged property damage to the [insureds' land], giving rise to potential coverage under all of the insurance policies at issue here and requiring the insurers to defend ...." The policies in question were homeowners' policies. In Borg v. Transamerica Ins. Co., 47 Cal.App.4th 448, 54 Cal.Rptr.2d 811 (Cal.App. 1 Dist. 1996), the insurer on a homeowner's policy was found obligated to defend a suit for removal of encroachments by the insured's improvements onto the neighbor's property. As was pointed out in the letter of James N. Laichas, Esq., in the Guest Quarters of The Title Insurance Law Newsletter, December, 1996, a title insurer should thus consider seeking contribution or recoupment from a homeowner's insurance carrier if a similar action is tendered to the title insurer for defense. In In re Brookes, ___ B.R. ___, 2018 WL 5310657 (Bkcy.D.Mass. 2018) (permanent citation not yet available), the court held that the right to collect under a life insurance policy on another's life is an asset of a bankruptcy estate, and a title insurer that was the major unsecured creditor had the right to collect the cash value of the policy.

[81] In Stewart Title Guaranty Co. v. Park, 250 F.3d 1249 (9th Cir. (Cal.) 2001), a title insurer was found not to be an 'aggrieved person,' and therefore not entitled to recover from the California mortgage broker recovery account. A mortgage banker stole payoff funds at closing, then convinced Stewart Title to issue policies not excepting the unpaid prior trust deeds. When the defalcation became known, the insurer paid off the prior lenders. Stewart Title got judgment against the mortgage banker. It then filed an application with the California Department of Real Estate for reimbursement from the statutory Mortgage Banker Recovery Act Fund. The central question was whether a title insurer is an "aggrieved party" within the meaning the Recovery Act. Stewart Title made alternate arguments: that it was aggrieved in its own right, and that it was the subrogee of its insureds, who were aggrieved parties. As to its own claim to be an aggrieved party, the court admitted that Stewart Title had satisfied most of the conditions: the broker had committed a fraud, and the insurer had obtained a judgment against it. However, an earlier case, Middlesteadt v. Karpe, 52 Cal.App.3d 297, 124 Cal.Rptr. 840 (Cal.App. 1 Dist. 1975), limited the class of parties who may recover: "In light of the state policy underlying the real estate act, the broad provision of section 10471 must be read to the effect that the aggrieved person who is entitled to compensation from the Recovery Fund must be a client or a member of the general public." 52 Cal.App.3d at 302. Applying this judicial gloss to the statute, the Ninth Circuit ruled that a title insurer also is not part of the public intended to receive the protection of the fund. The court then considered the argument that Stewart Title stood in the shoes of its insureds by subrogation. It acknowledged that claims against the fund may be assigned. However, it turned to another decision, Wallace v. Onate, 2 Cal.App.4th 549, 3 Cal.Rptr.2d 3 (Cal.App. 2 Dist. 1991), for the proposition that the fund is meant to be a last resort only. The application form requires the claimant to certify that he or she has "diligently pursued collection efforts against other judgment debtors and all other persons liable to the claimant in the transaction." The court found that this put Stewart Title in a catch-22: "As this 'last resort' analysis indicates, aggrieved persons have no right to recovery from the fund until they have exhausted all other avenues of relief. Under the contractual liability created by the title insurance contract involved here, Stewart Title was obligated to compensate the lenders for their loss of lien priority. Thus, in light of the § 10471(c)(7)(E) provision, the insured would not have been eligible for recovery from the fund prior to seeking compensation from the title insurance company. However, once they did seek that compensation, both they and the borrowers were made whole by Stewart Title. Viewed in this light, because title insurance was purchased to cover the relevant transactions, the borrowers and insured lenders are not themselves eligible for relief. Thus, there can be no subrogation right for Stewart Title."

[82] Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co. v. R&S Rose Creditor Group, 2017 WL 4683968 (D.Nev.) (unpublished) (title insurer that agreed to insure refinancing lender's priority over existing junior lien had misrepresentation claim against junior lender that promised to subordinate to new deed of trust); WFG Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. Kavac Holding Company, LLC, 2019 WL 636722 (S.D.Tex. (Houston) 2019) (unpublished), recommendations adopted 2019 WL 632754 (S.D.Tex. (Houston) 2019) (permanent citation not yet available) (title insurer entitled to sue holder of blanket deed of trust based on oral promise to subordinate lien to subsequent construction deeds of trust on individual lots, and for other claims based on lender's actions seeking to wipe out lot buyer and lender). In Spring Construction Co., Inc. v. Harris, 614 F.2d 374 (4th Cir. 1980), an insurer that had paid off lien claimants and taken their construction lien claims by subrogation was entitled to pursue the HUD loan funds remaining for the project under equitable subrogation. The court found: "It would be unjust to allow Spring [the general contractor] to recover under a theory of unjust enrichment and deny similar relief to those who actually performed the services and supplied materials." Id. at 378. In Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. Dearborn Title Corp., 939 F.Supp. 611 (N.D.Ill. 1996); aff'd 118 F.3d 1157 (1997); later opinion 22 F.Supp.2d 820 (N.D.Ill. 1998), an insurer that funded the shortfall in an underwritten title company's escrow account was entitled to recover from a mortgage lender for money not disbursed to the agent to fund loans. The court said the underwriter would also have been entitled to recover money paid to the lender by the agent that constituted an illegal kickback under RESPA, if the claim had not been barred by the one-year statute of limitations in the Truth in Lending Act. In In re Dayton Title Agency, Inc., 262 B.R. 719, 37 Bkcy.Ct.Dec. 265 (S.D. Ohio 2001), a title agency's bankruptcy trustee was permitted to seek return of funds paid by the title company in an escrow. The paid-off lenders argued that Dayton Title did not have a property interest in the escrowed funds, and therefore had no right to seek return of the money. The court agreed that, ordinarily, a title company does not own the funds in its escrow account, and is a mere conduit. It said this case was distinguished, however, "by the unfortunate fact that [the funding] check was a forgery." The money given to the lenders was partly other people's money that happened to be in the escrow account at the time, and mostly a loan from the bank to the title agent. Also, Dayton Title established that it had control over the money because "Dayton Title made the critical decision to write checks to WFC and Wenrick from the trust account, without waiting for Chari's $5,000,000 deposit to clear." Further, the transfers to the lenders became liabilities of the title agency, "diminishing the amount of assets available to other creditors" of the agency. Therefore, the court concluded that Dayton Title had established that it had an interest in the money. In Rubie's LLC v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., ___ F.Supp.3d ___, 2018 WL 6419674 (E.D.Cal. 2018) (permanent citation not yet available), the court held that the United States Small Business Administration was not entitled, under the doctrine of sovereign immunity, to the dismissal of all claims brought by a title insurer for the agency's failure to reconvey a deed of trust after its receipt of a full payoff of the loan, which caused a substantial loss. See §13.13 for a discussion of claims precipitated by the failure of the lender to honor its loan funding check, and other issues related to delivery of good funds at closing.

[84] Willow Highlands Co., Commonwealth ex rel. v. Maryland Casualty Co., 373 Pa. 602, 97 A.2d 46 (1953). Often, the notary's defense is that the improper notarial act is not the proximate cause of the loss. For example, in Common Wealth Ins. Systems Ins. v. Kersten, 40 Cal.App.3d 1014, 115 Cal.Rptr. 653 (1974), the court held that there was a fact question as to whether the false notarization of a forged instrument could be found to be the proximate cause of a loss. If it was, an escrow party was entitled to indemnification from the notary and his surety. However, in another case, the notary was found not liable because his act did not cause a loss. In Missouri Abstract & Guaranty Co., State ex rel. v. Globe Indemnity Co., a party forged both a deed of trust and an endorsement of the loan proceeds check. The notary certificate on the deed of trust was false. The insurer paid the insured because of the forged deed of trust and then sued the notary and his surety. The court denied recovery, on the theory that the insured had not suffered a loss. The court found that the bank which accepted the forged check endorsement was liable instead. "The Westport Avenue Bank had no right to charge these checks to the account of Gaston. A bank has no right to charge to the account of its depositor money paid on forged indorsements." Thus, the insured's money "is still in the Westport Avenue Bank." 222 Mo.App. 918, 9 S.W.2d 668 (1928). Presumably, what the court meant was that the insurer's money paid on the claim resided in the Westport Avenue Bank, merely waiting to be withdrawn. In Kirk Corp. v. First American Title Co., 270 Cal. Rptr. 24 (App. 1990), the notary changed a jurat and failed to record the notarial act in her notary journal. The court found that the failure to post to the notary journal did not cause damage, since "[c]ivil liability for neglect of notarial duties can only be predicated on the existence of damages proximately caused by the conduct of the notary." The notary's act was found the proximate cause of loss, permitting recovery, in Garton v. Title Insurance & Trust Co., 106 Cal.App.3d 365, 165 Cal.Rptr. 449 (Cal.App. 3 Dist. 1980). In that case, a deed was altered materially after it was signed. Still later, the notary gave his acknowledgment. The notary argued that no harm was done, because the signatures themselves were valid and not forged. The court disagreed. "By taking the false acknowledgment and recording the altered deed of trust defendants deprived plaintiffs of the opportunity to learn the true facts of the transaction. As the result plaintiffs received less than that for which they had bargained. Such allegations are sufficient to avoid a demurrer." 165 Cal.Rptr. at 455. In Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. LaPierre, 104 A.D.3d 720, 961 N.Y.S.2d 237 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept. 2013), construing New York's Executive Law § 135 regarding notary misconduct, the title insurer was not required to prove that it relied on the notary's actions in order to recover from him for losses caused by the fact that the deed he acknowledged was a forgery. However, in a later decision in the same case, the court held that the attorney's fees that the insurer paid to defend the insured against the claim of forgery were not damages that the title insurer could recover from the notary. Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. LaPierre, 140 A.D.3d 821, 33 N.Y.S.3d 397, 2016 N.Y. Slip Op. 04379 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept. 2016). In U.S. Bank, N.A. v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 2015 WL 1291151 (S.D.N.Y. 2015) (unpublished), the court held that a title insurer that paid a claim caused by the impersonation of the borrower could not sue the notary who falsely witnessed the impersonator's signature, based on the doctrine of in par delicto, under which a party who participated in wrongdoing cannot sue its conspirator for indemnification. The court appeared to miss the fact that the insurer did not participate in the wrongdoing, but merely insured the title, whereas the notary was charged with verifying the identity of the person who showed up at the closing table. In Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. 2485 Calle Del Oro, LLC, 2018 WL 3222610 (S.D.Cal. 2018) (unpublished), a title insurer was not permitted to collect against the person who notarized forged reconveyances because the court did not find that a notary owes an insurer a duty of care under Arizona law. In Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. Western Surety Co., 277 So.3d 40 (Ala.Civ.App. 2018), the court dismissed an action against a surety under a notary bond because the action was not filed within two years after the notarial act was committed, which the court found to be the applicable limitations period in Alabama.

[85] California Land Title Co. v. Emslie, 175 Cal.App.3d 1001, 221 Cal.Rptr. 332 (Cal.App. 4 Dist. 1986) involved a loan fraudulently obtained by a real estate broker on her clients' property. The insurer paid off the lender and sued the property owners for negligence, money had and received, and imposition of an equitable lien on the property. The court reversed a demurrer to all three counts. It found that the property owners had a duty to inquire when asked to endorse over the loan proceeds check to the broker. It also allowed an equitable lien on the property in the amount of a deed of

- Purchasers.[86]

- Recorders or registers of deeds, or clerks of court, for dereliction of duties in the filing, recording and indexing of documents and liens, or for theft of recording fees.[87] trust paid off by the insured deed of trust.

[86] In Ticor Title Ins. Co. v. Mundelius, 887 S.W.2d 726 (Mo.App.E.D. 1994), the insurer made a mistake on the closing statement and the buyer paid too little. The court granted judgment by subrogation, on the grounds of unjust enrichment. It cited the Restatement of Restitution § 9 (1937) in its conclusion: "'The right to restitution for unjust enrichment presupposes: '(1) that the defendant was enriched by the receipt of a benefit; (2) that the enrichment was at the expense of the plaintiff; (3) that it would be unjust to allow the defendant to retain the benefit.' ... Here, there is no question the defendant paid $2,000 less than he should have paid for the real estate due to an error Ticor made in the settlement statement. ... He therefore received a $2,000 benefit for which he did not pay. This enrichment came at Ticor's expense. To allow him to retain this benefit without full payment would be unjust." The court went on to reject the notions that the insurer's payment of the shortage was either a compromise settlement or as a volunteer.

There has been increased concern about recording delays, and some recorders have been sued for negligent supervision and dereliction of duties. See Condell Private Letter, March 13, 1997, p. 17 and July 10, 1997, p. 18, concerning a suit by the Pennsylvania Land Title Association against the Philadelphia Department of Records for alleged recording delays of up to one year. Barczak*, 229 Wis.2d 521, 600 N.W.2d 205 (Wis.App. 1999) (clerk of court personally liable to judgment creditor for negligent supervision of staff resulting in tardy docketing of judgment lien, thus allowing debtor to convey property before docketing occurred); New Jersey Land Title Association v. State Records Committee, 315 N.J.Super. 17, 716 A.2d 541 (N.J.Super.A.D. 1998) (decision to allow destruction of microfilm and other real estate records was arbitrary and capricious, and title association had standing to challenge the decision); Brakke v. Maltais, 406 A.2d 123 (N.H. 1979) (plaintiff's own negligence in investigating title greater than register of deeds' negligence in misposting mortgage, thus precluding recovery). Note, too, that a New Jersey statute precludes subrogation claims by insurers or their insureds against governmental entities. See Pinkowski v. Township of Montclair, 299 N.J.Super. 557, 691 A.2d 837 (N.J.Super.A.D. 1997). Regarding recovery of money stolen by the recorder or one of the office employees, see Investors Title Co., Inc. v. Hammonds, 217 S.W.3d 288 (Mo. 2007), in which the court affirmed a jury verdict of almost $650,000 against St. Louis County and its recorder of deeds for money stolen by an employee of the recorder's office. The crime was made possible by the recorder's policy of requiring title companies to leave blank checks for daily recording fees.

(unpublished) (leaving open question of whether or not a title insurer is an "aggrieved party" who may make claim under Virginia title agent bond because Western Surety case cited above was then on appeal); Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. Main Street Title & Escrow LLC, 78 Va. Cir. 68, 2008 WL 8203224 (Va.Cir.Ct. 2008) (finding that there is no private cause of action under Virginia CRESPA title agent bond law, in opinion issued before Western Surety decision); First American Title Ins. Co. v. Star City Title & Settlement Agency, Inc., 2015 WL 2092814 (W.D.Va. 2015) (unpublished) (statute of limitations had run on suit over Virginia title agent CRESPA bond, pursued by insurer as subrogee of lender, because the breach occurred at closing, when the agent failed to close the revolving credit loan account, "and not when the resulting damage [was] discovered" when the lender foreclosed). Also see St. Paul Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Johnson, 64 Minn. 492, 67 N.W. 543 (1896) and First American Title Ins. Co. v. St. Paul Fire and Marine Ins. Co., 951 F.2d 1134 (9th Cir. 1991). The latter case discusses recovery under blanket bond "standard form No. 25" for an escrow employee's misconduct. Also, in Anchor Equities, Ltd. v. Pacific Coast American, 737 P.2d 532, 105 N.M. 751 (1987), the owner and sole employee of the title agency/escrow company allegedly absconded with the funds in the escrow account. The court sanctioned direct action against the agency's fidelity bond surety by a lender whose money was stolen. See, for example, Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co. v. Gulf Underwriters Ins. Co., 1998 WL 283510 (Wash.App. Div. 1) (unpublished), in which the sole shareholder and director of an escrow company (not a title agency) named Creekside that failed to pay off mortgages. Creekside folded, leaving unsatisfied mortgage liens to be paid off by two title insurers. The insurers attempted to collect on the escrow company's fidelity bond, which covered acts of employees and officers, but not owners. The court found that the insurers were not entitled to compensation, because they were "sophisticated business entities" which "do not stand in the shoes of the trust beneficiaries [the parties to the escrows], but in the shoes of the escrow agent, Creekside, whose assignment [footnote omitted] underlies their cause of action. Simply put, the title companies are not within the class of persons protected by the [escrow] Act or by the bond." Id. at 3. In so holding, the court distinguished an earlier case, Estate of Jordan v. Hartford Accident & Indem. Co., 120 Wash.2d 490, 844 P.2d 403 (1993), which had permitted escrow parties to recover when a vice president of an escrow company had stolen escrowed money.

The Gulf Underwriters court's analysis elevates form over substance. The insurers were victims of the escrow company, not its legal assignees. They pursued recovery on the bond as subrogees of their insureds, the escrow parties. The assignment of the escrow company's rights against its own bond was belt-and-suspenders lawyering. Moreover, the surety itself argued that assignment of the bond was prohibited by the terms of the bond, and thus the assignment was void. The court merely rejected this argument/admission by the surety. Id. at fn. 1. A document of such a dubious nature did not establish or change the legal relationships between the parties. Had the insurers denied the policy claims and directed their insureds to pursue claims on the bond instead, Estate of Jordan would have controlled and permitted recovery.

In Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. Lumbermen's Mutual Cas. Co., 120 Md.App. 538, 707 A.2d 913 (1998), an insurer made parties whole after the title agent shorted its escrow account. The insurer then pursued the agent, its errors and omissions carrier and its fidelity bond surety. The insurer settled with and released all but the surety. The court applied the rule that a release of the principal without a reservation of the right to pursue the surety discharges the surety's obligations. Therefore, the insurer was prohibited from recovering under the bond.

An assessment by the State of California against an underwriter to cover its share of the escrow shortage of a defunct agency was not a loss directly caused by the title agent's dishonesty, and therefore the insurer was denied recovery under the agent's fidelity bond, in United General Title Ins. Co. v. American Int'l Group, Inc., 2002 WL 31554048 (9th Cir. (Cal.)) (unpublished). A title agent's theft of loan funds was not covered by the mortgage banker's financial institution bond, because the title company closer was not an employee of the lender. Utica Mutual Ins. Co. v. Precedent Companies, LLC, 782 N.E.2d 470 (Ind.App. 2003). In New Jersey Title Ins. Co. v. National Union Fire Ins. Co. of Pittsburgh, 2011 WL 6887130 (D.N.J.) (unpublished), the court held that a title insurer could not collect on a financial institution bond that it purchased, that had an Agents Fidelity rider that listed the agent whose employee later stole money and caused the insurer's loss, despite the fact that the insurer had bought the bond for the exact type of loss for which the surety denied liability.

- Surveyors.[90]
- Taxpayers, as to tax liens against themselves.[91]
- Taxpayers, as to real estate taxes paid.[92]

Many employee theft bonds do not protect against the acts of the agency owner. In Conestoga Title Ins. Co. v. Premier Title Agency, Inc., 328 N.J.Super. 460, 746 A.2d 462 (N.J.Super.A.D. 2000), aff'd 166 N.J.2, 763 A.2d 746 (2000), a New Jersey court held that an employee theft bond does not protect against the acts of the title agency's owners. The perpetrator at Premier was the sole director, president, and shareholder. The court ruled that "numerous cases have held that this common definition of employee in corporate fidelity bonds—persons whom you have the right to direct and control while performing services for youBis unambiguous and means that thefts by corporate alter egos are not covered." In Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Conestoga Title Ins. Co., 328 N.J.Super. 456, 746 A.2d 460 (N.J.Super.A.D. 2000), issued the same day and involving the same underwriter but a different agency, the court reached the same result although the stock of the agency was owned not by the president and perpetrator but his wife.

In KMC Management Corp. v. Certain Underwriters at Lloyd's London, 2000 WL 1742096 (Minn.App.) (unpublished), a claim under an employee theft bond was denied as to money stolen by a mortgage banker. The purchaser of mortgage loans wired the loan amounts to the mortgage banker rather than his warehouse lenders, contrary to the terms of a written agreement. The owner of the mortgage banking company stole the money. The court ruled that the money belonged to the mortgage banker at the time it was stolen, and not "in transit," a pre-requisite for bond coverage. Fidelity Coverage for E-Commerce Fraud, by Mark E. Wilson, The Brief (Fall 2001), p. 40, analyzes the types of fraud that e-commerce invites, and how they fit with the coverage of the traditional employee theft bond. There is an excellent discussion of recovery on blanket bonds in the letter of James N. Laichas, Esq., in the Guest Quarters of The Title Insurance Law Newsletter, December, 1996.

Code Ann. § 12–301, which sets three-year limitations period beginning "from the time the right to maintain the action accrues," title insurer was entitled to extended limitations period because errors on surveys were not patent). A title insurer that removed the survey exception based on a survey done at time of policy issuance was found not entitled to sue a surveyor who prepared a later and equally inaccurate survey, because the coverage was not given based on the later survey, in *Chicago Title Ins. - Victims of a fraud perpetrator whose claims against the property are inferior to that of the insurer.[94]

Prompt notice to the potential recoupment parties will estop them from raising defenses later if they do not raise those defenses at the time the matter is being resolved. Also, prompt notice prompts the Recoupment party to disclose facts or legal theories that might aid in defending an insured. If the insurer does not elicit the facts until after payment is made, the other party may assert that it was a volunteer in making payment. See §5.8.3 regarding the defense that the insurer paid as a volunteer.

Finally, prompt notice to other parties puts them under the same time constraints as the insurer faces in resolving the title claim and related issues, blunting or negating the possible argument that the insurer paid too much by making a panic settlement (see §5.8 for further discussion of this defense).

5.8 Defenses Raised As To Insurer's Right Of Subrogation

An insurer seeking to recoup by subrogation is subject to defenses against its own right to collect, and defenses which the third party has against the insured. In addition, defenses against the insurer's agent may be imputed against the underwriter.

This section will discuss four defenses commonly raised against insurers attempting to recoup by subrogation:

1. That the insurer's error precludes recovery;

2. That the insurer paid too much to solve the problem;

(1982), later app., 97 A.D.2d 784, 468 N.Y.S.2d 523 (1983) (insurer subrogated to lender which paid taxes for borrower).

[93] In TRW Title Ins. Co. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 832 S.W.2d 344 (Tenn.App. 1991), two title insurers had insured different lots affected by one mortgage which was not shown on either policy. Stewart Title purchased the loan and then foreclosed the mortgage. TRW Title asserted, among other defense, that it was entitled to pay only one-half of the amount owed, as its contributive share of the "common" loss. The court rejected this argument, since the two insurers did not have a common obligation but rather had insured different parties and property. The court thus permitted Stewart Title to collect the full sum of the debt. This case did not hinge on subrogation. The court found that Stewart was not a "subrogator" but rather a holder of the indebtedness by assignment.

[94] In United States v. Gettel, 2017 WL 3966635 (S.D.Cal.) (unpublished), the federal government seized several parcels in a forfeiture action against fraudsters who lured investors into a fake property rehabilitation scheme. One such parcel was sold by the government. The sale proceeds went to the title insurer that had established a constructive trust on the sold parcel because it had paid off liens secured by that property. The title insurer's claim was given priority over the claims of creditors whose losses could not be traced to that real estate.

3. That the insurer paid as a volunteer; and

4. Defenses available to the third party against the insured.

There are various defenses particular to sellers who are sued for breach of warranty, as discussed at §5.9. State law may also prohibit subrogation in certain situations as a matter of public policy.[95]

5.8.1 Insurer Error

To recover against a third party by subrogation, the insurer must establish that the third party justly deserves to bear the ultimate loss.[96] The insurer's mistake may be a factor, but ordinary negligence on the insurer's part should not be determinative. In Castleman Construction Co. v. Pennington,[97] the court stated:

> ...the better rule is that regardless of the source of the right of subrogation, the right will only be enforced in favor of a meritorious claim and after a balancing of the equities.[98]

It quoted 83 C.J.S. Subrogation § 6, which says:

> Negligence of the subrogee must be more than ordinary negligence, however, in order to bar application of the principle of subrogation, and relief may be allowed notwithstanding the suitor's mistakes and ignorance... .[99]

The court concluded that the insurer's negligence in not detecting the title defects did not prevent it from recovering from the seller on warranties:

> We do not say that ordinary negligence of the subrogee may not be taken into consideration in ascertaining whether he be entitled to the equitable relief of subrogation. What we do say is that ordinary negligence alone will not be held to be a complete bar to subrogation where in spite of such negligence the equities are still in favor of the subrogee.[100]

The insurer must show that its own negligence is not so great that it could be considered the precipitating factor in the loss.[101] The insurer must be guilty of more than ordinary negligence in order for it to be denied the right to recover on the basis of its mistake.[102] The actions of the title agent that issued the policy are not imputed to the insurer to support the defense of comparative fault.[103]

Various cases have permitted the insurer to recover when its error was one of omission rather than commission.[104] For example, when the insurer gave survey coverage based on a survey which

[100] 432 S.W.2d at 677.

[101] When the insurer vested title incorrectly, and later paid a large sum to get a corrective deed, the court denied its attempt to recoup on the warranty deed prepared in reliance on the title commitment. "[R]ecovery is not a matter of absolute right but is granted or withheld as the equities of a particular case may require. See Thompson v. Miller, 195 Va. 513, 79 S.E.2d 643, 647 (1954), Federal Land Bank of Baltimore, 18 S.E.2d at 920. Thus, the negligence of the party seeking subrogation is a factor that can be considered by the court in determining whether or not subrogation should be allowed. ... In this case, U.S. Titles made a critical error in transferring information learned in its title search. U.S. Titles was clearly negligent and Meridian, as principal, is responsible for that negligence. But for the error, no claim by Meridian or Cahill would exist against the defendants. In light of these circumstances, it would be contrary to principles of equity to allow Meridian to escape its obligation on the insurance policy it issued. The court will not allow a party to recover for a debt they themselves are fully responsible for merely because they can point to wrongful conduct on the part of another that was a separate and additional, but ultimately not contributing cause of the mistake creating the debt." Meridian Title Ins. Co. v. Lilly Homes Inc., 735 F.Supp. 182, 186 (E.D. Va 1990).

[102] "Culpable negligence may prevent one from being afforded the equitable relief of subrogation, but negligence of the subrogee must be more than ordinary negligence ... and relief may be allowed notwithstanding the suitor's mistakes and ignorance ... where in spite of such negligence the equities are still in favor of subrogee." Castleman Construction Co. v. Pennington, 222 Tenn. 82, 432 S.W.2d 669, 677 (1968). In In re Estate of Barnes v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2000 WL 688540 (Tenn.App.) (unpublished), the seller asserted the insurer's error in not detecting a title defect should bar recoupment against it. After quoting the above passage from Castleman, the court concluded: "We do not say that ordinary negligence of the subrogee may not be taken into consideration in ascertaining whether he be entitled to the equitable relief of subrogation. What we do say is that ordinary negligence alone will not be held as a complete bar to subrogation where in spite of such negligence the equities are still in favor of the subrogee. Applying the teaching of Castleman on the question of negligence to the facts of this case, we are of the opinion the negligence of the title examiner was not sufficiently egregious to preclude the claim, nor the equities of the Estate superior to those of Stewart Title." In Weiss v. Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 262 Ga.App. 120, 584 S.E.2d 710 (Ga.App. 2003), the insurer was permitted to recover from the sellers because it was found not to have been negligent in searching title. The policy erroneously included an extra parcel, because the deed and policy used a newly-created legal description aggregating several parcels. The appeals court found that "there is no evidence that a title search on the subject property alone would have revealed the incorrect property description." See also Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. Prosch, 2011 WL 250421 (S.D.Ala.) (unpublished) (insurer not barred by supposed unclean hands from suing seller for breach of warranty for mortgage not detected in title search).

[103] Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co. v. Howard, 2016 WL 1255719 (E.D.Ky.) (unpublished) (title agent's supposed actions that aided borrowers' loan fraud were not imputed to insurer to block it from suing borrowers on notes, especially because insurer did not know agent was aiding the fraud and its actions were not within the scope of its agency).

[104] When the insured's title was found defective because the deed to the insured's seller was adjudged a mere located an easement in the wrong place, it was permitted to recover its full loss against the surveyor. The court rejected the surveyor's claim that the insurer was equally responsible for locating the easement.[105] Courts have divided on whether or not a party to litigation may introduce evidence that another party has the benefit of title insurance. Most courts have adopted what is commonly called the collateral source rule, which allows a plaintiff in a negligence action to recover from a tortfeasor even when the plaintiff has been compensated by a liability insurer. Some courts have said that the collateral source rule should also apply to exclude evidence of the existence of title insurance coverage, because the availability of insurance coverage can influence the trier of fact to find against the insured on the assumption that he or she will be made whole by the insurer.[106] However, not all courts have applied the collateral source rule to title insurance coverage.[107]

When the insurer buys a mortgage in order to release it from the insured property to protect its insured purchaser, it may enforce the lien against the seller as to other land that is security for the mortgage.[108] When the insurer takes an assignment of the mortgage note from the insured lender, it becomes a true creditor of the borrower. One right of a creditor is to file an involuntary bankruptcy petition against the borrower. The borrower's claim under its own title insurance policy may act as an offset against the borrower's liability under the note. However, the fact of insurance coverage does not render the insurer's claim disputed; thus, the filing of the petition is not precluded mortgage, the debt having been paid, the insurer was permitted to recover against the seller. The seller argued that the insurer had missed a lis pendens filed in connection with the action to set aside the deed. The court found that the insurer's sin "was one of omission, while the sin of the defendants was one of commission and one which was the genesis of the problem." *American Title Co. v. Also, an insurer was not estopped from foreclosing a lien it had purchased because it had earlier failed to show the lien on a policy issued to another party, in Ticor Title Ins. Co. v. Nissell, 871 P.2d 652 (Wash.App.Div. 2 1994).

[107] Keever v. Dellinger, 291 Ga. 860, 734 S.E.2d 874, 12 FCDR 3430 (2012) (permitting introduction of evidence of title insurance at trial). In Chanda v. Federal Home Loans Corp., 215 Cal.App.4th 746, 155 Cal.Rptr.3d 693, 13 Cal. Daily Op. Serv. 3938 (Cal.App. 1 Dist. 2013), a mortgage broker was sued for negligence and breach of fiduciary duty. The broker sought to defend those claims by showing that he had ordered title insurance to protect against fraud and forgery. The trial court excluded the evidence. The appeals court reversed, holding that the collateral source rule did not apply to title insurance, and that the probative value of title insurance evidence outweighed its prejudicial effect. The court concluded that the trial court's decision to exclude evidence of title insurance was prejudicial. In Scurich Brothers, Inc. v. Frederickson, 2016 WL 3960170 (Cal.App. 6 Dist.) (unpublished), the court agreed with Chanda and held that the collateral source rule does not apply to title insurance. In that decision, a buyer sued the seller for breach of warranty. The court allowed evidence that the owner had title insurance and had not incurred a loss due to the seller's breach of warranty.

[108] In Petrol Properties, Inc. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 225 S.W.3d 448 (Mo.App. S.D. 2007), the court held that a title insurer that bought a loan to protect its insured owner, and asserted the deed of trust against the remaining property owned by the seller to the insured, was entitled to foreclose despite the seller's defense that the title company had been negligent in searching title.

thereby.[109]

The insured's status as a bona fide purchaser for value is not forfeited as to third parties simply because the title insurer is performing its obligations to pay for the cure of the insured's title.[110] See §5.9 for further cases concerning the defense of the insurer's mistake as raised by sellers.

5.8.2 Excessive Settlement Amount Paid By Insurer

The subrogation target may admit liability but claim that the insurer paid too much to solve the title defect. Most courts will presume a settlement to be reasonable and set that amount as the recovery against the third party. The insurer should show that it did not act carelessly or collusively.[111] The burden of proof is on the third party to show that the settlement was not reasonable, or that the third party's liability does not equal the settlement amount.[112]

However, in certain circumstances, the amount which the insurer may recover against a third party will be different than the amount the insurer was obligated to pay the insured as its policy loss.[113] The insurer should thus be careful to prove that the party it is suing is obligated for all of the elements of damage for which the insurer has compensated the insured. Otherwise, the insurer could be effectively penalized for stepping forward and solving the problem. The insurer should remind the court that full compensation is necessary for the insurer/insured to be indemnified for its loss. In Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co. v. Conklin Associates,[114] the court refused to limit recovery

[111] Careless settlement could include the release of parties who might be liable to the party against whom subrogation is sought. See Chemical Bank of N.J. v. Bailey, 687 A.2d 316 (N.J.Super.A.D. 1997), in which a closing attorney paid off a revolving credit loan but did not get a release of the lien because he negligently failed to instruct the lender to close the account. The insurer paid the later advances to obtain a release of the lien. It was not permitted to recover against the attorney because it had released the borrowers when it removed the lien, destroying the attorney's right of subrogation.

[112] "We have concluded, therefore, that we cannot affirm the summary judgment for the reason that American's declaration does not lay to rest the factual issue of whether their settlement with the Binns, under the principles we have set forth, was reasonable and within the limits of the potential liability. When indemnification is sought on the basis of a settlement effected with the creditor the question of liability and the limit thereof are still open factual questions. (Lamb v. Belt Casualty Co., 3 Cal.App.2d 624, 631, 40 P.2d 311.) The settlement is only presumptive evidence of the liability and the amount, subject to being overcome by proof. (Fidelity & Deposit Co. v. Whitson, 187 Cal.App.2d 751, 10 Cal.Rptr. 6.)" American Title Co. v. Anderson, 52 Cal.App.3d 255, 125 Cal.Rptr. 24, 27 (Cal.App. 2 Dist. 1975). In Ratchford v. Miller, 2004 WL 36263 (Cal.App. 4 Dist. 2004) (unpublished), the title insurer was entitled to full recovery against a seller who conveyed on behalf of an estate while the will was being challenged. The insurer's settlement with the contesting heirs was not voluntary, and the amount paid was "a reasonable approximation of the value" of their claim.

[113] "The amount of the judgment to which American would be entitled on subrogation would be limited to the amount which the Binns could have recovered had they proceeded directly against the defendants. In settling with the Binns for any greater amount, American would be a volunteer." American Title Co. v. Anderson, 52 Cal.App.3d 255, 125 Cal.Rptr. 24, 27 (Cal.App. 2 Dist. 1975).

against a negligent surveyor to the fair market value of the overlap property purchased by the insurer. The court gave the insurer full indemnity instead.[115]

However, in Safeco Title Ins. Co. v. Citizens & Southern National Bank, the court found that the insurer acted in undue haste in acquiring disputed land, largely because of its own error. It ruled that the seller was responsible only for the true fair market value of the land, not the panic price paid by the insurer.[116]

5.8.3 Insurer As Volunteer

A third party may argue that the insurer was a mere volunteer in making payment because it was not obligated under its policy to make the payment. For a discussion of this subject in the context of claims by underwriters against title agents, see §17.8. The doctrine of "conventional," or contractual, subrogation is based on the idea that an insurer's payment is not voluntary, but compelled by the insurance contract:

> [W]here the courts have distinguished between legal and conventional subrogation, they have done so for the purpose of showing that one who makes a payment under a contract calling for subrogation is not a mere volunteer, thereby relieving them from the rule that a volunteer is not entitled to subrogation.[117]

For example, when an escrowee paid the seller the full purchase price, it was permitted to recoup

[115] "Defendants urge that ... the purchase price was unreasonably high and not diligently negotiated by Commonwealth. They further suggest that the proper measure of damages is the market value that the land would bring in an arm's-length negotiation, and that no evidence of this was introduced at trial. This overlooks the positions of the parties to the negotiations. The title companies were obligated to their insureds to protect them against any loss or claim and to expeditiously settle the matter. The New Jersey homeowners were faced with a loss of sections of their developed properties and Wulster's time and contractual obligations hung heavy on him. Unless the matter was expeditiously concluded, greater expense might well have been incurred. Under the circumstances, this court finds that the negotiated settlement was reached in good faith and is not an unfair or unreasonable measure of damages." Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co. v. Conklin Associates, 377 A.2d 740, 745 (1977).

[116] Safeco Title Ins. Co. v. Citizens & Southern Nat'l Bank, 190 Ga.App. 809, 380 S.E.2d 477 (1989). The court was swayed by the fact the insurer rather hastily decided that the interest of the neighbor was not an easement, as reported on the policy, but fee title. Further, the claim arose when the insured built a swimming pool and foundation on the easement/fee, without giving notice. "In view of the fact that it was the improper act by appellant's insured which precipitated the claim, we find no merit in appellant's arguments that when it settled [the neighbor's] claim, it was acting under compulsion or in response to an emergency and that in some way legally entitled appellant to recover the $100,000 it paid for the disputed property from appellee [the seller]." Id. at 480. Similarly, the court in American Title Co. v. Anderson, 52 Cal.App.3d 255, 125 Cal.Rptr. 24 (Cal.App. 2 Dist. 1975), found that the amount and elements of damage compensable were not necessarily identical to the loss paid by the insurer, but were dependent on the cause of action brought against the third party. The court sent the case back for determinations of fact.

[117] Castleman Construction Co. v. Pennington, 432 S.W.2d 669 (Tenn. 1968) (citing United States Fidelity & Guar. Co. v. Elam, 198 Tenn. 194, 278 S.W.2d 693 (1955)). See also Hornstein v. Guarantee Ins. Co., 471 So.2d 108, 110 (Fla.App. 3 Dist. 1985): "In honoring the contractual obligation to indemnify their insured, insurers are not, as to the payment of the lien obligation, mere volunteers. Their interest is real, pecuniary and obligatory."

from the buyer who had paid too little. The insurer/escrowee was not a volunteer because its "payment was made in performance of its duty as defendant's escrow agent, and as such, was not voluntary."[118]

When the insurer settles a claim despite a valid policy coverage defense, a party against whom the insurer seeks subrogation will sometimes assert as a defense the insurer's lack of legal obligation to indemnify. This is a variant of the volunteer doctrine. However, when the coverage question is debatable, or the insurer asserts the coverage defense but it fails or is stymied, the insurer is not a volunteer in making payment on the policy. In Realty Alliance of Texas, Ltd. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co.,[119] the insurer sought an injunction against the sale of property by the IRS, based on facts which also formed the basis for a coverage defense, but the injunction was denied. At that point, "Stewart Title's alternative was to allow the IRS to sell the property and face a bad faith action which could have resulted in a much greater loss."[120] In addition, there was testimony that it was "a close call" as to whether or not the policy terminated on the insured's post-policy conveyance of the property to a corporation it controlled. The insurer thus was not a volunteer in paying off the lien rather than allow the property to be auctioned.

However, an insurer may be subject to attack as a volunteer if it was not required by the contract to pay the claim.[121] Thus, when a matter was later deemed by the court to be excluded from coverage, the insurer was held to have volunteered both defense and settlement funds, with no right to recover from the abstractor who erred.[122] An insurer was held to be a volunteer when it paid a lender's claim after the lender had obtained a deed in lieu of foreclosure. The court adopted the erroneous position that "the payment or satisfaction of the note releases the obligations under the title policy."[123] An agent or approved attorney against whom recoupment is sought may raise policy [121] See Safeco Title Ins. Co. v. Citizens & Southern National Bank, 380 S.E.2d 477, 190 Ga.App. 809 (1989) (subrogation may not be had when insurer made a "panic" settlement of an "emergency" which the court found the insured had precipitated by its construction work). Citizens & Southern is a good example of how an insurer may lose its right to be reimbursed by stepping into and solving an urgent problem for the insured.

[122] Fidelity National Title Ins. Co. of Tennessee v. Kidd, 394 S.E.2d 225 (N.C.App. 1990). The court admitted there were "novel factual aspects" to the case, in that the insured's sole interest in the property was "a promissory note for $650,000.00 'or such proportionate amount as her ultimate interest in property may bear to 100% with such payment to occur upon final clearing of title.' This note was secured by a deed of trust to the property having no warranties of title." The insured paid no consideration for the property. Based on these facts, which the insurer knew, the court held that the insurer could not have had a duty to indemnify the insured no matter how the lawsuit had been concluded. The Kidd ruling is overly broad. The court apparently missed the fact that the duty to defend is broader than the duty to indemnify, and the settlement was apparently made to cut off the defense costs.

[123] Title Guaranty & Trust Co. v. Johnson, 485 S.W.2d 764 (Tenn.App. 1972). The court failed to understand that a loan policy continues in effect as long as the lender has an interest in the real estate. The decision might be justified, however, on the implicit finding that the lender obtained both a claim payment and a deed clearing title to the land. Thus, it may have been that the lender suffered no compensable loss, which could be considered to make the insurer's payment defenses that it believes should have been applied to avoid payment of the claim.[124] A Texas court rejected the volunteer defense altogether, however, because the insurer established contractual or conventional subrogation rights.[125]

When the insurer reimburses an insured that paid off a lien, the third party may argue that the insured paid the lien as a volunteer. In such cases, it is not sufficient to show that the payment by the insurer to the insured was required under the policy. The insurer must also establish that the payment of the debt by the insured was based on an obligation or to preserve an interest in the property. This was shown, for example, when the insured lender paid the real estate taxes to protect the lien of its mortgage.[126]

The volunteer defense may also be raised when the insurer has paid off a federal tax lien against a former owner. See §3.4.7.1.5 for a complete discussion of recoupment of federal tax liens.

5.8.4 Defenses Applicable To Insured

The insurer has no greater rights against third parties than would the insured itself. Thus, when the insurer paid off construction lien claimants and then attempted to pursue the borrowers individually, they successfully defended based on the fact that the loan was non-recourse.[127] Also, an insurer was not permitted to pursue a claim as the insured's subrogee for misrepresentation by the seller when the insured had failed to make a diligent inquiry regarding facts at time of purchase.[128] Finally, in Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. Feldsher,[129] when the insured lender was aware that a prior trust deed existed but mistakenly thought he would have priority over that interest, the insurer was bound by the insured's knowledge. The insurer was denied application of the doctrine of equitable subrogation.

a gift or volunteer payment.

[124] See, for example, Title Ins. Co. of Minnesota v. Christian, 267 S.C. 71, 226 S.E.2d 240 (1976).

[125] In Dawson v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2002 WL 80162 (Tex.App.-Dallas) (unpublished), the insurer paid off taxes for the insured buyer that were assessed after the seller's tax exemption was revoked. The insurer pursued the seller on covenants of warranty, and the seller's principal defense was that the insurer did not have to pay the tax claim because the reassessment was a post-policy matter. The court rejected the argument, holding that "when a claim is asserted under a policy through a contractual subrogation provision, whether a payment is more than required by the policy or made voluntarily is immaterial."

5.9 Subrogation Rights Against Sellers

FORM 67, Appendix A
Recoupment against seller who created defect

An insurer may pursue the seller of property under a claim of subrogation. Such a demand often requires a balancing of equities between seller and insurer. There are several defenses to recovery that apply only to property sellers, as discussed below.

5.9.1 Theories Of Recovery Against Sellers

For the insurer to pursue the seller in the insured's shoes, the insured must have a basis for claiming liability against the seller. The most common cause of action is based on warranties of title.[130] Recovery for breach of warranties allows the insurer to be made whole after it has made the insured whole.[131]

Johnson*, 103 Wash.2d 409 693 P.2d 697 (1985); Fairmont-Tillett Ltd. v. First Memphis Realty Trust, 691 F.2d 991 (11th Cir. 1982); American Title Ins. Co. v. Co. v. Rabeh, 2016 WL 3997260 (E.D.Pa. 2016) (unpublished) (title insurer that paid off federal tax liens to protect insured owner entitled to judgment against grantors for breach of warranty). In Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. Wooden, 2017 WL 2243032 (N.D.Ala.) (unpublished), the court said that the insurer would have a claim for breach of warranty against the seller once it had paid the insured and had become vested in the claim under the made-whole doctrine. The court rejected a number of defenses by the seller to its warranty liability. In In re Brown, 570 B.R. 98 (W.D.Okla. 2017), sellers who warranted that title was free of liens, but who failed to pay off a judgment lien at closing, were found not absolved of their warranty liability just because the title insurer had paid the judgment debt. In Cochran Investments, Inc. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 550 S.W.3d 196 (Tex.App.-Houston 2018), the court ruled that a Texas special warranty deed does not covenant that the seller has good title, and therefore the title insurer could not recover from the seller when title failed.

[131] American Title Insurance Co. v. Coakley, 419 So.2d 816 (Fla. App. 1982) (IRS lien against seller); Harvey v. J & H Holdings, Inc., 310 So.2d 371 (Fla.App.1975) (easement granted by sellers); Wolff v. Commercial Standard Ins. Co., 345 S.W.2d 565 (Tex.App. 1961) (forged release of deed of trust); Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. Cosby, 1996 WL 682462 (Tex.App.-Dallas) (unpublished) (paving assessment levied before conveyance). However, in Reiterer v. Monteil, 98 So.3d 586, 37 Fla. L. Weekly D549 (Fla.App. 2 Dist. 2012), the court held that recovery against the seller for breach of warranty applies only to fees incurred to defend title, and not fees incurred in the suit for breach of warranty. In Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. Aurora Loan Services, LLC, 2013 IL App (1st) 123510, 996 N.E.2d 44 (Ill.App. 1 Dist. 2013), a seller that gave a special warranty deed was found not liable to the insurer, as subrogee of the purchaser-insured, because the real estate taxes that caused the policy claim were a lien before the seller took title.

Recoupment

The insurer is not limited to claims for breach of warranties, however. When no warranties of title have been given, the court may reform the deed to create warranties, in order to avoid unjust enrichment of the seller.[132] When the deed to the insured is declared void, the title insurer which has indemnified the insured has a right to repayment of the purchase price.[133] A seller who is mistakenly paid too much money at closing must return the overpayment as unjust enrichment.[134] If the contract between seller and buyer provides that errors will be corrected after closing, the insurer may pursue the seller under this contract term after making the insured whole.[135] Absent a showing of unjust enrichment, however, a lack of warranties may defeat recovery.[136] The insurer stands in the insured's shoes, and should consider what other causes of action the insured has against its seller. This may include a misrepresentation claim. However, in making such claims, the insurer is subject to any defense the seller may have as to the insured.[137]

---

[132] A judgment couched in the doctrine of unjust enrichment was granted to the title insurer in Title Ins. Co. of Minnesota v. Costain, Inc., 164 Ariz. 203, 791 P. 2d 1086 (Ariz.App. 1990). In Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co. v. Rabeh, 2016 WL 3997260 (E.D.Pa. 2016) (unpublished), the court granted judgment in favor of the insurer against the sellers based on breach of warranty, but also on common law indemnity and unjust enrichment. In Glassick v. Wells Federal Bank, 2016 WL 7337087 (Minn.App.) (unpublished), the court entered judgment in favor of the insurer against the seller based on common law indemnification.

Slip Op. 06526 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept. 2009) (when property sold twice, then deeds rescinded, insurer entitled to recover from original seller but recovery limited to original sale price, not higher price paid on second purchase); First American Title Ins. Co. v. Township of Rockaway, 322 N.J.Super. 583, 731 A.2d 572 (1999). In this case, a township had a deed declared void because the property was sold without state approval as required by law. The insurer paid the insured, then sued the township to get back the purchase price. The township urged that "as between a public entity and a commercial title insurance company paid to search the public record, the public entity's position must be preferred as a matter of public record." The court was unmoved, saying "[t]he Township ignores its own failure to adhere to the law concerning a document to which it was party. This is more than mere inadvertence and more akin to a reckless disregard of facts within its actual knowledge. 'Disgorgement' is a necessary result of declaring the conveyance void. This is, essentially, an equitable action to quiet title and to make whole the parties who bore costs in connection with a void conveyance that would not have occurred but for the Township's ultra vires act. The proper goal is to restore every player to the position he would be in now but for that void transaction, as if it never occurred, which, in effect, it did not. ... To do any less in this case would unjustly enrich the Township, which has, in essence, always owned the property and had the use of Zibaee's initial purchase money for more than thirteen years."

[134] In Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. Wetzel, Ill.App. 5 Dist. No. 5-98-0429 (May 28, 1999) (unpublished), the sellers, the Wetzels, received $30,000 too much as proceeds at closing. The title insurer sued for unjust enrichment. The Wetzels argued that the insurer was precluded from recovering because of negligence. The court said: "[w]e will give this case all the analysis it deserves. The Wetzels are attempting to perpetrate a fraud. They have been unjustly enriched. The Wetzels' arguments to the contrary represent legal nit-picking and double-talk. Lawyers Title is subrogated to Magna Bank's claim and was properly awarded summary judgment. Also, when sellers were paid $65,000 too much at a closing, the insurer was permitted to have the debt declared non-dischargeable in the sellers' bankruptcy. The court found that the sellers' failure to inform the insurer of the existence of a mortgage to be paid off was a false pretense under § 523(a)(2)(A) of the Code. Technically, recovery was found not to be by subrogation, however, because the court recognized a direct cause of action by the insurer-escrowee against the seller for fraudulent concealment.[138]

The insurer has a right to be indemnified by the seller only if the seller's negligence is causal but the insurer's is not. As stated in Enright v. Lubow, the right of indemnity:

> ... enures to a person who, without active fault on his own part, has been compelled, by reason of some legal obligation, to pay damages occasioned by the initial negligence of another, and for which he himself is only secondarily liable.[139]

The following sections discuss the factors considered in determining whether the seller or the insurer should bear the ultimate loss. In California, an insurer was denied recovery against a trustee who conducted a non-judicial foreclosure sale without giving notice of the sale to the IRS as lien holder. The court found that the insurer, which had insured a grantee from the purchaser at sale, was not a party to whom the trustee owed a statutory duty. The trustee had obtained a trustee's sale guarantee, which did not show the lien. He also had no actual knowledge of the lien, which the court found precluded a claim against him for negligent misrepresentation.[140] restrictions that the court found to create a joint venture with the insured. When the insured sued for misrepresentation, the seller defeated the claim by having the seller's knowledge of the restrictions imputed to the insured. 597 S.W. 2d 425 (Tex.App. 1980), writ ref. n.r.e. (July 23, 1980) and reh'g of writ of error overruled Sept. 12, 1980 (Tex.App.-Forth Worth 1980). In 212 Marin Boulevard, LLC v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2019 WL 287215 (N.J.A.D.) (unpublished), the seller, Consolidated Rail Corporation, represented to the title insurer that no Surface Transportation Board approval was required for the abandonment of the rail line being sold to a private party, because it was not a main line. The court found that Conrail believed the statement to be true, so it was not made with the intent to deceive. Therefore, Conrail was not required to give back any of the purchase price, despite the fact that the insurer had paid the buyer the full $5,000,000 purchase price as a claim payment.

[138] In re Demarest, 176 B.R. 917 (Bkcy.W.D.Wash. 1995). Similarly, a seller's debt to a title insurer was nondischargeable when it resulted from a deed of trust that the seller intentionally failed to list on a lien affidavit presented to the insurer at closing. The insurer bought the debt from the lender and sued the seller on the note. The court found evidence of misrepresentation in the seller's admission that he knew that the title agent had made a "mistake" by not showing the deed of trust. The court found that the seller filed bankruptcy "so that the loss would ultimately fall on someone else." The intent to deceive and profit from it made the debt nondischargeable. In re Lett, 238 B.R. 167 (Bkcy.W.D.Mo. 1999), aff'd In re Lett, 2001 WL 43614 (8th Cir. (Mo.)) (Table) (unpublished).

5.9.1.1 Seller Created Or Knew Of Defect

When the seller created the title defect, the seller ordinarily will be required to indemnify the insurer.[141] If the other factors listed above are neutral or do not exist, the seller may also be required to reimburse the insurer for encumbrances not created by the seller but known to it.[142] In some other jurisdictions, the seller's knowledge must be such that a reasonably prudent person might not have conveyed title in the same fashion.[143]

5.9.1.2 Seller Would Reap Windfall

The seller also must indemnify the insurer when the seller would otherwise reap a windfall. This includes cases in which the title defect is a lien against the seller. In such situations, when the insurer pays off the lien, it is paying off a personal debt of the seller, leaving the seller with a windfall.[144] The insurer is not a mere volunteer in paying the lien, because the insurer's payment is a contractual obligation.[145]

5.9.2 Sellers' Defenses To Recovery

The seller may also assert one or more acts of the insurer to justify a position that the insurer should be the ultimate bearer of the loss. The seller must generally establish acts of commission by the insurer, on which the seller relied, and that the seller was damaged.

5.9.2.1 Insurer Error In Reporting Status Of Title

In almost every case, an insurer suing the seller on warranties has failed to report the title defect in question. The rare case is when the defect was not a plain miss but a "true" title risk such as forgery.[146] However, in states that embrace the idea of abstractor negligence on a title commitment, such abstractor negligence has been held to bar the insurer's equitable right of subrogation. This closely related issue is discussed at §5.9.2.4 below.

The insurer is not precluded from recovery simply because it failed to report the title defect or lien.[147] The insurer's subrogation right is not thwarted when the seller is unable to establish that the insurer could have discovered the issue by a search of the public records.[148] However, when the insurer's error created the title defect, the insurer's error may be deemed one of commission rather than omission, which can cause the insurer to bear the ultimate loss and preclude subrogation.[149]

Also, an insurer is sometimes estopped from collecting against a seller which obtained its title insurance from the insurer. When the sellers had also obtained a title commitment from the insurer at the time they purchased, which commitment contained the same error, the insurer was estopped to pursue the seller. The court found that the sellers had purchased the property in reliance on the title commitment.[150] However, a seller who took back a purchase-money mortgage was not permitted to block the insurer's recovery by asserting that the seller's loan policy also omitted the easement in dispute. The seller had himself granted the easement, and thus the primary obligation for the loss fell to him.[151]

[149] In Meridian Title Ins. Co. v. Lilly Homes Inc., 735 F.Supp. 182 (E.D.Va. 1990), the court denied the insurer subrogation because the defect in the conveyance was due to the fact that the title insurance commitment inaccurately stated which party was vested in title.

[150] Vining v. Chase, 410 So.2d 1 (Ala. 1981). "The only logical conclusion to be drawn from the Vinings' purchase of the initial title binder is that they wanted the assurance of a title expert that they had marketable title. The Court notes that Mississippi Valley, like any other title insurance company, holds itself out as an expert in the examination of real estate titles. In reliance on this expertise the Vinings retained Mississippi Valley to insure their title. Mississippi Valley certified to the Vinings that they had good title by the binder of July 2, 1975, which bore number J-20878." Similarly, when the purchaser-insured incorporated the commitment legal into the purchase agreement, and the title defect was discoverable with an accurate title search, one court reasoned that the insured may be estopped to sue for misrepresentation. The jury refused to find the seller liable, and the court would not overturn the verdict. Combs and Transamerica Title Ins. Co. v. Loebner, 814 P.2d 531 (Or.App. 1991).

[151] Harvey v. J & H Holdings Inc., 310 So.2d 371 (Fla.App. 1975). The court reasoned: "There is no question that the sellers should have had knowledge of the easement. The record shows it was the sellers who granted the easement… . The sellers also contend that the easement in issue was duly recorded among the public records and, therefore, the title insurer had constructive knowledge of its existence. It is apparent that the title insurer was put on constructive notice of the easement. As a consequence, it was negligent in not disclosing the existence of the said encumbrance to the buyer after it had examined the title. In cannot be said, however, that the title insurer owed the same duty to the sellers that it did to the buyer. Put another way, the sellers do not stand in the shoes of the buyer. We can find absolutely nothing in the record to indicate that the encumbrance, i.e., easement, supra, should be excluded from the operation of the covenant of the sellers to convey title by general warranty deed free and clear of all encumbrances. The sellers simply did not convey title to the property as they had agreed to do."

5.9.2.2 Reliance On Commitment In Warranting Title

Some courts have accepted as a defense to subrogation the argument that the seller relied on the insurer's title evidence in warranting title free of the defect that caused the policy loss.[152] Other courts have not accepted this defense.[153] To prevail in this defense, the seller must show actual reliance on the title commitment, and/or that the insurer consciously granted affirmative coverage.[154] The mere fact that the seller paid for the policy, as is customary in many jurisdictions, does not make the seller a third party beneficiary.[155] When a state follows the rule that a grantee may not pursue the grantor for breach of warranty unless the grantee has relied on the warranty to induce it to purchase the property, the insurer as subrogee must establish that the insured-grantee did so rely.[156]

Summit Plaza Associates*, 192 P.3d 465 (Colo.App. 2008) (seller did not rely on policy access coverage in warranting title); JV Properties, LLC v. SMR7, LLC, 2014 WL 7277393 (Nev.) (unpublished) (seller's covenant against encumbrances in a grant, bargain and sale deed not rendered unenforceable because buyer bought title insurance policy).

[154] In Transamerica Title Ins. Co. v. Johnson, 103 Wash.2d 409 693 P.2d 697, 700-1 (1985), the court said: "There is no showing, on this record, of reliance, damage or an expectation of a search and disclosure. This defendant knew of the assessments long before the plaintiff ever issued a preliminary commitment. When the defendant's agent ordered title insurance, the defendant had already listed the property subject to the buyer assuming the sewer assessment. The defendant's awareness and knowledge are evidenced by the deletion of the assumption requirement from the listing. Again, long before asking the plaintiff to insure title, the defendant had contractually agreed with its purchasers (the only insureds) to convey title free of the assessments. There is no showing that this defendant expected an 'abstract' of title or that even if it had, that it relied thereon in any manner. In fact, had the assessments been disclosed, the defendant would have had to pay them from the closing proceeds. The defendant is merely paying, through subrogation, that which it had knowledge of and had agreed to pay long before the plaintiff became involved." Similarly, in Welch Foods, Inc. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 341 Ark. 515, 17 S.W.3d 467 (Ark. 2000), the court upheld the insurer's right of conventional subrogation against a seller, saying that the seller had shown no reliance on the commitment and was not an intended beneficiary anyway: "Here, where the insurer is exercising express contractual rights of subrogation in a claim against one other than its insured and against one to which it owed no legal duty, or who demonstrated no reliance, equitable defenses are unavailing. Welch acknowledges that it was not a named insured on the title policy but argues that Chicago Title owed it a legal duty and breached that duty. … Clearly, our cases, and those of other jurisdictions, establish a duty on the part of title companies to make a reasonable search of the relevant records to detect clouds or defects in title. However, neither our courts, nor those of other jurisdictions, have held that that duty extends beyond those to which the company is contractually obligated, or to those shown to have reasonably relied upon the search. Welch also relies upon Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. Capp, 174 Ind.App. 633, 369 N.E.2d 672 (Ind.App. 1 Dist. 1977), but it, too, is quite different from the case at bar. In particular, the Capp court noted that the title insurance policy itself involved a tripartite agreement involving the vendor, vendee, and insurer. Moreover, Capp (the vendor) demonstrated reliance upon lawyers. In the instant case, Welch failed to show either contractual obligation or reliance."

[155] See §7.6 for a complete discussion of third party beneficiary claims. As to sellers specifically, see Wolff v. Commercial Standard Ins. Co., 345 S.W.2d 565 (Tex.Civ.App. 1961); Transamerica Title Ins. Co. v. Johnson, 103 Wash.2d 409, 693 P.2d 697 (1985). In Kenny v. Safeco Title Ins. Co., 113 Cal.App.3d 557, 169 Cal.Rptr. 808, 810 (Cal.App. 4 Dist. 1980), the court stated: "There is a contention by appellants that because they agreed to pay the premium on the policy of title insurance in the escrow as consideration for the sale that this would bootstrap their position and create a 'duty of care' on the part of the title insurer or render the agreement between the buyer and the title

In Boatright v. Texas American Title Co.,[157] the seller's payment of the premium was considered a factor in denying the insurer the right to recoupment against the seller. However, in Boatright, the insurer's agent breached a "fiduciary" duty to the seller as escrowee, and the agent had a special knowledge of the omitted lien because of its role as escrowee. This breach of duty and knowledge were imputed to the underwriter to cancel its right to pursue the seller.

5.9.2.3 Insurer's Drafting Of Deed

When the insurer drafted the deed creating the title defect, that negligence may be considered sufficiently "active" to deny the insurer indemnity against the seller. An insurer which drafts a deed assumes a duty to the seller separate from the title policy.

However, the deed drafting must itself have been a strong contributing factor in the loss for the insurer's recovery to be denied. When the seller had created the easement at issue, the mere fact that the insurer later drafted the seller's deed did not erase the seller's duty to indemnify.[158]

5.9.2.4 Abstractor Negligence Of Insurer

A seller may also assert a retaliatory cause of action against the insurer for abstractor negligence, if the commitment was inaccurate.[159] Some courts take the view that an insurer is not insurer a third party beneficiary contract for benefit of appellant. Appellant would still be an incidental beneficiary and, as such, have no cause of action against respondents." Independent Settlement Services, LLC v. Lewis, 296 F.Supp.3d 194 (D.D.C. 2018) (title agent forced to buy loan it had closed because it failed to get insured deed of trust recorded received judgment against borrower under note; borrower's assertion that he paid for title insurance policy found to be irrelevant).

[156] Illinois has adopted this rule. In Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. Bass, 31 N.E.3d 444, 391 Ill.Dec. 768, 2015 IL App (1st) 140948 (Ill.App. 1 Dist. 2015), the insurer paid a loss and sued the grantor to the insured for breach of warranty. The court held that, because the insureds were not induced to purchase the property by the seller's warranty deed, the breach of warranty claim failed. The facts in Bass were highly unusual, and involved a tax sale. A Texas court rejected the identical argument, that a "reliance" element should be made a condition to recovery for breach of warranty, in Romero v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2015 WL 348870 (Tex.App.-Amarillo 2015) (unpublished). In that decision, a Texas appeals court enforced the title insurer's right to sue the seller for breach of warranty, as subrogee of its insured.

[158] Harvey v. J & H Holdings, Inc., 310 So.2d 371 (Fla.App. 1975).

[159] For example, in Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. Capp, 174 Ind.App. 633, 369 N.E.2d 672 (Ind.App. 1 Dist. 1977), the court upheld a judgment denying an insurer recovery against a seller, saying that the trial court may have construed the settlement paid by the insurer as settlement of a claim against it for abstractor negligence. The court apparently assumed that a seller in Indiana has a valid cause of action as a third party beneficiary for abstractor negligence in the issuance of a title commitment. Capp was effectively overturned by Puente v. Beneficial Mortgage Co. of Indiana, 9 N.E.3d 208 (Ind.App. 2014), which held that a title insurer could not be denied the right of subrogation based on the assertion that it had been negligent in the way in which it insured title. In Transamerica Title Ins. Co. v. Johnson, 103 Wash.2d 409 693 P.2d 697 (1985), the court refused to the seller to assert such a defense. The court prudently recognized that there are far-reaching consequences in recognizing abstractor negligence on a title commitment, and then extending such a cause of action to a seller as a third party beneficiary. It stated "the record is devoid of any evidence, factual or empirical, of the practices, intentions, expectations or consequences of adopting or rejecting the various theories of liability or nonliability. In absence of a full adversary review of such evidence, caution is warranted when considering a departure entitled to the equitable remedy of subrogation when it has been negligent.[160] In First American Title Ins. Co. v. Haggins,[161] the court resorted to abstractor cases to deny an insurer its contractual subrogation rights:

> Where an imperfect title search has been performed and relied upon by a lender, equity will not reward such negligence by applying the doctrine of subrogation in favor of the negligent party. [citing State v. Jones, 61 Ohio St.2d 99 (1980) and Ft. Dodge Bldg. & Loan Ass'n v. Scott, 86 Iowa 431 (1892), both abstract cases] To do so would encourage carelessness. ... [W]here one's own negligence precipitates a loss, a court may apply the precepts of equity to deny subrogation.[162]

Such a rule would ordinarily result in unjust enrichment of the seller. In acknowledgment of this, the Haggins court emphasized that the seller had introduced evidence that it had paid off the mortgage which was the subject of the warranty claim. If so, the court found, it was the lender which was unjustly enriched, by being paid a second time by the title insurer.

A closely related issue is whether or not the insurer's abstractor negligence precludes the insured from asserting equitable subrogation to step into the shoes of a paid-off lienholder. Those cases are discussed at §15.2.

5.9.2.5 Insurer's Escrow Negligence Or Defalcation

The insurer's recovery against a seller may be prohibited by the insurer's escrow or closing negligence or malfeasance. For example, when the seller's deeds of trust were not paid off because the closer took the money, and the closer was approved by the insurer "to act as its special counsel in the matter,"[163] the insurer was precluded from suing on the seller's warranties.[164] from long established precedent." 693 P.2d at 700. The identical conclusion was reached in Calamari v. Grace, 98 App. Div.2d 74, 469 N.Y.S.2d 942 (1983).

[160] In Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. MHD Corp., 2010 WL 4157301 (Ohio App. 6 Dist.), 2010-Ohio-5174 (unpublished), an Ohio court denied an insurer's right to sue the seller for breach of warranty, saying "[i]n order to entitle one to subrogation, his equity must be strong and his case clear. …Where an imperfect title search has been performed and relied upon by a lender, equity will not reward such negligence by applying the doctrine of subrogation in favor of the negligent party."

[161] 1998 WL 32776 (Ohio App. 8 Dist.), rev.den. 82 Ohio St.3d 1434, 694 N.E.2d 982 (1998) (unpublished).

[163] Jacobs v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 709 F.2d 3 (4th Cir. 1983). The insurer had apparently issued a closing protection letter to the lender, although the opinion does not so state. See Chapter 14 regarding the interpretation of the assurances under the closing protection letter.

[164] The Jacobs court found that the closer, an attorney, was counsel for both buyer and seller (and perhaps lender). In addition, however, it found the closer to be the insurer's "special" counsel. The court felt that the insurer and lender were in a better position to "monitor" the closer, and thus became equitably estopped from shifting the liability back to the seller.

5.9.2.6 California Deed Of Trust Defenses

In California, an insurer seeking to pursue a seller for personal liability on a note after buying out an insured deed of trust may be barred by the statutory requirement that the insurer first pursue security rather than persons in recouping a loss.[165] Also, the insurer may be prohibited from suing the seller if the insured deed of trust is considered "purchase money."[166]

5.10 Indemnities--Recoupment On

Insurers sometimes commit to protect an insured against a risk based on an indemnity[167] given to the insurer by a party other than the insured. In most situations, the indemnitor is the seller or borrower. Construction lien indemnities are sometimes given by the general contractor. Recoupment on an indemnity is not by subrogation, since the indemnity is given directly to the insurer to induce it to issue an insurance coverage. Construction lien indemnities are further discussed at §5.10.2.

5.10.1 Asserting Rights Under Indemnities

The claim administrator will typically investigate whether or not an indemnity was provided to the insurer to assume a known risk. If one has been signed, it is a common custom to have the original indemnity delivered to the claim administrator for safekeeping.

The claim administrator will want to read the indemnity to see if it is secured by cash or other collateral. If so, the collateral should be located, and the indemnity reviewed as to the conditions

[165] Code of Civil Procedure § 726. In Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. Dedmore, 2014 WL 4354663 (Cal.App. 1 Dist.) (unpublished), California's one-action or anti-deficiency law was applied to preclude a title insurer from collecting from the owners on the note after the insurer bought the loan and reconveyed the property in order to resolve the claim under the loan policy. In Dedmore, the insurer did not make a credit bid and did not assert in the reconveyance that the debt had been paid or discharged, resulting in a distortion of the law.

[166] This defense is based on Code of Civil Procedure § 580(b), which prohibits deficiency judgments on purchase money deed of trust loans.

[167] The term indemnity is used consistently in this text because it is the most common and descriptive term. An indemnity may also be termed a hold harmless agreement, undertaking or indemnity bond. An example of fairly standard indemnity language is found in the instrument at issue in Bell v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 494 N.E.2d 997, 998-9 (Ind.App. 1991), which read:

"This agreement by and between [parties], witnesseth that:

"Whereas Second Party has been requested to issue a policy or policies of title insurance covering the title to the following described real estate, to wit:

[Legal description], and,

"Whereas said title is subject to the following defects, objections and/or encumbrances, to-wit:

under which the collateral may be used by the insurer. The collateral should be kept in an account or place beyond the indemnitor's control. This avoids the possibility that the indemnitor will find a way to convince the bank to release the funds or other collateral to the indemnitor.[168] See §5.10.3 below regarding indemnity collateral.

The insurer should give the indemnitor notice that the risk for which the indemnity was taken has ripened into a claim. If the indemnity obligates the indemnitor to defend an action and one is pending, the insurer may wish to tender defense to the indemnitor. Two issues normally come up regarding defense: choice of counsel, and control of the litigation. If by state law the insured has its choice of counsel, but the indemnity allows the indemnitor to choose counsel, the indemnity will be of little use. Therefore, most indemnities drafted by insurers take control away from the indemnitor. If the indemnity has been favorably drafted, the insurer's notice will merely identify the counsel chosen for the insured, and advise that the attorney's statements will be sent for payment on receipt.

The insurer typically advises the indemnitor of the status of the claim. The insurer may elect to encourage the indemnitor to settle the matter. If the insurer gets into settlement negotiations, it will normally keep the indemnitor informed as well as time permits. Notice avoids the argument that the insurer settled as a volunteer.

[168] Ransom Distributing Co. v. Lazy B., Ltd., 39 Colo.App. 137, 561 P.2d 1276 (Colo.App. 1977), provides a sobering example of an indemnitor who got back his collateral to the insurer's harm. A developer gave an indemnity against a judgment secured by money. The money was deposited at the indemnitor's bank. When the developer appealed its judgment, the insurer was induced to write the court agreeing to be surety on appeal. When the developer lost the appeal, the creditor asked for the money. The bank refused to release it, because it had taken the escrowed funds as collateral for a new loan to the developer. The insurer was required to pay out the entire judgment, plus costs and interest. The court did allow that the insurer "may have" an action against the developer or the bank.

5.10.2 Enforcement Of Indemnities And Affidavits

FORM 68, Appendix A
Demand on indemnitor

Title insurers frequently provide assurances to their insureds based on protections from others. The two most common such inducements are indemnities and affidavits. An indemnity is a contract, and all rules regarding construction of contracts apply.[169] The insurer must bring an action on an indemnity within the applicable limitations period.[170] Insurers take various types of affidavits from sellers, borrowers and others. The insurer is entitled to sue the maker of a false affidavit that was given to induce the insurer to assume an unknown risk.[171]

The indemnitor may raise a number of defenses when the insurer seeks to enforce it.[172] The [172] First American Title Ins. Co. v. Lyons, 2012 WL 1307086 (Cal.App. 5 Dist.) (unpublished) held that an indemnitor's false statement in the escrow instructions that title was free of liens was not an exercise of free speech, and action by insurer-escrowee for damages caused by the false statement was not barred by California Civil Code § 425.16, the anti-SLAPP action statute. In a later decision in the same suit, the court held that the insurer's recovery against the indemnitor was not barred by its alleged failure to conduct an adequate title search. First American Title Ins. Co. v. Lyons, 2014 WL 3697248 (Cal.App. 5 Dist. 2014) (unpublished). In Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. NWJ Investment Fund, IV, LLC, 2013 WL 1500446 (S.D.Ind.) (unpublished), the court enforced an indemnity against the individual who signed it despite his protest that he had intended to sign it as an officer of the entity that owned the property, and rejected his argument that the indemnity was not enforceable because it was not signed by the insurer, although there was a signature block for the insurer on the instrument. In Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. Warner, 2011 WL 2708708 (N.D.W.Va.) (unpublished), later decision at 2013 WL 2403597 (N.D.W.Va.) (unpublished), a mechanic lien indemnity signed at closing was held to cover liens that were filed after closing, despite the indemnitors' protest that they intended only to protect against lien rights that existed on the closing date. In First American Title Ins. Co. v. Howell, 2017 WL 3763997 (La.App. 1 Cir. 2017) (unpublished), the court found the sellers liable to the insurer for losses it paid based on their false claim of ownership of 520 acres in an owner's affidavit, and rejected the sellers' claim that the insurer had a duty to indemnitor may assert that no consideration was given for the indemnity, but the consideration is the inducement to insure. For example, when the seller gives an indemnity, the insurer's protection of the insured buyer allows the seller to close the transaction when otherwise the buyer would refuse to close due to the title issue. In one unusual case, however, the insurer premised its protection against a quiet title suit on the payment of an additional premium equal to the likely cost of litigation. It apparently obtained the indemnity from the seller without explanation of its effect (and possibly by subterfuge). The insurer was found to have received the bargained-for consideration when it collected the premium; the indemnity was held void for lack of consideration.[173] Similarly, when the insurer also received additional premium for the risk, and the indemnitor was not aware of the legal effect of the indemnity, the agreement was void for lack of consideration to the indemnitor.[174] Also, when subcontractors and suppliers signed indemnities in favor of the insurer, the indemnities were held void when the indemnitors' checks which induced the indemnitors to sign did not clear.[175] An indemnity is not a waiver or release, and an insured who gave an indemnity to the insurer is not barred from making a claim against the insurer.[176]

An indemnitor may also claim that an indemnity given to the title insurer is void as having been obtained by duress. Given the insurer's role of third party stakeholder in a competitive free market, it is difficult to imagine the circumstances under which a title insurer would have the leverage to obtain an indemnity by duress or coercion. Rather, it is the other parties to the transaction that may have the right to obligate the seller or borrower to give an indemnity to induce the insurer to provide coverage to its insured. The duress defense was rejected when the only pressure applied to the seller was the buyer's insistence on closing the transaction under their contract. The court observed mildly that it "is never duress to threaten to do that which a party has a legal right to do."[177]

As with other contracts, the indemnity is construed against the drafter.[178] Most indemnities at [177] Daniels v. Botts Abstracting Co., 2000 WL 1862124 (Tex.App.-Austin) (unpublished). In Daniels, the indemnity was not given to induce the insurer to protect against a title defect. Rather, the seller had engaged in so much litigation and delaying tactics to avoid selling the property that the insurer and title agent refused to close the transaction unless the seller indemnified them in advance. The court found that the indemnity was merely to facilitate the buyer's lawful insistence on closing, and the insurer did not overreach in its request.

least start out as standard forms prepared by the insurer which will be construed against the insurer. When the indemnitor drafted the entire agreement or the provision at issue, however, an ambiguity is construed against the indemnitor.[179]

The indemnity controls as to the conditions under which the indemnitor must pay. An indemnity usually describes the title defect for which it is given. This description is typically the same as the title exception in the commitment. Most indemnities require the indemnitor to reimburse the indemnitee for attorneys' fees and litigation expenses that it incurs, in addition to the cost of removing the lien or other matter that is the subject of the indemnity.[180]

Some decisions have held that an indemnity given as part of a comprehensive agreement is rendered unenforceable if the insurer breaches its concomitant duties and thereby increases the risk to the indemnitor.[181] However, other decisions have held that a construction lien indemnitor may not assert as a defense the claimed negligence of the insurer in disbursing the construction loan money, because such a defense would negate the primary assurance on which the insurer relied in giving policy coverage.[182] An indemnitor also may not escape liability for construction liens paid by the insurer on the theory that the insurer erred in determining that the policy provided coverage against the liens.[183]

[179] See Overmyer v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 32 Md.App. 177, 359 A.2d 260 (1976) and Fifth Third Bank v. Attorneys' Title Guaranty Fund, Inc., Case No. 03 C 4926, USDC N.D. Ill. (June 28, 2007). In the latter case, a handwritten addition to an indemnity prepared by the indemnitor's attorney was construed against the indemnitor.

[180] In Overmyer v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 32 Md.App. 177, 359 A.2d 260 (1976), the title defect was a judgment. The indemnity recited the judgment's amount and terms in the same manner as an exception on Schedule B. The indemnitor argued that the stated sums capped his liability. The court rejected the argument, holding that he had indemnified against the judgment, which necessarily included all sums needed to fully satisfy it. In First American Title Ins. Co. v. Spanish Inn, Inc., 239 Cal.App.4th 598, 191 Cal.Rptr.3d 22 (Cal.App. 4 Dist. 2015), the court held that the indemnitor was required to pay litigation expenses as well as the cost of removing the liens which were the subject of the indemnity.

[181] For example, in U.S. Life Title Co. of Ariz. v. Bliss, 150 Ariz. 188, 722 P.2d 356 (Ariz.App. 1986), escrow instructions required the insurer to break escrow only when it had received word that the buyer's check had cleared. The insurer broke escrow on receipt of a certified check, which turned out to have a forged certification. A general indemnification in the escrow from the seller was negated by the insurer's breach of instruction. The Bliss decision rested in part on Royal Properties Inc. v. Arizona Title Ins. & Trust Co., 13 Ariz.App. 376, 476 P.2d 897 (Ariz.App. 1970), which held that "the indemnitee is not entitled to be compensated for losses occasioned by its own wrong unless the indemnity agreement expresses such intention in clear and unequivocal terms."

[182] In Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co. v. Historic Ivy Tower, LLC, 2014 WL 3799607 (Minn.App.) (unpublished), the court rejected the argument made by construction lien indemnitors that the indemnity was void because the insurer increased their exposure when it negligently "advance[d] funds without performing its duties and obligations under the Disbursing Agreements," such as collecting appropriate waivers of lien. It relied on cases holding that an allegation of negligence by the indemnified party is not a defense to enforcement of an indemnity contract.

[183] In Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. Ali Properties 1, LLC, 2015 WL 1612097, 2015 Il App (1st) 123301-U (Ill.App. 1 Dist. 2015) (unpublished), the court rejected the indemnitor's argument that it should not be liable under the indemnity to reimburse the insurer because the company had misinterpreted the policy coverage and paid liens that it was not obligated to pay. Similarly, in First American Title Ins. Co. v. Spanish Inn, Inc., 239 Cal.App.4th 598, 191 Cal.Rptr.3d 22 (Cal.App. 4 Dist. 2015), the court upheld judgment in favor of a title insurer against mechanic's lien indemnitors for

The indemnitor may also claim that the insurer wrongly settled the subject of the indemnity without the indemnitor's consent.[184] The indemnitor may not enforce a consent provision if the indemnitor would have had no basis to refuse consent, if asked.[185] See §5.8.3 for the related subject of the volunteer defense as asserted when the insurer is pursuing subrogation rights.

Insurers often take indemnities as security for the granting of construction lien coverage, either before the project is started or before any lien has been filed. The indemnity typically will specify what action the owner or contractor indemnitor must take if a construction lien is filed. Such indemnities and affidavits are enforceable in contract. When a developer indemnity required that the indemnitor post a bond or obtain a release of any construction lien, and the developer failed to do so, the court ordered specific performance on the indemnity.[186] One defense that the construction lien indemnitor may raise is that its indemnity was not intended to protect against the particular lien that was filed.[187]

Also, insurers commonly accept owner and/or contractor affidavits stating that no work has been done within the lien period, or that all subcontractors and suppliers have been paid for any lienable work. When construction projects are ongoing and are being disbursed by the insurer or its agent, the insurer receives contractor affidavits with each draw request stating that the identified parties are the only ones who have provided labor or materials and, thus, hold lien rights. Such affidavits typically contain indemnity provisions in favor of the insurer. An insurer may sue an affiant that provided a false affidavit and to enforce any attendant indemnity.[188] A false affidavit also the money it paid to remove the liens and the attorneys' fees it incurred in defending the insured, finding that the indemnitors had not proven that the insurer should have denied the claim on the ground that the liens fell under Exclusion 3(a).

[184] In Bell v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 494 N.E.2d 997 (Ind.App. 1991), the indemnity protected against "[a]ny judgment or decree entered in a suit for specific performance." The insurer settled the claim without notice to the indemnitor, which the court held to bar the insurer's right to recover from the indemnitor. The court said that the insurer deprived the indemnitor of the ability to obtain a dismissal of the action against herself at the same time, causing her substantive harm. Also, the court construed the indemnity against the insurer as drafter.

[185] In Liberty Steel Co. v. Guardian Title Co. of Houston Inc., 713 S.W.2d 358 (Tex.App. 1986), and Bell v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 494 N.E.2d 997 (Ind.App. 1991), the courts found that the insurers voided the indemnities by failing to get the indemnitors' consent to settlements, because that consent was required.

[186] Ticor Title Ins. Co. v. Middle Street Office Tower & Associates, Inc., 768 F.Supp. 390 (D.C. Maine 1991).

[187] In Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. Ali Properties 1, LLC, 2015 WL 1612097, 2015 Il App (1st) 123301-U (Ill.App. 1 Dist. 2015) (unpublished), the court found that the title insurer had the right to use money deposited under a title indemnity to pay mechanic lien claims, despite the owner-indemnitors' argument that the indemnity was not supposed to cover the liens because they were for work done for a tenant. In Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co. v. Norton, 2005 WL 3540833 (Cal.App. 4 Dist.) (unpublished), the court found the indemnitor liable under the indemnity for protecting against the construction lien filed, including the cost of defending the foreclosure action, even though the indemnitor was both a member of the owner entity and the general contractor that filed the lien.

[188] See Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co. v. Norton, 2005 WL 3540833 (Cal.App. 4 Dist.) (unpublished) (indemnitor liable under indemnity protecting against construction liens, including cost of defense of insured, even though indemnitor was both member of owner entity and owner of general contractor that filed lien; signing of indemnity found not to be an unconstitutional waiver of the indemnitor's lien rights). A contractor's lien indemnity may or may not be supports a fraud claim.[189] If the affidavit violates a deceptive trade practice act, the insurer may collect interest and attorneys' fees.[190] However, an officer of a corporation was found not to be personally liable for fraud based on a lien waiver that contained the false representation that all subcontractors had been paid, when the officer did not personally sign the waiver.[191]

When a construction lien has been filed before the policy is issued, a title insurer will sometimes provide coverage to a party (typically a lender) based on a construction lien indemnity. Such indemnities are typically secured by money deposited with the insurer, but also provide that the indemnitor must reimburse the insurer for any amount it must pay in excess of the deposited sum to obtain the release of the lien.[192] See §5.10.3 for a further discussion of disputes over the money deposited to secure an indemnity.

5.10.3 Indemnity Collateral Disputes

When an indemnity is secured by collateral, typically the insurer is given the right to use the collateral to satisfy the title defect in its sole discretion. This is an important provision of the indemnity, because the insurer has obligations to its insured(s). The insurer's course of action should not be dictated by the desires of the party who put up the collateral. If the indemnity states that the insurer may use the collateral without notice to the depositor, no notice is required.[193] If the deposit of funds is governed by any other agreement in addition to the indemnity, the documents should be entirely consistent in their terms and stated purposes.[194]

[190] Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. Simonetti, 1993 WL 408062 (Conn.Super. 1993) (unpublished). The title insurer was ruled to be entitled to collect the attorney fees expended in pursuing the indemnitor, due to his dilatory tactics, in Collard & Roe, P.C. v. Klein, 2003 WL 22132868 (Conn.Super.) (unpublished). The court rejected the indemnitor's claims that the indemnity was obtained by duress and coercion.

[191] Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. Fisher, 2007 WL 2413068 (4th Cir. (N.C.)) (unpublished).

[192] In First American Title Ins. Co. v. Dundee Reger, LLC, 2016 WL 1359374 (N.D.Ill. 2016) (unpublished), a title insurer insured over a construction lien based on a secured indemnity and the deposit of a certain amount of money. The indemnity provided that the indemnitor was required to reimburse the insurer for any amount it would have to pay for a release of the lien in addition to the deposit amount. The insurer obtained a release of the lien, which cost more than the deposit amount. The court held that the indemnitor was required to pay the balance to the insurer.

[193] Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co. v. Leidner, 169 A.D.2d 699, 564 N.Y.S.2d 187 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept. 1991); First American Title Ins. Co. v. Dundee Reger, LLC, 2016 WL 1359374 (N.D.Ill. 2016) (unpublished). However, in Bell v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 494 N.E.2d 997 (Ind.App. 1991), the insurer settled the claim without notice to the indemnitor, which the court held to bar the insurer's right to recover from the indemnitor. The court said that the insurer's settlement without notice deprived the indemnitor of the ability to obtain a dismissal of the action against herself at the same time, causing her substantive harm.

[194] In 1616 Reminc Limited Partnership v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 778 F.2d 183 (4th Cir. 1985), for example, an indemnity was taken for construction liens on a troubled project. Three separate documents were executed:

An indemnity typically provides that the money held as collateral may be used to defend the insured against the defect or lien for which the insurer provides an assurance in exchange for the taking of the indemnity. The insurer may use the money for all expenses it incurs in defending the insured against the indemnified matter, as well as its own expenses in a dispute with the indemnitor.[195] However, if the funds may not be sufficient to satisfy all claims and expenses, the insurer may elect in prudence not to seek reimbursement from the funds until the indemnified matter is resolved.[196]

If an indemnitor is failing financially, other parties may come after money or other collateral being held to secure the indemnity, just when the insurer most needs the collateral. These attacks may take several forms. First, the indemnitor may take the money or pledge it to another creditor contrary to the terms of the indemnity.[197] Second, the indemnitor's bankruptcy trustee may assert a claim to the money. Finally, other creditors of the indemnitor may seek to garnish or otherwise seize the collateral. This section will deal with the latter two issues.

An issue sometimes arises as to whether or not money that secures an indemnity is the property of the indemnitor's bankruptcy estate. The bankruptcy trustee is charged with laying claim to all legal or equitable interests of the debtor in property, wherever located, as of the date the case is commenced.[198] Funds given to an insurer as its protection in giving insurance coverage should not be considered property of the debtor unless the risk for which the indemnity was given has expired. State law dictates in determining ownership of property in bankruptcy cases.[199] In the typical secured an agreement, an escrow agreement, and an indemnity. The indemnity was given by the owner to allow the insurer to give lien coverage to the lender. The insurer at least implicitly acknowledged its willingness to at least share in the expense of removing the liens. Later, the owner and insurer fought about who was entitled to the money. Although according to the escrow agreement the insurer was entitled to the money, the court found that the agreement superseded the escrow. The insurer was allowed to deduct its litigation expenses, but the owner got the balance of the funds.

[195] In Fifth Third Bank v. Attorneys' Title Guaranty Fund, Inc., Case No. 03 C 4926, USDC N.D. Ill. (June 28, 2007), the court held that the insurer had the right to use the money which secured the indemnity to remove the liens at issue, and was not fettered by the indemnitor's claimed right to dispute the liens first. The court also approved a substantial award of attorneys' fees to be paid by the indemnitor. In Hopper v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 2014 WL 1989689 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), the court affirmed the insurer's right to deduct about $30,000 from the indemnity fund to pay its fees in defending an action brought by the indemnitor to demand the return of the money.

[196] In West Suburban Bank v. Attorneys' Title Ins. Fund, Inc., 326 Ill.App.3d 502, 761 N.E.2d 346, 260 Ill.Dec. 502 (Ill.App. 2 Dist. 2001), the indemnity provided, "In case of litigation involving the fund or the rights of any person or corporation hereunder, the cost, expense and attorney's fees of the company may be paid or retained by the company out of the fund." This provision would appear to allow the insurer to deduct its fees. When there was litigation about the indemnity, the court put the request to deduct funds in abeyance until the entire matter was resolved.

[199] "Our inquiry must begin with state law for the Bankruptcy Code does not provide rules for deciding whether a debtor has an interest in any particular property. 4 Collier on Bankruptcy, ss. 541.-02[l] (L. King 15 ed. 1985). The nature and extent of the debtor's interest in property are determined by state law. Id. Property rights under section 541 are defined by state law. Butner v. United States, 440 U.S. 48, 55, 99 S.Ct. 914, 918, 59 L.Ed.2d 136 (1979). However, once indemnity, the only money that may later be returned to the indemnitor is the excess after payment of the lien, and any accrued interest. One court thus determined that an equitable trust existed on behalf of the indemnitor as to any money in excess of that needed to pay off the mortgages for which the indemnity was taken. The court held that, "while we agree with the district court that the entire fund is technically property of the estate, we cannot agree that the debtors' interests in the main fund are unlimited."[200] The court ordered that any excess after payment of the mortgages, and any accrued interest, be paid to the estate.

Creditors sometimes attempt to levy on or garnish money being held in escrow[201] or held as collateral for an indemnity to the insurer-escrowee. As with the cases cited above involving bankruptcy, the question is quite simply "Whose money is it?" Generally, money held in escrow is considered unavailable for garnishment or levy. One court reasoned:

> Although we are cited no Michigan authority as to whether money in escrow can be reached by garnishment, several other states have taken the position that it cannot. … In that case, the plaintiff creditor attempted to attach $1,000 which the judgment debtor had placed with his attorney. The debtor-client had instructed the attorney to pay over the $1,000 to a swimming pool contractor in settlement of previous unrelated litigation, if and when the contractor corrected allegedly faulty workmanship in the debtor's swimming pool. The court noted that the condition under which the money was to be turned over to the swimming pool contractor had not been met at the time of the garnishment. The court held that the test of the right to garnishment is whether the client could bring suit for return of the money, and that since there had been no showing negating the continued validity of the escrow, the client could not have demanded a refund, and therefore the fund was not subject to attachment at the hands of the clients' creditor.
>
> The same rationale applies in the case at bar. Honey Brook [the escrow party] could not have reached the escrowed funds,[FN2] except for the limited purpose of paying the holders of mechanics' liens upon receipt of a discharge or settlement with them. Therefore we hold that the funds held in escrow could not be attached by the plaintiff... .
> [FN2] Had the terms of the escrow been completed or aborted, a different result would be very likely.[202]

[201] In National Title Agency LLC v. JPMorgan Chase Bank, NA, 429 P.3d 758, 2018 UT App 145 (Utah App. 2018), a creditor of a title agency successfully garnished the title agent's escrow account. The court found the bank not liable to either the title agency or its customers for having handed over $600,000 of trust account money to the creditor without approval from the title agency.

[202] City Bank & Trust Co. v. Kwaske Bros. Constr. Co., 69 Mich.App. 271, 244 N.W.2d 443 (1976).

Any such question should be avoided if the escrow agreement or indemnity states that the money is the property of the insurer while held for the stated purpose, or that the insurer is the sole or primary beneficiary. Funds held by a title insurer to secure an indemnity and delivered from loan proceeds are not the property of the lender, and the insurer is not obligated to turn over the money to the lender while still at risk for the lien for which the indemnity was taken.[203]

Collateral held by an insurer as security for an indemnity is not held in escrow. Rather, the collateral is either the property of the insurer while held by it, or is held under a security agreement.[204] However, once the purpose of the indemnity is completed, the money securing the indemnity is the property of the indemnitor.[205] A standard-form Chicago Title Insurance Company Agreement With Deposit to Protect Against Defects in Title (secured indemnity) was at issue in In re LDM Development Corp.[206] After depositing cash with the insurer under the indemnity, LDM gave the Larsons a security interest in the money to secure a loan. In its bankruptcy, LDM disputed the Larsons' claim to the money, arguing that the funds were held in escrow, rendering their pledge invalid. The court rejected the argument, characterizing the secured indemnity as a security agreement, not an escrow. Further, the court relied on case law to the effect that money held under a security agreement may not also be held in escrow. Thus, the Larsons were found to have a junior pledge of the cash.

[203] West Suburban Bank v. Attorneys' Title Ins. Fund, Inc., 326 Ill.App.3d 502, 761 N.E.2d 346, 260 Ill.Dec. 502 (Ill.App. 2 Dist. 2001). In this case, a title insurer held money to protect against a broker lien. The lender sued the broker to release the lien, then demanded the money securing the indemnity. The order releasing the broker lien was overturned, and the court held that the insurer was entitled to keep the money because the bank's security was in the assurance received from the title company, and it needed the money to make good on that assurance: "...Attorneys' Title issued a title insurance policy to West Suburban Bank insuring West Suburban Bank first priority on its loans to the new buyer/Hotko. Clearly, Attorneys' Title would not have issued title insurance and would not have established the indemnity fund containing only $52,500 if it knew that West Suburban Bank would claim rights to the fund for liens that it had already released. Accordingly, West Suburban Bank is estopped from asserting any rights to the indemnity fund."

[204] Confusion on this issue is common, and sometimes is augmented by the insurer's wording of the form indemnity. In Mehlman v. Dollinger, 674 N.Y.S.2d 37 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept. 1998), the court held that, under an escrow created to allow an insurer to protect against a title defect, the insurer was permitted to pay attorney fees incurred in defending only the insured against the title defect, and was not permitted to use the funds to defend any other party. What the court characterized as an escrow was really a title indemnity secured by funds. Most title insurers' indemnity forms explicitly permit the insurer to draw on the deposited funds for defense of all insureds, present and future.

[205] In Hopper v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 2014 WL 1989689 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), the court held that a borrower who gave a secured indemnity to protect against an unreleased deed of trust was required to do something to remove the instrument in order to get his money back, not merely offer legal argument as to why the lien was probably not enforceable. Because the indemnitor sued the insurer for refusing to give back the money, the insurer was also entitled to deduct its defense costs from the money deposit. In In re Heartland Steel, Inc., 2003 WL 21766588 (S.D.Ind. 2003) (unpublished), the court said: "the language of the Escrow Agreement … support[s] the conclusion that Heartland Steel maintained a legal and equitable interest in the Escrow Funds. Heartland Steel had an interest in the income the Escrow Funds generated and … in any unused portion of the Escrow Funds. Moreover, if Heartland Steel had decided it no longer needed title insurance relative to the Mechanic's Liens, the Title Company would have returned the Escrow Funds to Heartland Steel's possession. Bascon and Lewis were not parties to the Escrow Agreement, and under no scenario did they have an interest in the Escrow Funds."

A construction lien claimant not named in an indemnity agreement was not a third party beneficiary entitled to pursue a claim against the indemnitor in lieu of collecting on its lien or judgment.[207]

5.11 Recoupment Against Bankruptcy Debtors

An insurer may assert a subrogation claim against a bankruptcy debtor. Contractual or conventional subrogation rights are codified in Section 509 of the Bankruptcy Code. One court noted that Section 509 of the Code sanctions conventional, not equitable subrogation:

> The concept of equitable subrogation is a well recognized principle of equity jurisprudence. ... Equitable subrogation is a creation of equity, not statute and should not be confused with the subrogation rights specifically set forth in section 509.[208]

That court permitted the insurer to pursue the mortgagor by subrogation, under the terms of the note and mortgage, for the attorney fees the insurer had incurred in defending the insured mortgage. Still, the right to subrogation does not depend on the Bankruptcy Code, but is an equitable principle enforceable in the context of bankruptcy proceedings.[209] An insurer may pursue an equitable subrogation claim against a bankruptcy debtor although Section 509 does not specifically sanction that remedy.

The Code generally offers the debtor a discharge of debts, in furtherance of the purpose of the Code in giving the debtor a fresh start. However, the discharge privilege under Section 727 is not available when the debtor obtained money by false statements, fraud, theft or similar conduct. Thus, for example, 11 U.S.C. § 523(a) provides that the obligation is non-dischargeable if the debt is:

> (2) for money, property, services, or an extension, renewal, or refinancing of credit, to the extent obtained by—embezzlement, or larceny ... .

The Code creates a fairly high burden of proof for establishing conduct that renders a debt nondischargeable.[210]

Thus, the bankruptcy Code offers several bases on which to have debts declared to be non-dischargeable when the debtor provided a false affidavit or indemnity, stole closing money, or otherwise obtained money by fraud in connection with a real estate closing or secured loan. Insurers take various types of affidavits from sellers, borrowers and others.[211] The maker of a false title-related affidavit is liable to an insurer that was induced to give coverage in reliance on its false statements, and such liability is ordinarily not dischargeable in bankruptcy.[212] The reliance

[210] In Bullock v. BankChampaign, N.A., 133 S.Ct. 1754, 185 L.Ed.2d 922 (2013), the United States Supreme Court held that, to establish defalcation under 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(4), a creditor must show that the debtor was a fiduciary and that he or she consciously disregarded or was willfully blind to "a substantial and unjustifiable risk" that his or her conduct would violate that fiduciary duty. Bullock was applied in In re Colson, 2013 WL 5352638 (Bkcy.S.D.Miss.) (unpublished), which found that the title insurer had met the threshold, and declared a debt owed by an agent to a title insurer to be nondischargeable. In In re Moses, 547 B.R. 21 (Bkcy.E.D.N.Y. 2016), the court said that a title insurer did not establish an exemption from discharge as to a lawyer who arranged improper transfers of property that caused title losses, although a state court judge had held that the lawyer had perpetrated a fraud and had committed fraud on the court.

[212] See In re Demarest, 176 B.R. 917 (Bkcy.W.D.Wash. 1995). In In re Dallam, 850 F.2d 446 (8th Cir. 1988), the court said "[w]e conclude that Lawyers Title produced evidence establishing fraud and a nondischargeable debt under 11 U.S.C. § 523(a)(2): Dallam obtained payment of her business' debt by knowingly making a false statement in order to induce Lawyers Title to rely on it, and Lawyers Title's reliance on the statement caused it to lose money. The lower courts erred in holding the complaint should be dismissed." Similarly, a seller's debt to a title insurer was nondischargeable when it resulted from a deed of trust which the seller intentionally failed to list on a lien affidavit presented to the insurer at closing. The insurer bought the debt from the lender and sued the seller on the note. The court found evidence of misrepresentation in the seller's admission that he knew that the title agent had made a "mistake" by not showing the deed of trust. The court found that the seller filed bankruptcy "so that the loss would ultimately fall on someone else." The intent to deceive and profit from it made the debt non-dischargeable. In re Lett, 238 B.R. 167 (Bkcy.W.D.Mo. 1999), aff'd In re Lett, 2001 WL 43614 (8th Cir. (Mo.)) (Table) (unpublished). In re Looney, 453 B.R. 252 (6th Cir. BAP (Tenn.) 2011) held that an owner who lied on an affidavit delivered to the title insurer at closing, swearing that all subs and suppliers had been paid on a newly-constructed home, was not entitled to be discharged on the debt he owes for the mechanic liens later filed and paid by the title insurer. In Davidson v. Investors Title Ins. Co., 2008 WL 4426142 (W.D.N.C.) (unpublished), an attorney's false statements about title were sufficient to prevent the discharge in bankruptcy of his debt to the title insurer that relied on those statements. Also, in Sousa v. Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 2008 WL 302391 (Bkcy.D.N.J.) (unpublished), when the borrower lied on a lien affidavit by failing to disclose a judgment against herself, and then lied again on her bankruptcy schedules by failing to list the title insurers who had since taken an assignment of the judgment to protect their insureds, the combined falsehoods thwarted the debtor's discharge of the debt. The court quoted a decision which said that "a debtor cannot, merely by playing ostrich and requirement of Section 523(a)(2)(B) may be met by proof that the insured lender relied on the borrower-debtor's false statements.[213] Section 523(a)(6) of the Code applies when the debtor deliberately and intentionally injures the creditor by a willful and malicious act.[214] Section 727(a)(3) of the Code also states that the debtor is not entitled to a discharge of a debt discharge when he or she has:

In In re Livingston, 368 B.R. 610 (Bkcy.E.D.Mich. 2007), affirmed in 2010 WL 1404530 372 Fed.Appx. 613 (6th Cir. (Mich.) 2010) (unpublished), a title insurer bought two mortgage loans that the sellers failed to disclose at closing and got a judgment against them based partly on fraud. The sellers were found not to be entitled to a discharge of the judgment debt in bankruptcy, even though the judgment was premised only partly on fraud. In In re Baxter, 2010 WL 3447625 (Bkcy.E.D.Mo.) (unpublished), borrowers who drew on a line of credit after closing although they knew that the loan was to have been paid off and the mortgage satisfied at their refinance closing, were guilty of intentional conduct that prevented the discharge of the loan debt in bankruptcy, after the title insurer bought the loan. The insurer carefully proved how the borrowers used fraud to parlay the closing mistake rather than correcting the error. In Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. Vasquez, 2010 WL 1487997 (Bkcy.D.Conn.) (unpublished), a title company employee who deceived her employer into insuring title on the sale of her house without paying off the second mortgage was found not entitled to a discharge of the debt in bankruptcy. In In re Chesson, 2012 WL 4794148 (Bkcy.M.D.N.C.) (unpublished), the court held that the insurer had established under § 523(a)(2)(B) of the Code that a developer was not entitled to a discharge after having given the insurer a false mechanic lien affidavit. In In re Vermilio, 457 B.R. 863 (Bkcy.M.D.Fla. 2011), a borrower who gave the wrong loan number to the escrowee, so that a loan on a different parcel was paid off, and who quickly closed on a home equity loan on the released parcel before the insurer and lender discovered the problem, was found not to be entitled to a discharge for the loan debt. In In re Levasseur, 482 B.R. 15 (Bkcy.D.Mass. 2012), a borrower who sold her house and paid off her home equity loan at closing, but later drew the full amount of the loan when she realized that the bank had mistakenly not closed the account, was not entitled to a discharge of the debt in bankruptcy. In In re Pazdzierz, 718 F.3d 582 (6th Cir. (Mich.) 2013), a title insurer that took an assignment of a loan to resolve a policy claim was permitted to stand in the lender's shoes to sue the borrower for fraud, and the debt was found nondischargeable in bankruptcy. In In re Speisman, 495 B.R. 398 (Bkcy.N.D.Ill. 2013), the title insurer prevailed in an adversary proceeding to declare the debt of the borrower nondischargeable under Section 523(a)(2)(A), for loan money obtained by "false pretenses, a false representation, or actual fraud," when the debtor gave a false lien affidavit that induced the title insurer to provide insurance that, in turn, induced the lender to make the loan to the debtor. In In re Fakhuri, 583 B.R. 915, 65 Bankr.Ct.Dec. 168 (Bkcy.N.D.Ill. 2018), the court held that a seller's failure to disclose a judgment lien on a gap affidavit, when that judgment was recorded in the title search gap, was a false representation making the debt to the insurer non-dischargeable in bankruptcy under Code section 523(a)(2)(A).

However, when an element for nondischargeability is lacking, the debtor will receive a discharge of the debt.[216] The creditor must bring an adversary proceeding to have the debt declared non-dischargeable within the time permitted by the court order or rule, and its failure to do so within the permitted time causes the debt to be discharged and allows the debtor to avoid the lien under Section 522(f) of the Code.[217]

Insurers often take indemnities as security for the granting of construction lien and other coverages. The indemnity may specify what action the owner or contractor must take when a construction lien claim is made. In addition, insurers rely on owner and/or contractor affidavits. Owner's affidavits are used to assure the insurer that all workmen have been paid. Contractor affidavits are supplied with each draw and state that the named parties are the only ones who have [215] In In re Brandenfels, 2015 WL 5883317 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 2015) (unpublished), aff'd 692 Fed.Appx. 461, 2017 WL 2547301, a title insurer took a money judgment against a borrower after buying a junior lender's loan to solve a title claim. When the borrower filed a bankruptcy petition, the court held that the debt was not dischargeable in bankruptcy because the debtor had violated Section 727(a)(3) by hiding money from the insurer to avoid garnishment and by intentionally keeping incomplete financial records to disguise the money trail.

[216] See In re Wassef, 2006 WL 2417271 (Bkcy.D.N.J.) (unpublished), in which a woman who gave a false affidavit of no judgments was found entitled to a discharge of the debts because the people who accepted the affidavit should have known better. Also, when the seller concealed a mortgage debt but did not make a written misrepresentation on an affidavit, she was entitled to a discharge (and to keep the money). In re Davis, 376 B.R. 66, 2007 WL 2815990 (Bkcy.D.Mass. 2007). Further, in United General Title Ins. Co. v. Jordan, 2008 WL 1746737 (Bkcy.M.D.Ala.) (unpublished), sellers who deliberately did not pay off their mortgage loan when they sold their home, because the title insurer missed the lien, and then filed bankruptcy, were willful and malicious, two of the elements for non-dischargeability of the debt. However, the title insurer, as assignee of the loan, was not able to prove the third element, injury to the lender, precisely because the insurer paid off the loan. In In re Koosyial, 2016 WL 106507 (Bkcy.E.D.Tex. 2016) (unpublished); companion decision, 2016 WL 107199 (unpublished), the court held that a seller-borrower's loan debt was dischargeable despite the fact that the borrower signed a no-lien affidavit at closing. The court said the title insurer could not establish that it had relied on the affidavit because it had failed to discover in its title search the recorded mortgage that caused the title policy loss. Also, the debtor testified that he did not knowingly make a false statement, because he believed the debt was not secured by the real estate. In In re Casali, 547 B.R. 263 (Bkcy.N.D.Ill. 2016), the court ruled that the debtor was entitled to a discharge of his debt to his refinancing first lender caused by the debtor's failure to close his junior lien equity loan account as promised. Construing Code Section 523(a)(2)(A), for money obtained by "false pretenses, a false representation, or actual fraud," the court said that the refinancing bank "did not justifiably rely" on the debtor's promise to close the loan account but, rather, the lender was "unbelievably careless in not protecting its interest in obtaining a first lien." In In re Moses, 547 B.R. 21 (Bkcy.E.D.N.Y. 2016), the court said that a title insurer did not establish an exemption from discharge, when the debtor lawyer had arranged improper transfers of property that caused title losses. The court allowed the debt to be discharged although a state court judge had held that the lawyer had perpetrated a fraud and had committed fraud on the court.

[217] In re Savino, 558 B.R. 1 (Bkcy.Mass. 2016) (when title insurer did not seek to have debt declared non-dischargeable within time set by court, it had no right to object to debtor's request to reopen case to avoid the attachment lien for that debt under Section 522(f)).

done work. The giving of an affidavit containing false statements about liens or other title matters will preclude discharge of the debt.[218] However, under certain circumstances, such debts have been found to be dischargeable.[219]

A title insurer may also seek to have a debt declared non-dischargeable under a variety of other circumstances in which the debtor caused the insurer to incur a loss due to the debtor's theft of money, fraud, hiding of assets, false representations or embezzlement.[220]

[218] See In re Dallam, 850 F.2d 446, 449 (8th Cir. 1988), quoted and relied on in In re Barber, 95 B.R. 684 (Bkcy.W.D.Mo. 1988), which also found that a false construction lien affidavit rendered the debt non-dischargeable. "Misappropriation of funds held in trust denies discharge for the debt, when the creditor shows (1) that the trust relationship and its legal source exist; and (2) that the creditor can identify the trust funds, if they are commingled." In re Goldberg, 932 F.2d 273 (3rd Cir. 1991). A corporate officer responsible for disbursing funds to laborers and materialmen was found to have defalcated when he failed to pay funds held in trust, and the debt was found non-dischargeable in his personal bankruptcy, in In re Baird, 22 C.B.C.2d 1598 (9th Cir. B.A.P. 1990). A contractor who falsified figures on sworn statements and lien waivers was not entitled to a discharge in bankruptcy for the debt, with the court finding that the only possible explanation was that he intended to defraud the lender, in In re Christensen, 2005 WL 1941231 (Bkcy.N.D.Ill.) (unpublished). The Christensen court used plain language in denying the discharge: "[T]he schoolyard excuses he offers--"nobody said I couldn't," "everyone else does it"—will not wash. This is a fraud case, not a contract matter in which the loan documents are relevant. … Christensen offers no evidence of such a practice, and the contention itself—that it is generally accepted for contractors to submit false statements and lien waivers and for lenders to accept them—is ludicrous." In Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. Roberts-Dude, 497 B.R. 143 (S.D.Fla. 2013), a borrower who failed to list a deed of trust on a lien affidavit for the sale of the house was found not to be entitled to a discharge of the debt to the title insurer that paid off the loan, despite her argument that the insurer did not justifiably rely on the affidavit because it could have located the lien in the public records. See also the companion decision of Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. Dude, 708 F.3d 1191 (10th Cir. (Colo.) 2013), which found the same affiants liable for misrepresentation by concealment of fact in the affidavit. The two courts differed in their rulings about justifiable reliance.

[219] In In re Pitt, 121 B.R. 493, 21 Bankr.Ct.Dec. 116 (Bkcy.E.D.Va. 1990), the court permitted the discharge of the debt on the regrettable theory that the insurer-escrowee knew enough facts that it should have anticipated the fraud. It held that, because the insurer-escrowee was aware that the contractor signed affidavits in blank at the beginning of the project, and that "the company was having difficulty paying the jobs," the insurer should have expected the affidavits to be false. The court did not explain why the insurer's "knowledge" should benefit the contractor by allowing it to have the debt discharged. In a second case, a contractor who admitted that he lied when signing an affidavit claiming that all subcontractors and suppliers had been paid was still entitled to a discharge in bankruptcy, because there was "no evidence" that he made the statement with the intent to deceive. In re Oxley, 2007 WL 2407266 (Bkcy.D.Kan. 2007) (unpublished).

[220] In United General Title Ins. Co. v. Karanasos, 561 B.R. 316 (E.D.N.Y. 2016), the court held that a title agency owner's large debt to the insurer, caused by a policy claim, was not dischargeable in bankruptcy because the debtor fraudulently transferred his residence to his wife within a year of the bankruptcy filing and falsely failed to list in his schedules a lawsuit brought by the insurer to overturn the conveyance. In Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. Santa Cruz (In re Santa Cruz), 2014 WL 2615344 (W.D.Ky.) (unpublished), the debtor orchestrated a loan fraud scheme but only his wife signed the note. The insurer solved the title claim by taking an assignment of the loan. The debtor listed the loan debt in his petition. The insurer succeeded in having the loan debt declared nondischargeable based on the covenant to pay the debt given by the debtor in the mortgage. In Attorneys' Title Guaranty Fund, Inc. v. Wolf (In re Wolf), 519 B.R. 228 (N.D.Ill. 2014), the court held that an insured was not entitled to a discharge in bankruptcy for his debt to a title insurer that had to pay off his mortgage loan after a state court determined that the insured owner had obtained title by fraud and forgery. In Conestoga Title Ins. Co. v. Patchell (In re Patchell), 569 B.R. 635 (Bkcy.Md. 2017), the court said that the owner of a title agent was entitled to have her debt to her underwriter discharged in bankruptcy, even though it emanated from a lien on her personal residence, because the title agent believed her lender had agreed to release its lien. 5.12 Taking Property Rights As Salvage

An insurer may be entitled to a conveyance from the insured of the insured property, or an assignment of the insured mortgage and note, after the insurer has paid a claim of loss. This is known as the right of salvage.

Salvage is distinct from subrogation. Subrogation permits the insurer to stand in the insured's shoes to make a claim against a third party. For example, subrogation may permit the insurer to sue the seller based on deed warranties. To permit subrogation, however, the insured does not have to deed the land to the insurer. See §5.4 regarding the use of the insured's name in a suit by subrogation. One decision found that the subrogation provisions of the policy do not apply to salvage rights.[221]

In most cases, the insurer has a right of salvage only if the insurer and insured agree to resolve the claim by "cashing out" the insured. For an owner, the insurer will typically pay the insured the fair market value of the property unencumbered by the title defect. As to a lender, salvage is normally based on the fair market value of the debt. Thus, salvage value often is not the same as the actual loss due under the policy. One treatise states: "It has been held that the insurer may either pay the actual loss suffered or pay the full loss suffered, that is, the price of the property and receive the property as salvage."[222] For example, in Rancher's Life Ins. Co. v. Banker's Fire & Marine Ins. Co.,[223] the court recognized the insurer's right to purchase a mortgage loan as salvage if it wished. The insurer was thus permitted either to pay actual loss based on a "with and without encumbrance" analysis ($2,800), or buy the insured mortgage and debt as salvage for the amount due on the note ($3,467.80 plus interest).

Insurers must be careful to distinguish subrogation rights, salvage rights, and the right to clear title. In Summonte v. First American Title Ins. Co.,[224] a judgment lien encumbered all of a new subdivision. The insured had contracted to improve the subdivision, then sell it back to his sellers.

Southern Title Ins. Corp. v. Syed Rizwan Mohiuddin (In re Mohiuddin), ___ B.R. ___, 2017 WL 2123870 (Bkcy.S.D.Tex.-Houston 2017) (permanent citation not yet available), the treasurer of a title agency who knew of and participated in transactions in which liens were not paid off at closing was found not to be entitled to have the $8 million debt to the title insurer discharged in his bankruptcy.

[221] "The subject policy expressly provides that American shall be subrogated to the rights and remedies of the plaintiffs in the event it removes the title defect. That right has been recognized in many cases. E.g., Sandler, supra. American would expand the subrogation rule to require the plaintiffs to surrender their lots in return for clearing title; it claims that this is necessary to permit its pursuit of all rights and remedies of the plaintiffs against the Radostis and Franklin Stephen Construction Company. The position is unacceptable. It is not supported by any known theory of subrogation." Summonte v. First American Title Ins. Co., 436 A. 2d 110, 118 (N.J.Super.Ch. 1981). The contract also provided that the insured would help sell the lots, and share in commissions. When notified of the claim, the insurer bought the judgment, then demanded that the insured sell the land to the insurer and assign the resale contract to it. The court held that this was a misapplication of the notion of salvage, so overreaching that it breached the insurer's obligation of good faith dealings with its insured.[225]

On the other hand, salvage is a right, not a duty. The insured may not require the insurer to purchase the land or mortgage debt to resolve the claim. See the cases cited under §3.4, regarding the right to clear title, and in §3.4.5 as to final determination of loss, in which insureds have attempted to insist that the insurer purchase the property or the insured mortgage loan rather than exercise the right to clear title.

The insurer that buys a debt for its salvage value becomes the holder of the debt with all or most of the ramifications of being a creditor. The insurer assumes a creditor-debtor relationship with the borrower. The asset administrator may even be subject to the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, even though his or her employer is a title insurer and not an independent debt collection company.[226] When the insurer takes an assignment of the insured mortgage loan, however, it is not uncommon for the borrower to assert that some error by the insurer estops it from collecting the debt. In Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. Mertens,[227] for example, the insurer missed a senior federal tax lien against the owner. When the insurer bought the loan, the owner claimed that the insurer:

> ... should be barred since it obtained the assignment of the note from HRC as a result of paying a claim on the title policy due to its negligence in failing to discover the tax lien. Appellant [owner] claims that had respondent [insurer] performed the title search properly, appellant would not have received the loan from HRC, and subsequently, would not owe on the note. Respondent contends that it is not seeking indemnity for its own negligence, but rather is attempting to recover as an assignee of a promissory note.[228]

The owner even claimed that he lost his "equity" in his home because his own undisclosed tax lien prevented him from selling the property. The trial court in Mertens was apparently beguiled by this reasoning, because it instructed the jury to consider the insurer's "comparative fault." The appeals court was not so confused, however, and struck down that part of the verdict. It stated:

[225] "The proposition advanced by American to its insureds is backward and absurd. It would use its obligation to remove the judgment lien as a club permitting it to acquire title and capture profits resulting from its insured's efforts in improving and selling the lots. This is entirely beyond the expectations of the insured. It is not permitted by any provision in the policy and is a significant breach of American's obligation to deal with its insureds in good faith." *Summonte v. First American Title Ins. (unpublished), a title agent that allegedly paid off judgments that were not the seller's debts, but which were against people with names similar to his, was found not to be liable under the debt-validation provisions of the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act.

> Appellant waited until he reaped the full benefit of the loan and now attempts to argue that the loan should never have been approved in the first place. To allow appellant to reap the benefit of the loan without repaying it would be unjust.[229]

The insurer should consider the possibility of taking salvage rather than paying a claim of loss when there is a realistic chance that it can recover more than the full amount it pays, including the additional money the insurer spends to purchase the asset. The most common such case is when the insurer is already liable for policy limits, and the value of the asset is a small fraction more than that sum.

Before taking real estate as salvage, the insurer must consider the same matters that any other purchaser of property must review. The following checklist is intended as a guide to the investigation the insurer will typically make. There may be additional actions warranted, depending on the circumstances.

1. Review the property for the risk of environmental clean-up costs and/or premises liability (unfinished construction projects, for example).

2. Obtain an accurate title search or commitment to insure, to check for liens and encumbrances.

3. Determine what permits, zoning changes or other regulatory hurdles have to be overcome in order to purchase and resell the property.

4. Get a realistic quick-sale (not fair market) valuation of the property.

5. Decide how the company would sell it. For example, choose a broker and have the broker tour the property to evaluate exposure time and price.

6. Analyze the carrying costs for the estimated holding time (taxes, insurance, any mortgage debt payments, repairs, fix-up expenses) and the closing costs (broker's commission, transfer tax, other costs of sale).

7. Calculate the estimated net proceeds from a quick sale, after deducting the costs listed at 1 and 6 above. If this net is more than the increase of the salvage cost over the actual loss, it is worth it to salvage the asset. If the net will be less than the extra sum required to buy the asset rather than pay the loss, it will not normally be worth it to pursue salvage.

[229] 878 S.W.2d at 902.

Once the insurer takes title, it must manage the property. The insurer must take numerous steps, which the claim administrator or recoupment specialist should plan in some detail before title is transferred. These actions typically include the following:

1. Have premises liability insurance in place as of the date of transfer.

2. Change the locks immediately.

3. Secure the property if vacant. Shut off all unneeded water and utility service and winterize if necessary.

4. Arrange for basic services, such as grass mowing, snow removal and security.

5. If there are tenants on the property, hire a property manager. Have a notice sent to each tenant as to the change in management and ownership.

6. Pay off liens to stop the interest clock and/or prevent foreclosure.

7. Take steps to sell the property. Sign a listing contract if you will use a broker.

8. Inspect the property to determine if repairs are needed before showing the property.

9. Take whatever action is required by company policy to have the property listed as a company asset for record-keeping and accounting purposes.

10. Solve the title defect. If it is insoluble or not yet solved when a listing contract is signed with a broker, make sure it is adequately disclosed on the listing contract and will be properly represented to prospective purchasers.

11. If the title defect still exists, determine how the matter will be treated in the listing contract, purchase agreement, and title commitment to be issued.

5.13 Reinsurance, Coinsurance, Excess Insurance And Letters Of Indemnity

Title insurers or insureds may sometimes recover policy losses from third parties in ways that are not discussed in the preceding sections of this chapter or in Chapter 17. The four main avenues of recovery are a reinsurance treaty or contract, a coinsurance contract, a liability policy issued to a title insurer and a letter of indemnity issued by one insurer to another.

Some title insurers have granted reinsurance treaties in favor of other title insurers. Such treaties often come into being to allow an insurer with smaller capital and claim reserves to write insurance policies having higher policy limits. There is no standard reinsurance treaty. All provisions are a matter of contract between the parties. Under such a treaty, the reinsurer agrees to accept liability for losses incurred on policies issued by the ceding insurer above a certain dollar amount.

Typically, the threshold is set either based on the amount of the loss or the policy. A typical reinsurance treaty automatically covers all policies issued by the ceding company that meet the reinsurance threshold. The premium paid by the ceder to the reinsurer may be based on policy volume, aggregate insurance coverage or similar measures, and is typically paid monthly or at other regular intervals. The treaty describes the risks that may not be ceded without the reinsurer's consent or independent title examination and underwriting, the ceding company's duty to give notice to the reinsurer of a potential loss, the method by which any claims are administered and paid, and the respective duties of both insurers in adjusting losses. A treaty may permit the insured to have direct access to the reinsurer to submit a claim, although such a provision is not typical.

A title insurer will also sometimes enter into a reinsurance contract with another insurer. A reinsurance contract, as opposed to a general reinsurance treaty, concerns a single policy. A reinsurance contract is typically used when the amount of the policy to be issued exceeds the insurer's self-imposed maximum policy liability amount, the insurer's statutory retention limit as set by its state of domicile or the state in which the risk is written, or the liability limit imposed by the customer. Life insurers and other large institutional lenders have traditionally imposed conservative limits on the per-policy risk amount they will accept from any one title insurer. The title insurer is required by that customer to obtain one or more reinsurance contracts from other title insurers to cover the amount of the policy above the self-imposed, statutory or customer-imposed risk retention limit.

Since 1961, American Land Title Association has promulgated ALTA Facultative Reinsurance Agreements, in order to foster uniformity in such reinsurance contracts. The current ALTA agreements were adopted on October 16, 2008. The previous versions were adopted on June 17, 2006. The term "facultative" means simply that the agreement applies to a specified transaction, as opposed to being a general treaty.

There are two versions of the standard ALTA reinsurance agreement, which are denominated as being with and without direct access. The direct access provision refers to the right of the insured to make a claim directly to the reinsurer.[230] Under a reinsurance contract that does not contain a direct access provision, the insured may only submit its claim to the ceding company; the ceder is the only party having a direct contractual right against the reinsurer(s). Direct access is very important to the insured if the ceding company becomes insolvent.[231]

[230] Paragraph 3 of the 2008 ALTA direct access reinsurance agreement states in relevant part: "Provided Insured shall give to Reinsurer notice of any claim under the Policy within a reasonable time after notice of the claim is given to or received by Ceder and is pursuing its remedies under the Policy against Ceder, unless prevented by law or regulation, then in the event that under the terms of the Policy Insured has sustained a loss or losses which, in the aggregate, exceeds Ceder's Primary Loss Risk, the liability of Reinsurer under this Agreement shall be extended to and in favor of Insured. Failure to so notify as provided in this paragraph shall not defeat the rights of the Insured hereunder unless Reinsurer shall establish that it was actually prejudiced by the failure, and then only to the extent of the prejudice. Thereafter, if Insured requests payment of Reinsurer's liability under this Agreement directly to Insured, then this Agreement may be enforced by Insured directly against Reinsurer to the extent of Reinsurer's liability to Ceder hereunder, without diminution, defense, setoff or counterclaim which Reinsurer may have against Ceder. Any defense to liability which Ceder has against Insured shall inure to Reinsurer." The first ALTA reinsurance agreement containing a standard direct access provision was promulgated in 1985.

[231] Paragraph 6 of the ALTA direct access reinsurance agreement states, in relevant part: "In the event of the ALTA has also drafted a Tertiary Facultative Reinsurance Agreement. Under that form of agreement, the ceder retains a portion of the risk, ceding risk at a level above the retained amount to one or more secondary insurers, and the secondary insurers cede the balance of the risk above their retained amounts to third tier (tertiary) insurers.

There has been very little litigation over reinsurance treaties or contracts.[232]

An insured can also request coinsurance rather than a reinsurance contract. The term "coinsurance" is used in the title insurance business to mean the simultaneous issuance of more than one policy, by different insurers, to the same insured for the same parcel.[233] Each policy amount is for a portion of the property's value, with the aggregate of policy amounts equaling its value. Each coinsurance policy contains an endorsement tying the policies together. The American Land Title Association has adopted the ALTA 23-06 Coinsurance Endorsement for this purpose.

Title insurers follow differing practices in how they underwrite coinsurance policies. In simplest terms, the tradition followed in the Eastern states is for each insurer to separately search and examine title, while in the Midwest and other regions of the country it is more common for the insurers to agree that one company will conduct the search and examination and the others will rely on that work in giving the policies. Under the latter system, the insurer that conducts the search and examination is termed the lead coinsurer.

Another source of recovery that can be available to an insurer for liability it has sustained is an insurance policy that it obtains from another insurer. All or some title insurers carry some form of general liability insurance or excess liability insurance. There is no standard insurance contract of insolvency of Ceder, the reinsurance under this Agreement shall be payable by Reinsurer directly to Ceder, pursuant to Section 4 or to its liquidator, receiver or statutory successor, except when the direct access provisions of Section 3 and the notice provisions of Section 4 have been implemented, in which case, it shall be paid directly to Insured."

[232] Some years ago, a reinsurance treaty between Fidelity National Title and Intercounty National Title led to a protracted series of lawsuits. See Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. Intercounty Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 161 F.Supp.2d 876 (N.D.Ill. 2001) and the related decisions discussed at §17.8.3. A more recent dispute involving a reinsurance contract, under which First American ceded risk to at least Old Republic and Stewart Title, has caused the issuance of a series of non-dispositive orders. In one decision, the Florida court held that First American as ceder owed a duty of good faith to the reinsurers in its underwriting of insurance risks, and may be sued for negligence as well as breach of contract by the reinsurers that allege that it took improper risks, apparently especially as to construction liens. Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2015 WL 1349817 (M.D.Fla.) (unpublished). A later decision in the same dispute permitted the consolidation of two suits brought by different reinsurers in two states. Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2015 WL 1393134 (S.D.Tex.) (unpublished). Later, the court ruled on a motion to dismiss First American's claims against Stewart Title, the main point of which was the assertion that Stewart Title had refused in bad faith to pay under the reinsurance contract. Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2015 WL 3605192 (M.D.Fla.) (unpublished). There has been litigation over whether or not certain reinsurance treaties violate the Real Estate Settlement Procedures Act, when the reinsurer is a customer of the title insurer. See, for example, Gerhart v. Beazer Homes Holding Corp., 2009 WL 799256 (E.D.Cal.) (unpublished), in which the court dismissed a class action suit against a large home builder, in which the plaintiffs claimed that a reinsurance treaty between the builder's subsidiary and a title insurer was a disguised kickback. Such RESPA litigation is beyond the scope of this treatise.

[233] This use of the term coinsurance is not related to the so-called coinsurance provision of the ALTA title insurance policies, which states that the amount of insurance coverage is prorated under certain circumstances and is discussed at §3.2.3.3.

this type. The insurance policy typically runs in favor of the insurer only. Such a policy may or may not overlap with or insure any risk related to insurance policies issued by the title insurer.[234]

Finally, it is very common for one title insurer to issue a letter of indemnity to another title insurer to protect against an identified risk having to do with a particular parcel. A title insurer issues such a letter when it has issued a policy that is currently in effect and another insurer has been asked to insure a new transaction and has discovered a title risk that has not been cleared up of record, but which is not excepted in the existing policy. The indemnifying title insurer is willing to protect the new title insurer against the risk based on its assumption (or verification) that the recorded matter, such as an unreleased mortgage, is no longer a viable defect or encumbrance. The insurer thus assumes only a small risk in issuing such a letter.

Although there is no standard form of letter of indemnity, all or most versions state that the indemnifying insurer's liability is no greater than the amount of its existing policy. Most letters require the new insurer to give immediate notice to the indemnitor of any claim that would trigger coverage, and permit the indemnifying insurer to adjust that claim.

The indemnifying title insurer has two additional incentives to issue a letter of indemnity. First, all title insurers desire to receive similar letters in exchange in the future from other insurers. Second, the title insurer has the concern that its refusal to indemnify might cause the new title insurer to recite an exception that a buyer or lender might claim renders the title unmarketable. Such a marketability claim could convert a flyspeck or curable title defect into a lost contract or loan, and cause the existing title insurer to pay a loss.

The issuance of letters of indemnity is an ancient practice.[235] However, the volume of such letters has greatly increased since the 1990s. In some states, if not all, every title insurer spends a terrific amount of labor in investigating, requesting and issuing letters of indemnity. In certain states, the title insurers have entered into indemnity treaties, which recite the conditions under which each member insurer will be deemed to have indemnified any other member insurer against a risk on its existing policies. Also, in recent years, the most common reason for the issuance of a letter of indemnity has been a mortgage that is not released of record by the lender despite the fact that the loan was paid in full. Title insurers in many states have succeeded in obtaining laws that permit them to release paid-off mortgages, as is further discussed in §13.5.1. These laws allow the title insurer to cure the unreleased mortgage in conjunction with the issuance of a letter of indemnity, or in lieu of one.

[234] In Travelers Indemnity Co. of Connecticut v. Attorney's Title Ins. Fund, Inc., 194 F.Supp.3d 1224 (M.D.Fla. 2016), affirmed by 733 Fed.Appx. 524 (Mem), a title insurer settled a lawsuit emanating from a major title insurance policy claim, under which it assigned its rights under its two general liability insurance policies to the other parties. The court ruled that the carriers had no duty to indemnify the title insurer, because both policies contained exclusions for issues arising out of the handling of title insurance claims.

[235] See Sugarman v. Fraser, 71 Misc. 416, 128 N.Y.S. 718 (N.Y.A.D. 1911), in which it was reported that Lawyers Title requested a letter of indemnity from Title Guarantee Company, because Title Guaranty had "previously passed the same title," and the issuance of the letter "would preclude further delay" in closing the sale, in which the buyer had objected to title.

6 Title Insurance Commitment

6.1 Commitment As Offer Of Insurance

A title insurance commitment is also known as a preliminary title report or title binder. The phrase title insurance commitment is used in the ALTA forms, and in this treatise for the sake of consistency.

The 2006 ALTA commitment form stated that its sole purpose was to serve as an offer of insurance.[1] The 2016 ALTA Commitment for Title Insurance displays that fact much more prominently.[2] The following appears at the beginning of the first page of the commitment:

> NOTICE
>
>
> THIS COMMITMENT IS NOT AN ABSTRACT OF TITLE, REPORT OF THE CONDITION OF TITLE, LEGAL OPINION, OPINION OF TITLE, OR OTHER REPRESENTATION OF THE STATUS OF TITLE. THE PROCEDURES USED BY THE COMPANY TO DETERMINE INSURABILITY OF THE TITLE, INCLUDING ANY SEARCH AND EXAMINATION, ARE PROPRIETARY TO

---

[1] Condition 4 of the 2006 ALTA title insurance commitment said explicitly: "This Commitment is a contract to issue one or more title insurance policies and is not an abstract of title or a report of the condition of title. Any action or actions or rights of action that the proposed Insured may have or may bring against the Company arising out of the status of the title to the estate or interest or the status of the mortgage thereon covered by this Commitment must be based on and are subject to the provisions of this Commitment."

[2] The 2016 ALTA Commitment for Title Insurance was adopted on August 1, 2016. It replaces the 2006 form ALTA commitment, which ALTA decertified as of August 1, 2018. At the same time, ALTA decertified the Plain Language Commitment Form (6-17-06) and the Short Form Commitment (10-16-08).

> THE COMPANY, WERE PERFORMED SOLELY FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE COMPANY, AND CREATE NO EXTRACONTRACTUAL LIABILITY TO ANY PERSON, INCLUDING A PROPOSED INSURED.
> THE COMPANY'S OBLIGATION UNDER THIS COMMITMENT IS TO ISSUE A POLICY TO A PROPOSED INSURED IDENTIFIED IN SCHEDULE A IN ACCORDANCE WITH THE TERMS AND PROVISIONS OF THIS COMMITMENT. THE COMPANY HAS NO LIABILITY OR OBLIGATION INVOLVING THE CONTENT OF THIS COMMITMENT TO ANY OTHER PERSON.

The article published by ALTA about the 2016 commitment explained this notice as follows:

> The Forms Committee also recognized court decisions holding title insurers and agents liable for negligence or negligent misrepresentation in the preparation of title insurance commitments. The committee approached this particular issue by including a bold-face "Notice" at the top of the form and incorporating it into Condition 3(a). The Notice specifically precludes third-party liability and underscores that the procedures utilized to determine the insurability of the title are proprietary to the company and create no liability to any person outside the terms of the Commitment. A company may continue to separately provide abstract or search reports if it chooses.[3]

The issue of abstractor negligence and negligent misrepresentation claims based on a title insurance commitment or policy is fully discussed in Chapter 15.

A title insurance commitment is an offer to the proposed insured named in Schedule A to insure the title to the property identified in Schedule A (or Schedule C, when used), subject to the matters recited on Schedule B-II (property-specific exclusions to coverage) and upon fulfillment or removal of the requirements and conditions listed on Schedule B-I.[4] Most states that have considered the issue have held that a title insurance commitment does not also serve as an abstract of title or a representation of the state of title. Some states have held that a title insurance commitment is or may be such a representation. See §15.12 for a state-by-state discussion of that subject.

In most states, the statutory framework for title insurance and modern decisions interpreting [4] See Lawyers' Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Kelly, 132 N.Y.S. 721 (Sup.Ct.App.Div. 1912), stating that a commitment is not an enforceable contract; that the issuer "expressly assumes no liability, except under a policy to be issued thereafter;" and that the commitment "is a mere offer or application, which ripens into a contract only when the conditions of the offer have been met." In 1500 Viewsite Terrace, LLC v. Pickford Escrow, Inc., 2017 WL 4309755 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), the court cited numerous decisions that explain that an insurance binder is an offer of insurance; that it recites the most important terms of the policy to be issued; and that it "gives temporary protection pending the insurer's investigation of the risk and issuance of a formal policy." The court held that the title insurance commitment was an offer of insurance that merged into the policy, when issued.

the commitment have held that a title insurance commitment is not an abstract of title or title search.[5] As a California court noted, that state has codified by statute the purpose of a commitment (there called a preliminary report):

> Insurance Code sections 12340.10 and 12340.11 make "clear that no reliance may be placed on a preliminary report or a policy of title insurance to show the condition of title." (Cal. Title Insurance Practice (Cont. Ed. Bar Supp.1988) § 2.11, p. 14.) "A preliminary report is not an abstract of title. It only reflects the terms under which the insurer is willing to issue a policy of title insurance. The terms and conditions under which the policy of insurance may be issued may or may not reflect the true condition of record title. The insurer may choose to ignore or omit a possible exception to title based on an underwriting decision." … Given Insurance Code sections 12340.10 and 12340.11, it is clear that "any title search or examination is performed by the insurer solely for the purpose of seeking to evaluate its underwriting decision in issuing the policy, not for the benefit of the insured."…[6]

Likewise, in Caravan Products Co. v. Ritchie,[7] the court stated that a title insurance commitment is a binder of insurance:

> The designation "Preliminary Report of Title" on the instrument delivered to plaintiff is a misnomer. That document is more than what that designation would imply--a mere report, abstract or search of title. It is a "binder," i.e., a binding receipt affording coverage pending the agreed issuance of a policy under which the title company agrees to "guaranty" the title subject only to specifically noted and listed "estates, liens, defects and questions."[8]

In Schaible v. Louisville Title Ins. Co., the court also emphasized the nature of a commitment as a binder of insurance:

[5] See the cases collected by state at §15.12. A Florida court became confused about the nature of the commitment in Livingston v. American Title & Ins. Co., 133 So.2d 483 (Fla.App. 1961). The court construed a commitment that used the unfortunate label of "interim title insurance binder" and observed that a legal encyclopedia's definition of "binder" is "a temporary issuance of a permanent policy." 133 So.2d at 485. The court thus refused to find that the commitment was merely an offer to insure. Florida is one of the few states that still clings to the notion that a title insurance commitment is akin to an abstract of title. See the discussion of Florida at §15.12, and particularly Shada v. Title & Trust Co. of Fla., 457 So.2d 553 (Fla.App. 1984).

> [T]he binder, or executory contract to insure, contains the specific provision that the defendant, upon the meeting of certain requirements will issue, "its policy of title insurance, on its usual form, … ." The acceptance of the binder and the acceptance of the policy when issued, after payment of premium assessed and the meeting of all other requirements, would appear to bind both insured and insurer under the policy contract.[9]

In order to serve as an enforceable offer to insure, the commitment must be genuine. A forged or fake commitment is void and is not binding on the insurer named in the instrument.[10]

6.2 Integration And Merger With Policy Terms

The Conditions section of the ALTA title insurance policies contain a provision that covers three distinct subjects: (a) that the policy terms provide the exclusive remedy for a breach of the contract, (b) that the policy and all endorsements are one integrated contract, and (c) that the title insurance commitment merges into the policy and does not survive as a separate contract after the policy's issuance. This provision is found at Conditions 15 of the 2006 ALTA policies, which says:

> 15. LIABILITY LIMITED TO THIS POLICY; POLICY ENTIRE CONTRACT
> (a) This policy together with all endorsements, if any, attached to it by the Company is the entire policy and contract between the Insured and the Company. In interpreting any provision of this policy, this policy shall be construed as a whole.
> (b) Any claim of loss or damage that arises out of the status of the Title or by any action asserting such claim shall be restricted to this policy.
> (c) Any amendment of or endorsement to this policy must be in writing and authenticated by an authorized person, or expressly incorporated by Schedule A of this policy.
> (d) Each endorsement to this policy issued at any time is made a part of this policy and is subject to all of its terms and provisions. Except as the endorsement expressly states, it does not (i) modify any of the terms and provisions of the policy, (ii) modify any prior endorsement, (iii) extend the Date of Policy, or (iv) increase the Amount of Insurance.

Commitment to Insure

This provision is discussed in three sections of this book. The principle that the policy and any endorsements are to be construed as a whole, and that an endorsement control only to the extent that it modifies the policy (sometimes known as the integration provision), is discussed at §9.1.3.5. The so-called "exclusive remedy" provision, Conditions 15(b), is the provision that declares that the policy is not an abstract of title, and that all claims based on the policy are governed by its terms. That provision is covered in §15.6. The subject of the merger of the title insurance commitment into the policy is discussed in this section.

The commitment is an offer to issue a policy. The 2006 ALTA commitment states that liability under the commitment terminates when the policy is issued:

> All liability and obligation under this Commitment shall cease and terminate [stated time period] after the Effective Date or when the policy or policies committed for shall issue, whichever first occurs, provided that the failure to issue the policy or policies is not the fault of the Company.[11]

The 2006 ALTA Plain Language commitment states, similarly:

> If the Requirements shown in this Commitment have not been met within [stated time period] after the Commitment Date, our obligation under this Commitment will end. Also, our obligation under this Commitment will end when the Policy is issued and then our obligation to you will be under the Policy.[12]

The 2016 ALTA Commitment for Insurance, adopted on August 1, 2016, separates the commitment expiration provision and the integration provision. Condition 6(f) provides the integration provision, which states:

> When the Policy is issued, all liability and obligation under this Commitment will end and the Company's only liability will be under the Policy.[13]

That statement is effectively repeated in Condition 5(g) of the 2016 commitment, which says that, "[i]n any event, the Company's liability is limited by the terms and provisions of the Policy."

Congruently, Conditions 15(a) and (b) of the 2006 ALTA policies state that the commitment merges into the policy, and that the sole contract is the policy, once issued:

> (a) This policy together with all endorsements, if any, attached to it by the Company is the entire policy and contract between the Insured and the Company. In interpreting any provision of this policy, this policy shall be construed as a whole.

[12] 2006 ALTA Plain Language Commitment Form (adopted June 17, 2006).

[13] The termination provision of the 2016 ALTA Commitment for Insurance is found at Condition 2.

> (b) Any claim of loss or damage that arises out of the status of the Title or by any action asserting such claim shall be restricted to this policy.

Likewise, Conditions 3 of the 2006 ALTA Commitment for Insurance states:

> In no event shall such liability exceed the amount stated in Schedule A for the policy or policies committed for and such liability is subject to the insuring provisions and Conditions and the Exclusions from Coverage of the form of policy or policies committed for in favor of the proposed Insured which are hereby incorporated by reference and are made a part of this Commitment except as expressly modified herein.

The effect of these consistent provisions in the commitment and policy is that the commitment merges into the policy when it is issued.[14] The failure to issue the policy immediately after closing is not a breach of the commitment. Thus, when an insurer defended its proposed insured in litigation affecting title, thus satisfying its policy duties, it was not in breach for having issued the policy after the litigation began. The court reasoned that the issuance of the policy was an administrative act:

> The issuance of a clean policy merely confirms the obligations already undertaken by the title company. Since Chicago Title ... defended the plaintiff in the rescission action pursuant to the terms of the insurance commitment, it is irrelevant that the actual title policy was not issued until after the instant action was commenced.[15]

Once the policy is issued, and the commitment is merged into it, there is no viable cause of action under the commitment.[16] Thus, when an insured admitted that the policy did not provide coverage for a post-policy act, the insurer was found to have no liability under the commitment for the same issue.[17] In First American Title Ins. Co. v. Seaboard Sav. & Loan Ass'n,[18] the court stated, in

The court said it would "briefly address ... whether any potential contractual liability arises under the subject title commitment and the title policy. ... [Insurer] argues that the title commitment expressly states that all liability under said commitment ceased to exist when the title policy was issued. ... We conclude that, based upon the express language of the title policy, any contractual liability of defendant would arise solely under the policy."

[17] In Kirwan v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 9 Neb.App. 372, 612 N.W.2d 515 (Neb.App. 2000), aff'd 261 Neb. 609, 624 N.W.2d 644 (2001), the court held that a matter not disclosed by the proposed insured was excluded, and the claim was controlled by the terms of the policy: "By the time the Kirwans disclosed the Vanderwerfs' claim, the commitment had 'evaporated' by its express terms and the policy controlled, meaning that Chicago Title did not need to show that it had construing an earlier form of title insurance commitment, that the merger provision of the commitment meant that the insurer could not be liable under the commitment after the policy was issued:

> [T]he trial court was bound to give effect to the last sentence in paragraph 3 of the Conditions and Stipulations of the commitment. That sentence, which is part of the same paragraph relied on by the trial court in imposing liability upon First American, states that "such liability is subject to the Insuring Provisions, Exclusion from coverage, and the Conditions and Stipulations of the form of policy ... committed for in favor of the proposed Insured which are hereby incorporated by reference and are made a part of this Commitment except as expressly modified herein." (Emphasis added.) The trial court mentioned this language but concluded that it provided no bar to recovery by Seaboard. That conclusion was in error. The effect of the quoted language is to make the form policy, in this case the ALTA Loan Policy, as modified, part of the commitment. In other words, this language meant that there could be no greater liability under the commitment than that which existed under the form policy, as modified.

A dispute sometimes arises as to whether or not the policy accurately reflects the insurance promised in the commitment to insure. When a matter is excepted in the commitment and that exception is not removed before the policy is issued, the policy is accurately issued with the exception. The insured may not sue the insurer for breach of contract for failing to assure that the title defect had been removed.[19]

When the commitment and policy terms are not consistent, the policy controls, based on the merger clause, unless the insured can establish its right to reform the policy based on mutual mistake.[20] The commitment may be amended before closing. There are three primary means of suffered prejudice from the nondisclosure."

[19] In Arellano v. Montoya, 384 B.R. 586 (Bkcy.D.N.M. 2008), the mortgage broker received a check at closing which included the payoff amount of the existing mortgage, but he fraudulently failed to pay off the mortgage. The court ruled that the borrowers had no recourse against the title insurer or its agent. The title policy correctly excepted the mortgage and the agent had not performed the loan closing. It found that it is industry custom to convert a requirement (the release of the mortgage) to an exception when the requirement had not been met before close of escrow. It also held that First American did not breach the policy contract, saying that "First American did not contract to not issue policies if the exceptions were not cleared up."

[20] In First Citizens Bank & Trust Co. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 320 P.3d 406 (Colo.App. 1 Div. 2014), the title insurance commitment made a requirement that the lender get a deed putting the borrower in title, which it failed to do before the borrower signed the loan documents. However, the insurer issued the policy anyway. The court held that the insurer became obligated to indemnify the insured due to the defective lien when it waived the requirement and issued the policy. In United Bank v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 168 F.3d 37 (1st Cir. (Me.) 1999), the commitment stated that access was via a "private right of way." The policy made no such statement. The insured advanced the dubious proposition that the statement in the commitment was an assurance that the property was served by a private easement.

modifying a title insurance commitment. The first is by an endorsement which changes the terms of Schedules A and B, or which adds an affirmative assurance. See §9.11 for a discussion of endorsement coverages.

The second method is known as a marked-up commitment, or "mark-up." It is common in many states for title company closers to mark up the title insurance commitment at closing. This type of closing is sometimes referred to as a "New York style" closing. See §13.1 for a further description of the "New York style" closing. There are numerous variations in the method of marking up a commitment. The essential element is that the closer delivers to the insured a binder of insurance which reflects the way in which Schedules A and B of the policy will appear, deleting requirements and exceptions as agreed, and attaching any endorsements. Typically, the closer insists on receiving all documents and money needed to record the instruments to be insured and make the title clearances committed to in the mark-up, plus the title premium. The marked-up commitment dictates the terms of the policy. Under most circumstances, the marked-up commitment is binding on the insurer, who may not issue a policy inconsistent with its terms.[21] However, in Hess v. Baccarat,[22] two versions of a marked-up title commitment existed. The version held by the insured deleted an easement, but the one in the insurer's file did not. The insurer prepared the policy from its version,

The court rejected the argument, because the commitment was merged into the policy and the statement did not survive. See also 1500 Viewsite Terrace, LLC v. Pickford Escrow, Inc., 2017 WL 4309755 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished). However, in Lee v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 188 Cal.App.4th 583, 115 Cal.Rptr.3d 748 (Cal.App. 1 Dist. 2010), the preliminary title report listed two tax parcel numbers, excepted taxes for both parcels, and attached a map with arrows pointing to both tax parcels, but the insured received a deed for only one parcel and the policy insured that one parcel. The insurer was found not to be entitled to summary judgment based on the integration clause, because the insureds had the right to attempt to prove that they reasonably relied on the commitment as a representation that the policy would insure both parcels.

[21] In Peretz Strahl, Inc. v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co. of N.Y., 2005 WL 2276028, 2005 N.Y. Slip Op. 51480 (N.Y.Sup. 2005) (unpublished), a mark-up was issued that omitted an exception. The exception was put back into the policy, however, because its removal was contrary to the office underwriting guidelines. The court struck the exception from the policy, saying: "It is clear that the marked up title certificate represents the agreement of the parties as to what items were to be covered under the policy and what items excluded. Absent any evidence that there was a subsequent agreement to modify the agreement, the title policy cannot alter the agreement memorialized by the marked up title certificate." Similarly, in Hess v. Baccarat, 287 A.D.2d 834, 731 N.Y.S.2d 296 (2001), two versions of a marked-up title commitment existed, one omitting an easement and the other not. The mark-up removing the easement was not binding on the insurer after it issued the policy, because the commitment merged into the policy. Also, in Frydman v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 68 A.D.3d 622, 891 N.Y.S.2d 381, 2009 N.Y. Slip Op. 09530 (N.Y.A.D. 1 Dept. 2009), the court said that a marked-up commitment that might have shown the intent to remove a possession exception was merged into and controlled by the policy, when issued, which contained the exception. Fresh Pond Rd. Associates v. TRW Title Ins. of N.Y., 176 A.D.2d 660, 575 N.Y.S.2d 316 (N.Y.A.D. 1991) held that an insured had proven a question of material fact by producing a marked-up title report with handwritten markings that seemed to indicate that a possession exception would be removed. The Frydman court relied on Baccarat and distinguished Fresh Pond because, in Frydman, there was no hand mark-up showing a closer's agreement to remove the possession exception. In Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. Cole Taylor Bank, 878 F.Supp.2d 453 (S.D.N.Y. 2012), the insurer had issued a mark-up at closing. The bank's closing agent stole the loan money. The court found that the insurer was not obligated to issue a policy insuring the mortgage, which failed for want of consideration.

excepting the easement. The insurer was not bound by the inconsistent version held by the insured, because the commitment merged into the policy, and the insured failed to promptly complain about an inaccuracy when it received the policy. See §6.2 for further discussion of the merger clause.

The third method of altering the commitment is the use of a "pro forma" policy. The pro forma is neither a commitment nor a policy of insurance. Rather, it is a draft policy in the form desired by the proposed insured, minus only recording information for the instruments to be recorded and insured. The pro forma is sometimes delivered only when the insurer is prepared to issue the policy as shown. In other transactions, it is circulated, as with any other draft document, for comment and review. Absent a separate and unequivocal promise by the insurer to issue the policy as shown in the pro forma, the insurer is not so bound.[23] The 2016 ALTA Commitment for Title Insurance plainly states that any pro forma ordered by the proposed insured is not an accurate representation of the state of title.[24]

The terms of the policy may also be dictated by a party's escrow instructions. Escrow instructions are neither an insurance binder nor a policy. However, by signing the instructions, the title company with a dual role of insurer and escrowee may be found obligated, as escrowee, to do what is necessary to issue the policy in the desired form before allowing escrow to break. A shorthand method of dealing with this type of breach of the escrow instructions can be to reform the policy. In C.A.M. Affiliates, Inc. v. First American Title Ins. Co,[25] a tax exception was removed from the policy because the lender's escrow instructions said that all tax liens were to be paid before loan funds were disbursed. The court said that the title agent, by accepting the instructions, had committed to remove all tax liens. The commitment had two tax exceptions, one for five years' delinquent taxes and the other for two years' taxes that had been sold at a scavenger sale. The closer was given funds to redeem the sold taxes, but not to pay off the delinquencies. The policy excepted the delinquent taxes. Further, the escrow officer testified that the tax exception should not have appeared. The court rejected the argument that the closer had no authority to bind the insurer on a marked-up commitment because she was an escrowee for the lender, and escrow activities are excluded from the agency relationship. The court disagreed:

[23] Aouate v. Hotel Europe, Inc., 792 So.2d 596 (Fla.App. 3 Dist. 2001), illustrates the confusion that a pro forma can create. The insurer issued a "pro forma" endorsement protecting against liens and a pending lawsuit. The coverage was conditioned on the escrow of a large sum, which the seller did not set up or fund. The buyer refused to close because of the title defects. The court ruled that title was marketable, as evidenced by the pro forma endorsement. The buyer offered the testimony of the title officer, to show the unfulfilled conditions attached to the protections contained in the endorsement. The court refused the testimony. In a decision that might have been issued in France's Reign of Terror, the appeals court affirmed, saying that the title officer's testimony would have been mere "parole evidence" the trial court did not need to hear, because "the terms at issue were clear and unambiguous" on the face of the [pro forma] document.

[24] Condition 8 of the 2016 ALTA Commitment for Title Insurance states that "[t]he Company may provide, at the request of a Proposed Insured, a pro-forma policy illustrating the coverage that the Company may provide. A pro-forma policy neither reflects the status of Title at the time that the pro-forma policy is delivered to a Proposed Insured, nor is it a commitment to insure."

[25] 306 Ill.App.3d 1015, 240 Ill.Dec. 91, 715 N.E.2d 778 (Ill.App. 1 Dist. 1999).

> Stearns [the escrow officer] had the actual authority to waive exceptions to title commitments. Paragraph 2 of the Agency Contract between Republic and First American states, "Agent is authorized to issue, in the name of Principal, title insurance commitments, binders and policies (including endorsements thereof)." This language expressly granted Republic the actual authority to endorse, or waive, provisions in the title commitments and policies. Stearns acted pursuant to this grant of authority when she waived exception 2 and, contrary to the parties' intentions, erroneously failed to waive exception 1.

If the terms of the policy when issued are materially different from the commitment, mark-up, pro forma or escrow instructions, the insured must take immediate action to reform the policy to match the mutual intent of the parties. In MacDonald v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp.,[26] the insured was permitted to reform a policy that contained exceptions for liens not shown in the commitment. However, the insured is estopped to dispute the terms of the policy once a reasonable time has passed, because passage of time without protest signifies the acceptance of the policy's terms:

> An applicant who is advised of a ground upon which he is entitled to reject a policy tendered to him by the insurer should notify the insurer of his refusal to accept the policy as written; the notice should be given promptly, that is, at once, or at least within a reasonable time after the cause of rejection was, or should have been, discovered. A rejection cannot be made by a secret unexpressed intention. An applicant is regarded as having accepted the policy as written, if he reads it, or has it read to him, and does not notify the company of his rejection thereof.
> If the period of retention is so great that a return of the policy thereafter would be unreasonable, the court may determine the matter as a question of law. The court will rule as a matter of law that the insured's delay was unreasonable where the facts reasonably admit of no other conclusion.[27]

Following these principles, the court in Imperial Savings Ass'n v. Lewis[28] found the insured estopped to object to an arbitration provision in the policy. The 2016 ALTA Commitment for Insurance has obviated any issue about notice of the arbitration provision, by reciting its own arbitration provision at Condition 9.

The fact that certain terms found in the policy are not recited in the title insurance commitment does not render those terms unenforceable, because the insured may reasonably expect the policy to contain conditions and exclusions.[29] As a "binder" of coverage, the title insurance commitment need not recite every provision of the policy.[30] When the commitment did not recite the standard exceptions which would appear on the policy, one court found that fact did not prohibit the insurer from putting them in the policy, saying:

> [W]e do not agree that the provision should be denied effect because it was not set forth in the preliminary commitment. Certainly, it would seem desirable that general exceptions be specifically set forth in the preliminary commitment or that a copy of the standard form policy be delivered to the insured at the same time as the preliminary commitment. At the very least, this case demonstrates that an insured should receive a copy of the standard form policy in a closing conference conducted at the title company office. We cannot say, however, that Transamerica's failure to take either course renders the provision nugatory.
> Both the earnest money agreement and the preliminary commitment made references to the exceptions, and the policy form setting them forth was available for Muench's examination. … Accordingly, we hold that the exceptions are enforceable in this instance.[31]

In Kirwan v. Chicago Title Ins. Co.,[32] the insureds argued that the policy and commitment terms were inconsistent in describing the effect of an insured's failure to disclose an off-record adverse claim of title. The insureds argued that the commitment provided more coverage than the policy, because the commitment says that the insurer must be prejudiced by a failure to disclose, while the policy does not. Thus, they said, Exclusion 3(b):

> ... leaves a bona fide purchaser who relies on a title commitment at risk, and without coverage, for the interval between a commitment and the policy date. ... [I]f the insured learns of a claim within this interval, the insurer has no duty to defend. ... It creates a "catch" for innocent insureds who learn of an adverse claim after closing while awaiting their policy, and leaves them uninsured though their premium is paid.

Given the different purposes of the commitment and policy, the court found it logical that their terms would be different:

> The Kirwans argue that "[n]either South Dakota nor Nebraska law permits a title

[30] In Schaible v. Louisville Title Ins. Co., 118 Ohio App. 328, 194 N.E.2d 588, 591 (1963), a form of commitment which bound the insurer to issue "its policy of title insurance, on its usual form," was found to "bind both insured and insurer under the policy contract." However, in Edison v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2010 WL 559120 (E.D.Mo.) (unpublished), the insured survived the insurer's motion to dismiss based on Exclusion 3(a) based on his assertion that the policy was not issued at closing, and the exclusion was not disclosed in the commitment.

> insurer to vary terms between a title commitment and a subsequent policy," ... but no supporting authority is advanced-- perhaps because the argument must ignore the distinction between the commitment or binder and the policy. In our view, the title commitment was a separate agreement which had a different purpose than the actual title insurance policy. The commitment in effect "guaranteed" the issuance of a certain type of title insurance, subject to the conditions and stipulations in the commitment, but to be covered, adverse claims had to be disclosed to Chicago Title if knowledge thereof was acquired by the insured between binder and policy.

The court upheld the commitment's merger provision, which ties the two documents together and makes it clear that the policy terms control after it is issued. The court said that this "bait and switch" argument:

> ... ignores the fact that the commitment provides that "all liability and obligations hereunder shall cease ... when the policy ... committed for shall issue." In short, the terms of the commitment provide that it ceases to exist once the policy issues because the commitment is only an agreement to issue a policy. Therefore, the obligations of the commitment are replaced by those of the policy. There is no showing in this record that the terms and conditions of the policy were not known to the Kirwans, or knowable by them had they asked Chicago Title. Without such evidence, there plainly is no misrepresentation.

Words used in the policy are interpreted based on the policy's definitions and terms, and the commitment's terms are not relevant or dispositive in interpreting the policy.[33] In a Michigan decision, however, the insurer argued that the policy definition of "actual knowledge" did not control on the question of what information the proposed insured was required to disclose to the insurer before closing, because the non-ALTA commitment in that transaction required the proposed insured to disclosure its "knowledge or intimation" of a title risk.[34] The court acknowledged that the [34] In Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. First Federal Savings Bank & Trust, 744 F. Supp. 778 (E.D. Mich. 1990), the commitment obligated a proposed insured to report "knowledge or intimation" of a title defect. The court found that phrase to be broader than the "actual knowledge" required under Exclusion 3(b). The commitment at issue in the First Federal case is a form unique to Michigan. The court found, by contrast, that "The ALTA Model Commitment, in harmony with the ALTA Model Contract, provides that the insurer shall be relieved of liability [i]f the proposed Insured has or acquires actual knowledge of any defect, lien, encumbrance, adverse claim, or other matter affecting the estate or interest or mortgage thereon covered by this Commitment ... ." Thus, there is no such inconsistency between the ALTA commitment and policy forms. In Archambo v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 646 N.W.2d 170 (Mich. 2002), again construing the Michigan form of title insurance commitment, the court found that the commitment and policy are two separate contracts, and the disclosure provision of the commitment is erased by the issuance of the policy. The Michigan title commitment disclosure provision said: "This commitment is delivered and accepted upon the understanding that the party to be insured has no personal knowledge or intimation of any defect, objection, lien or encumbrance affecting subject land other than these set forth herein and in the title insurance application. Failure to disclose such information commitment phrase was broader than "actual knowledge," but said that the policy language controlled even as to the proposed insured's pre-policy duties:

> The terms of the commitment and mortgage title insurance policy involved here make clear that the latter was intended to supersede the former. As noted earlier, the commitment is intended to be only an interim agreement. By its terms, its obligations exist for only six months or until the policy of insurance is issued. The policy declares that it is the entire agreement between the parties. In addition, it is clear that the terms of the policy completely occupy the same subject matter as the commitment. Both instruments specifically disclaim liability if the insured withholds any material information as to possible defects in title. However, the documents are directly inconsistent in describing the level of awareness required before liability will be excluded; the policy requires actual knowledge, while the commitment requires only knowledge or intimation. There is simply no way that these two standards can be reconciled. One must prevail over the other. ... [I]t is the later agreement which must control.[35]

The 2006 ALTA Commitment overcomes this obstacle by using the policy term "actual knowledge."

shall render this commitment and any policy issued pursuant thereto, null and void as to such defect, objection, lien or encumbrance." In Archambo, the proposed insured failed to disclose a recorded federal tax lien. The insurer argued that this provision created a condition precedent to the issuance of the policy, and that Archambo's failure to disclose the tax lien voided the policy. Archambo argued that, once issued, the policy could not be voided by the failure to disclose, and that the terms of the policy controlled because of its integration clause. Further, he said, the policy does not require disclosure of recorded liens. Thus, not only was the policy in force, he argued, it provided coverage against Archambo's own federal tax lien. The trial court agreed with Archambo. On appeal, the court reversed, in a split decision, finding the policy void. Archambo appealed to the Supreme Court, which sided with the trial court and Archambo. The high court analyzed the commitment language this way: "In this case, the Court of Appeals held that a condition precedent contained in the commitment was not met, and thus that the policy never became effective. We do not agree. The relevant language of the commitment provides that '[f]ailure to disclose [the known lien] shall render ... any policy ... null and void as to such ... lien ...' (Emphasis added.) First, clearly this is not a condition precedent to the insurance company's obligation to issue a policy. The condition speaks to voiding part of a subsequently issued policy, not to avoiding the obligation to issue a policy. Second, this condition is also not a condition precedent to the effectiveness of the entire policy. That is, if this condition was not met, the policy would nevertheless become effective when issued. Rather, this condition is an attempt to render the policy, as to those liens of which a claimant had knowledge and failed to disclose, null and void… . In other words, this condition is an attempt to render the policy null and void, 'as to' an undisclosed lien, upon the failure to disclose such lien. But, it is not an attempt to render the entire policy null and void 'as to' all liens upon such a failure." The difference in language was crucial, because the wording of Exclusion 3(b) is narrower than the Michigan commitment language. "Because the policy took effect, there are two contracts, the commitment and the policy. Under the commitment, plaintiff was required to disclose the known tax lien, even though it was recorded. However, under the policy, plaintiff was not required to disclose the known tax lien because it was recorded. Therefore, the issue is which of these two contracts is controlling. ... Because the subsequently issued policy contains an integration clause that evidences the parties' intent to abrogate the commitment, the policy controls. The policy does not require the disclosure of known recorded liens, and thus plaintiff is not excluded from coverage under § 3(b) of the policy."

[35] Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. First Fed. Sav. Bank & Trust, 744 F. Supp. 778, 783 (E.D. Mich. 1990).

The 2016 ALTA Commitment for Insurance goes further. In that form, Condition 1 incorporates the policy definitions for Knowledge, Known, Land, Mortgage, Policy, Public Records and Title; further, it defines the terms Proposed Insured and Proposed Policy Amount, which do not appear in the policies.

6.3 Proposed Insured And Third Party Beneficiaries

The proposed insured is the only party with a right to make a claim under a title insurance commitment.[36] The 2016 ALTA Commitment for Insurance emphatically states that only the proposed insured may make a claim under the commitment. Condition 6(a) states that "[o]nly a Proposed Insured identified in Schedule A, and no other person, may make a claim under this Commitment." See §7.1 for a complete discussion of the definition of "insured" and "proposed insured." A seller is not a third party beneficiary of a commitment.[37] Further, when the seller was aware of a tax assessment, the court said that it had no argument that it relied on a commitment that did not contain an exception for the assessment:

> There is no showing, on this record, of reliance, damage or an expectation of a search and disclosure. This defendant knew of the assessments long before the plaintiff ever issued a preliminary commitment. When the defendant's agent ordered title insurance, the defendant had already listed the property subject to the buyer assuming the sewer assessment. The defendant's awareness and knowledge are evidenced by the deletion of the assumption requirement from the listing. Again, long before asking the plaintiff to insure title, the defendant had contractually agreed with its purchasers (the only insureds) to convey title free of the assessments. There is no showing that this defendant expected an "abstract" of title or that even if it had, that it relied thereon in any manner. In fact, had the assessments been disclosed, the defendant would have had to pay them from the closing proceeds. The defendant is merely paying, through subrogation, that which it had knowledge of and had agreed to pay long before the plaintiff became involved.[38] [36] When the proposed insured failed to close on the purchase of the property because it could not get financing, it had no right to pursue the title insurer for having missed a large judgment lien, because it was not an insured. The Texas court especially noted that the proposed insured never paid a policy premium. Hispanic Housing & Education Corp. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2002 WL 1303426 (Tex.App. -Houston (1 Dist.)) (unpublished). In Izynski v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 963 N.E.2d 592 (Ind.App. 2012), a title insurance commitment had been issued to a prospective buyer who did not purchase. The broker showed the commitment to the Izynskis, who made a later offer. The day before closing, the Izynskis learned of a dam easement not shown in the commitment. The commitment was amended, and the policy excepted the easement. The appeals court reversed the dismissal of the Izynskis' tort claims against the insurer based on the commitment. It admitted that they would not have tort claims under their policy, but might have such claims based on the commitment that was issued to the prior prospective buyer, because it was not issued to them.

Commitment to Insure

A title insurance commitment sometimes recites the proposed insured as a party "to be named," or similar language. The naming of a proposed insured allows the insurer to commit to insure a known party, and to search the records for any liens that will attach to the property on conveyance to that party. A commitment that does not name a specific proposed insured lacks a significant term, and suggests that there is no identifiable party who would be entitled to rely on the commitment. Thus, when the commitment does not recite a particular party as being the proposed insured, the claimant must establish that he or she was the proposed insured. Several courts have addressed the issue of whether or not a purchaser at sheriff's sale is a third party beneficiary of a title report prepared for the foreclosing lender, which typically lists the proposed insured as "to be named" or "purchaser at sheriff's sale." See the cases discussed at §7.7.

6.4 Commitment Conditions And Requirements

As further discussed above in §6.1, the title insurance commitment is, in contract terms, an offer. The commitment states the terms under which that offer must be accepted. These include payment of premium and performance of the requirements stated in Schedule B. As stated in Schaible v. Louisville Title Ins. Co.:

> The acceptance of the binder and the acceptance of the policy when issued, after payment of premium assessed and the meeting of all other requirements, would appear to bind both insured and insurer under the policy contract.[39]

The insured's acceptance of the offer to insure must take place within the commitment's effective period, or the offer to insure is null.[40]

When all requirements have been met before expiration of the commitment, the insurer is ordinarily obligated to issue the policy. If the policy has not yet been issued, a claim may be dealt with as if it had been. All policy terms and conditions are applicable in resolving the claim.[41] An insurer may be precluded from denying the existence of an insurance contract based solely on the insured's failure to meet a purely technical element of a requirement. For example, in MacDonald v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp.,[42] the trustee began the foreclosure before being appointed and failed to give some required notices. The court found that the defects were not fatal to the foreclosure, and not a sufficient basis for the insurer to deny that a policy obligation existed. The court held:

> Lawyers Title cannot use the technical errors of the foreclosure sale to escape its duty

[40] In Clair v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2007 WL 1063989, 2007-Ohio-1681 (Ohio App. 9 Dist.) (unpublished), the plaintiff sued on a commitment and alleged that he had paid a premium. The appeals court held that he had not proven the conditions precedent to issuance of a policy, particularly the premium payment, and therefore the commitment expired by its terms.

to issue a title insurance policy on the Property.

The kind of judicial underwriting conducted in MacDonald should apply only to strictly formalistic requirements. A court should not rewrite insurance policies without fully understanding and considering the policy risk to which it binds the insurer. For example, it would not be appropriate to relieve the proposed insured of the duty to meet requirements necessary for a valid conveyance or mortgage lien. Similarly, it would be wrong to eliminate any requirement having to do with the risk for which the claim is made, such as receipt of a true and valid affidavit, or an accurate survey.

When substantive conditions are not satisfied, the offer of insurance has not been unconditionally accepted, and there is no contract.[43] One court explained this principle in this fashion:

> The actual issuance of a policy is the culmination of a number of stages, including researching, examining and interpreting of documents, preliminary commitments and supplemental reports. [citations omitted] For a contract of insurance to be obligatory in the absence of the issuance of the policy, it must be complete and unconditional so far as to leave nothing to be done but the formal issuance of the policy.[44]

Thus, when the commitment expired with the insurer never having been told what instrument to insure, or which liens were to be removed from title before the policy was issued, all liability terminated, even though the premium had been paid.[45]

Also, when the policy is issued, the requirements are normally deemed satisfied, even if they have not been met as specified.[46]

The subsections below address the three main issues on this topic: the requirements for payment of the premium, delivery and recording of the conveyance that creates the insured estate or interest, and expiration of the commitment.

Another common type of requirement in the commitment is that a particular lien or title

[46] When a commitment called for a mortgage to be executed by the corporation which owned the property, but the insurer prepared and recorded a mortgage by the shareholders instead, and issued its policy insuring the mortgage, the insurer was not permitted to deny liability on the basis that the commitment requirements had not been met, in Kiniski v. Archway Motel, Inc., 586 P.2d 502 (Wash.App. 1978). In First Citizens Bank & Trust Co. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 320 P.3d 406 (Colo.App. 1 Div. 2014), the title insurance commitment made a requirement that the lender get a deed putting the borrower in title, which it failed to do before the borrower signed the loan documents. However, the insurer issued the policy anyway. The court held that the insurer became obligated to indemnify the insured due to the defective lien when it waived the requirement and issued the policy.

defect be released or removed. The insurer does not owe a policy if the commitment states that a lien must be removed and it is not.[47] Also, the insurer is not subject to liability to the insured or any other party for having made a requirement for the release of a lien or instrument. Judgments and tax liens are indexed by name. A person with a common name may be asked to remove a lien against a person with an identical or similar name, but that is not his or her debt. The insurer is not liable to that person for requiring the removal of such a lien.[48]

6.4.1 Payment Of Premium

FORM 27, Appendix A
Letter canceling commitment for failure to pay premium

Payment of premium is an essential condition to the issuance of the policy.[49] It is an express requirement in Schedule B, Part I of the commitment. If the premium is not paid, the insurer is not obligated to issue the policy. A policy issued at closing is void if the premium is not received by the insurer, or the tendered payment instrument fails.[50]

(unpublished), a title agent that allegedly paid off judgments that were not the seller's debts, but which were against people with names similar to his, was found not to be liable under the debt-validation provisions of the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act.

[49] "No premium was ever paid. No title policy issued. By the clear terms of the insurance contract, the responsibility of Chicago could be and was avoided by the failure of occurrence of these conditions subsequent." Cambridge Acceptance Corp. v. American Nat. Motor Inns, Inc., 96 N.J.Super 183, 232 A.2d 692, 708 (Ch.Div. 1967). When the proposed insured failed to close on the purchase of the property and did not pay the policy premium, the commitment expired and the proposed insured had no right to pursue the title insurer for having missed a large judgment lien. Hispanic Housing & Education Corp. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2002 WL 1303426 (Tex.App.-Houston (1 Dist.)) (unpublished).

[50] In GMAC Mortgage Corp. of Pa. v. Weisman, 1998 WL 132791 (S.D.N.Y.) (unpublished), the title insurer issued a policy at the "New York style" table closing. However, the purchaser presented NSF checks at closing, including the funds to be used to pay the title insurance premium. The entire transaction was unwound for failure of consideration. Things got worse when the lender's counsel then defalcated with the lender's loan proceeds which were returned to him. The lender then made a claim on the policy. The court found, however, that "[t]he failure to pay the title insurance premium voided the policies because there was a complete failure of consideration. [citations omitted] Thus, First American cannot be held liable on a title insurance policy issued to GMAC for which GMAC never paid any premiums. The payment of the premium was a condition precedent to liability here." Id. at 9. The lender further asserted that, since the policy had been issued at closing, the insurer had a duty to notify the lender prior to cancelling the policy, and/or that the policy was "binding" once issued whether or not the premium was paid. The court rejected the argument, stating: "However, this is not an issue of an insurance policy being cancelled or terminated. Rather, this is an issue of a title insurance policy being deemed void for total failure of consideration. GMAC designated the borrower, Pantoja, to be responsible for making the premium payment to First American on its behalf. Pantoja's check bounced and GMAC must suffer the consequences. As for the 'binding' insurance argument, the cases cited by Plaintiff involved insurance binders issued prior to the actual policy and insurance policies where some premiums were paid. In this case no premiums were paid as required at the closing because the check bounced." Id. at 10.

In a loan transaction, the failure to pay a premium for an owner's policy is conclusive evidence that the borrowers did not request or expect a policy. An insurer was found not to be obligated to inform the borrowers that no policy would be issued just because they were recited on the commitment as proposed insureds; rather, the borrowers' failure to pay the premium was evidence that they did not contract for insurance.[51] Another court explained that the insured must prove that he or she paid the premium rather than ask the court to assume that fact:

> All of appellants' claims of contract violations are premised on the fact that they had an insurance contract with US Title. However, no evidence exists in the record which supports this fact. Appellants allege that an insurance premium was sent to US Title, that it was embezzled by Budny [the closer], thus explaining the lack of an entry in US Title records reflecting receipt of the premium, and that they thus had a constructive insurance contract with US Title. However, even if Budny had embezzled the premium as part of a fraud on the Milbrandts, the Milbrandts have failed to provide any evidence whatsoever that a premium was in fact paid. They provide no ledger entry, no cancelled check, and no evidence of any extension of credit to Huber. Without evidence of a premium payment, whether or not it was received by US Title, appellants cannot claim that they entered into an insurance contract with the company. Thus, appellants fail to support their assertion of a material issue of fact, and their claims related to the existence of an insurance contract must fail.[52]

When a party does not pay the premium, that fact is evidence that the offer to insure found in the commitment has not been accepted:

> Warrington never testified that he accepted the offer to issue a policy. He testified that he received the preliminary report after closing the August 1, 1973, transaction. ... Warrington indicated to Transamerica that the Oregon Mutual mortgage transaction, for which the July 27, 1973, title report was ordered, was not going to go through so that no title insurance would be necessary. Therefore, there was no contract between Warrington and Transamerica.[53]

In addition, if there is a special charge for a particular coverage or endorsement, the insurer is not liable for that coverage unless the premium is paid.[54]

There is no duty to pay the premium, except a reasonable cancellation fee, if the transaction fails, since in such instance the insured risk does not come into being.[55] Conversely, mere acceptance of the premium by the insurer does not prohibit it from later cancelling a commitment on a transaction that has not yet closed:

> Under the facts in this case, the mere retention by plaintiff (after becoming aware of the forgery) of the premium paid by defendants for the binder, in and of itself, did not work a waiver or an estoppel precluding plaintiff's assertion of defendants' failure to comply with a condition precedent to coverage under the binder.[56]

See §6.12 regarding the duty to pay the premium, if owed, and related issues.

The fact that no premium has yet been paid is not an absolute bar to reliance damages under the commitment, however. The commitment says that the insurer will be liable for damages incurred by the proposed insured in obtaining or curing title in reliance on the insurer's promise to issue a policy, even if no policy is issued. See §6.9 for a discussion of damages under the commitment.

The claim administrator pays especially careful attention to the issue of whether or not the premium was paid if no policy has been issued. Often, a policy is not issued precisely because no premium was paid. If no premium has been paid, and the commitment has expired, the commitment has lapsed. There is no duty to issue a policy and no liability on the putative policy.[57] The insurer may write to inform the proposed insured that the commitment is cancelled for failure to pay the premium.

6.4.2 Payment Of Consideration For Purchase Of Insured Interest

FORM 29, Appendix A
Cancellation for failure to pay adequate consideration

A universal requirement for the binding of coverage is found in the Schedule B, Part I requirement that the proposed insured pay consideration for the interest to be insured. This requirement is fundamental to the risk of title insurance. Most states' laws protect bona fide purchasers "for value" against all manner of adverse title claims. These protections are not available unless the insured owner is able to prove that he or she has paid value.

The requirement for the payment of valuable consideration was found not to have been met, was available at a higher premium. Thus, the extent of risks insured against was negotiable in the sense that a more extensive coverage could be obtained." Also see §12.3.4 for more cases regarding the survey exception and "extended" coverage.

and the insurer had no liability under the title insurance commitment, when the purchase money was stolen by the closer and thus the seller did not receive consideration.[58] The requirement of consideration was also not met when the insured lender failed to fund the loan.[59] In the latter case, the court concluded:

> It is undisputed that, because Heritage never funded either of the closings, title never passed from the intended seller to buyer or from the intended buyer to Heritage, nor were the prior security deeds ever satisfied and cancelled of record. Therefore, Minnesota Title never issued its final title policies to Heritage, nor was it obligated to do so, because the conditions precedent to issuance of the policies were never met. … Accordingly, defendant is entitled to summary judgment on plaintiff's claims under the title binders.[60]

Similarly, the consideration requirement was held not to have been met by a loan assignee, when the original lender failed to fund the loan.[61] Likewise, the insured did not meet the commitment requirements when it failed to disburse construction funds as called for in a pending disbursement endorsement attached to the commitment, and failed to obtain a further endorsement of the policy after the advance. See §10.1.4 regarding the pending disbursement endorsement to the construction loan policy.

[59] First Financial Savings & Loan Ass'n. v. Title Ins. Co. of Minnesota, 557 F.Supp. 654 (N.D.Ga. 1982). In First Financial, the parties were told by the closer that the deed and mortgage would not be recorded until the draft funding the buyer's loan had cleared. When the lender's draft did not clear, and the lender filed bankruptcy, the documents were not recorded and the transaction was unwound.

[60] 557 F.Supp. at 663. In First Financial, the lender, Heritage, had sold the two loans at issue without funding. The loan assignees sued the closers for negligent and intentional misrepresentation, based on letters issued to Heritage certifying that its funds had been disbursed. The closers had been told that the loans would be assigned. The court found that there was at least a cause of action by the assignees for negligent misrepresentation against the closers.

[61] Gerrold v. Penn Title Ins. Co., 637 A.2d 1293 (N.J.Super.A.D. 1994) ("The condition of payment set forth in the title commitment was not satisfied, resulting in a failure of consideration.").

Another uniformly-promulgated requirement is for the delivery and recording of the instrument creating the proposed insured's interest in the property. A key issue concerning this requirement is the point at which policy coverage is bound. Courts in Ohio and Georgia have held that, if the insurer discovers that a deed is forged before coverage is bound, the requirement is not met by the void instrument, and the commitment may be cancelled or lapses.[62] However, a later decision by the Georgia Supreme Court disavowed the first decision, saying:

> Fidelity's argument [based on the Glass case] "ignores that one of the very purposes of title insurance is to protect a party from the consequences of forgery in the chain of title, which necessarily results in the party not receiving an interest in the land." …
> Title insurance protects against "defective titles," OCGA § 33-7-8, and a forged deed conveys a defective title… . Exclusions from coverage are to be strictly construed… . We therefore conclude that, in the absence of language in a title insurance commitment that plainly excludes coverage for a forgery, a commitment must be construed to provide coverage for forgeries. Glass is disapproved to the extent it stands for the contrary proposition.[63]

The two Georgia decisions are not necessarily in conflict, however. In Glass, the insurer was permitted to cancel the commitment because the insured closed the transaction and the insurer discovered the forgery before the deed was recorded. In Keyingham, the attorney title agent closed the loan, disbursed the closing funds and accepted the forged deed after personally conducting the verification of identity, which was based on a phony driver's license. Thus, the insurer sought to deny liability after its title agent had bound coverage by closing the transaction.

When the insured does not get coverage bound before the commitment expires, the commitment lapses. Thus, when the commitment requirements were not met because the insurer was not told what deed of trust to insure, or what liens were to be paid off, and no policy was issued, the commitment expired before the claim was presented, and could not be enforced.[64]

[62] See Glass v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 181 Ga.App. 804, 354 S.E.2d 187 (Ga.App. 1987), in which the appellate court said "[w]e reject as patently absurd defendants' contention that, pursuant to the language of the binder, the parties intended that compliance with the condition precedent in this case could have been accomplished via a forged warranty deed ... ." Likewise, in Gayheart v. Midland Title Security, Inc., 2004-Ohio-2536, 2004 WL 1109525 (Ohio App. 5 Dist.) (unpublished), the court found that a forged deed did not meet the commitment's requirement that a "proper deed" be "executed, delivered and filed for record." It found controlling a prior appellate case, Domoney Corp. v. USLife Title Ins. Co., 1985 WL 10495 (Ohio App. 10 Dist.) (unpublished). In that case, the grantor gave a forged deed. The Domoney court found that the commitment did not protect against the forgery because the deed "did not meet the condition of the title insurance commitment that a proper warranty deed conveying fee simple title to the premises be approved, executed and filed for record." 6.5 Expiration Of Commitment

Cancellation for lapse of effective period

The ALTA commitment expires within a stated time from its effective date, which is often either six months or 90 days.[65] If the conditions stated in the commitment are not met before the commitment expires, the commitment is null and void.[66] When a lender closed on a commitment that had expired 43 days earlier, there was no longer any duty to issue a policy, and the insurer had no liability to protect against the title defect.[67]

However, the mere lapse of more than 180 days from the effective date to the recording of the deed vesting the insured in title does not negate the binding of policy coverage. When the proposed insured had paid the premium and complied with all of the requirements, including the recording of the deed that vested him in title, the insurer was precluded from asserting the lapse provision to deny coverage when the insured submitted a claim shortly thereafter.[68] Also, when a policy was requested and issued after the commitment had expired, the expiration of the commitment would be waived as a defense if the commitment had been relied on by the proposed insured and a pattern of conduct showed that such reliance was not unreasonable.[69] Also, when the insurer accepted the premium on a lapsed commitment and its agent told the proposed insured that the effective date was "being extended to allow for the issuance of the final policy," the insurer was estopped from denying liability based on the commitment expiration.[70] Also, expiration of the commitment is not a defense to a claim based solely on misrepresentation of title and not on the

6.6 Knowledge Of Proposed Insured--Duty To Disclose

The proposed insured has a duty to disclose to the insurer those matters affecting title of which it has actual knowledge. The 2006 ALTA Commitment expressed this as an affirmative duty of the proposed insured:

> If the proposed Insured has or acquired actual knowledge of any defect, lien, encumbrance, adverse claim or other matter affecting the estate or interest or mortgage thereon covered by this Commitment other than those shown in Schedule B hereof, and shall fail to disclose such knowledge to the Company in writing, the Company shall be relieved from liability for any loss or damage resulting from any act of reliance hereon to the extent the Company is prejudiced by failure to so disclose such knowledge. If the proposed Insured shall disclose such knowledge to the Company, or if the Company otherwise acquires actual knowledge of any such defect, lien, encumbrance, adverse claim or other matter, the Company at its option may amend Schedule B of this Commitment accordingly, but such amendment shall not relieve the Company from liability previously incurred pursuant to paragraph 3 of these Conditions.[72]

The 2016 ALTA Commitment for Insurance couches the disclosure duty as a defense to liability. Condition 5(b) states:

> The Company shall not be liable under Commitment Condition 5(a) if the Proposed Insured requested the amendment or had Knowledge of the matter and did not notify the Company about it in writing.

The duty to disclose applies to all matters affecting title of which the proposed insured has knowledge.[73] Thus, the proposed insured has a duty to tell the insurer that it may have missed a

Co.*, 9 Neb.App. 372, 612 N.W.2d 515 (Neb.App. 2000), aff'd 261 Neb. 609, 624 N.W.2d 644 (2001), the proposed insureds got a letter several days before closing from a lawyer saying that his clients were the true owners of the property. They did not tell the title insurer. The court held that the insureds were required by the commitment to disclose the risk: "The language of the title commitment is clearly intended to force the insureds to tell Chicago Title what they know or come to know about the property and its title, which is not of record, so that the risk which Chicago Title assumes in the policy can be assessed and guarded against." The appeals court adopted the trial court's rationale as to the legal and economic significance of the disclosure requirement: "The rationale of title insurance is a coverage of risks ascertainable to both parties from the public records and not otherwise ascertainable by the proposed insured and the insurer. Permitting an insured to obtain coverage for something he or she knew about, but which was unknown and unknowable to the insurer, upsets the actuarial basis and justification for title insurance. Common sense supports the application of an exclusion to such situations[.]" recorded lien or encumbrance of which the proposed is aware.[74] The insurer has the right to amend the commitment to except the matter. See §6.7 regarding amendment of the commitment. If the proposed insured does not disclose a title matter and agrees to buy subject to it, the disclosure exclusion is carried forward into the policy as Exclusion 3(a), as a matter the insured has assumed or agreed to. See §6.8 regarding reliance under the commitment.

When the proposed insured is aware of the title matter before closing, the disclosure provision of the commitment reinforces Exclusions 3(a) and 3(b) of the policy. The exclusions and the commitment disclosure provision were all found applicable in Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co. v. Ozark Global, L.C.[75] Similarly, in Kirwan v. Chicago Title Ins. Co.,[76] the court found that, when the insured failed to disclose an adverse title claim before closing, the matter was removed from coverage under Exclusion 3(b):

> The clear language of the commitment allows Chicago Title to exclude or limit coverage on Schedule B when the policy is issued for an adverse claim which comes to light after the commitment but before the policy is issued. However, nondisclosure results in a new and undisclosed adverse claim being excluded from coverage. By the time the Kirwans disclosed the Vanderwerfs' claim, the commitment had "evaporated" by its express terms and the policy controlled ... .

The disclosure provision is an acknowledgment that the title insurance applicant makes representations about the risk to be insured, as does any other insurance applicant. Misrepresentation may include the willful suppression of a fact material to the risk.[77]

[74] See Universal Title Ins. Co. v. NCNB National Bank of Florida, 532 So. 2d 736 (Fla. App. 1988) (knowledge of prior mortgage was question of fact preventing summary judgment in favor of insured). However, in Archambo v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 646 N.W.2d 170 (Mich. 2002), the court found that the proposed insured had no duty to disclose a recorded federal tax lien against himself. It said: "[t]he policy does not require the disclosure of known recorded liens, and thus plaintiff is not excluded from coverage under § 3(b) of the policy." The court may have been influenced by the insured's testimony that he thought the lien had expired. In First Nat'l Bank of Jeanerette v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 2010 WL 3734056 (W.D.La.) (unpublished), findings adopted in 2010 WL 3734020 (W.D.La.) (unpublished), the court found an insured lender obligated to inform the title insurer of a federal tax lien that appeared on the credit report and automated loan underwriting report, but not the commitment, and that its failure to inform the insurer caused the lender to "suffer" the lien. In Gardner Group, LLC v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 2017 WL 193165 (D.Kan.) (unpublished), the seller was found to have had an affirmative duty to disclose to the buyer the existence of a recorded easement that the seller had granted that was not excepted in the title commitment. The court did not find that the seller's duty ran to the title insurer. However, the court supported its ruling with a title insurance decision, Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. Dude, 708 F.3d 1191 (10th Cir. 2013), in which the affiant concealed facts about a recorded mortgage in an owner's affidavit. Dude is further discussed at §5.11.

[77] For example, the proposed insured may not withhold the knowledge that the title evidence on which the policy is based fails to show mortgages of record. Applefield v. Commercial Standard Ins. Co., 176 So.2d 366 (Fla.App. 1965). In Kirwan v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 9 Neb.App. 372, 612 N.W.2d 515 (Neb.App. 2000), aff'd 261 Neb. 609, 624 N.W.2d 644 (2001), the court made two analogies to other lines of insurance to illustrate the fact that the disclosure requirement

> It is well settled that, where an application for insurance has been submitted to an insurer and, before the policy is issued, a change of conditions material to the risk occurs or is discovered by the applicant, he is under an obligation to inform the insurer promptly. The knowing suppression or failure to make timely disclosure of such information constitutes a material misrepresentation.[78]

The commitment disclosure duty corresponds with Exclusion 3(b). See §11.3.4 regarding the types of matters which the proposed insured has a duty to disclose before the policy is issued, and §11.3.1 as to misrepresentation and concealment.

6.7 Gap Exception; Amendment Or Rescission Of Commitment

The commitment excepts from coverage all matters which occur, or for which notice is first recorded, between the effective date of the commitment and the date on which the insured gets an interest which is valid as to the rest of the world. Two provisions of the commitment directly pertain. The first is the right to amend the commitment to add matters existing as of the original effective date, but not shown. Condition 2 of the 2006 ALTA Commitment for Insurance states: in the title insurance commitment is a universal insurance concept, and thus not a trap for the unwary, as they had claimed. In Kirwan, the proposed insureds got a letter several days before closing advising that Vanderwerf claimed an interest in the property to be sold. The court found that the insurer had no duty to defend or indemnify. It said: "The Kirwans' position that Chicago Title cannot exclude coverage for the Vanderwerf litigation, given that it was not of record or disclosed, is tantamount to a driver buying automobile insurance on Monday and complaining because the insurance company will not cover the accident occurring 2 days before on Saturday." ... The disclosure enables the insurer to assess the risk, describe it as it wants in Schedule B 'Exceptions from Coverage,' and charge a premium which is reflective of the risk being carried. The insured can then determine whether the coverage set forth in the policy, with exceptions, is worth the proposed premium. The fact that the adverse claim later proves nonmeritorious does not dispense with the insurer's understandable desire to know what the insured knows and which is not of record. In this way, the insurer can assess the risk posed by the adverse claim uncovered after the commitment, but before the policy is issued. We have little doubt that if this was a health care policy with exclusions for known preexisting conditions, a claim that a known but undisclosed condition such as leukemia should be covered because its treatment later proved successful, would likely not succeed in the patient's suit for the cost of treatment. The Kirwans' argument is similarly unpersuasive." The Kirwans also argued that the interest claimed in the letter was not sufficiently material to require disclosure. The Kirwans said that what they got was just "a vague, threatening letter from a South Dakota lawyer claiming his client had an interest in the land. The letter ambiguously claimed either a right to sale proceeds for the land, or an interest in title. Neither the buyers nor their attorney took the threat seriously; in any event, the transaction had already closed." The court said that it was not the insured's position to decide what was material. It found that, no matter how it might be characterized, the interest claimed in the letter was excluded because the insured did not tell the insurer about it. The letter to the Kirwans was from an attorney and clearly asserted that the Vanderwerfs had either a right to the sale proceeds or an interest in title to the land. That is all the Kirwans needed to know in order to alert Chicago Title to this "adverse claim." Whether they believed it to be meritorious and serious is completely beside the point. Once the Kirwans got notice, they were duty bound to give notice to Chicago Title, and since they failed to do so, the policy, which was issued and superseded the binder, excluded the Vanderwerfs' claim from coverage."

> … If the proposed Insured shall disclose such knowledge to the Company, or if the Company otherwise acquires actual knowledge of any such defect, lien, encumbrance, adverse claim or other matter, the Company at its option may amend Schedule B of this Commitment accordingly, but such amendment shall not relieve the Company from liability previously incurred pursuant to paragraph 3 of these Conditions.[79]

See §6.6 regarding the proposed insured's duty to disclose actual knowledge of defects.

The 2006 form commitment was replaced by the ALTA Commitment for Title Insurance, adopted on August 1, 2016. The ALTA voted to decertify the 2006 form as of December 31, 2017. Condition 4 of the 2016 ALTA Commitment for Title Insurance states:

> The Company may amend this Commitment at any time. If the Company amends this Commitment to add a defect, lien, encumbrance, adverse claim, or other matter recorded in the Public Records prior to the Commitment Date, any liability of the Company is limited by Commitment Condition 5. The Company shall not be liable for any other amendment to this Commitment.

The insurer may discover a title defect after the commitment is issued but before the transaction closes. This may be the result of the insurer's own re-examination of the records, or the prompting of a party to the transaction. When the insurer obtains such knowledge, from whatever source, it has the right to either amend or rescind the commitment.[80] A report of the actions of the ALTA Forms [79] Similar language is found in earlier versions of the commitment.

[80] Sullivan v. Tomgil Building Corp., 46 Misc.2d 613, 260 N.Y.S.2d 465 (Sup. Ct. 1965). When the proposed insured already knew of the matter before insurer added it to the commitment, there were no reliance damages incurred by the insurer's failure to report the matter originally. In Kirwan v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 9 Neb.App. 372, 612 N.W.2d 515 (Neb.App. 2000), aff'd 261 Neb. 609, 624 N.W.2d 644 (2001), the court illustrated the relationship between the right to amend and the assumption of risk under the commitment: "The fact is that the policy commitment is written to force the insured to disclose known potential adverse claims not of record so that Chicago Title can amend Schedule B (the matters not insured against) to include an adverse claim which arises after the commitment is issued, but before the policy is issued. The ability to amend the schedule is expressly provided for in paragraph 2 of the conditions and stipulations of the commitment, and thus there was no representation that late-disclosed adverse claims could not be excluded by the policy issued after the commitment. The Kirwans' position that Chicago Title cannot exclude coverage for the Vanderwerf litigation, given that it was not of record or disclosed, is tantamount to a driver buying automobile insurance on Monday and complaining because the insurance company will not cover the accident occurring 2 days before on Saturday. The clear language of the commitment allows Chicago Title to exclude or limit coverage on Schedule B when the policy is issued for an adverse claim which comes to light after the commitment but before the policy is issued." The insurer was found to be entitled to amend the commitment when it learned that the legal description was incorrect, in Michak v. Transnation Title Ins. Co., 148 Wash.2d 788, 64 P.3d 22 (Wash. 2003). The court rejected the argument that the insurer had no such right: "Indeed, the implication that Transnation was not at liberty to correct the legal description once it had, in Michak's words, 'failed to uncover the release of this easement when it prepared its Commitment,' … runs counter to this court's decision in Barstad v. Stewart Title Guaranty Co., 145 Wash.2d 528, 39 P.3d 984 (2002). There, this court made clear that "a preliminary commitment is not a representation of the condition of title, but a 'statement of terms and conditions upon which the issuer is willing to issue its title policy, if such offer is accepted.' … As Transnation has observed, by permitting no correction of the legal description, the Court of Committee about the 2016 modification explained that this new language clarifies "the insurer's right to amend the commitment for matters appearing in the public records at commitment date that are not included as a requirement or an exception."[81] Stated differently, the 2016 amendment to the commitment removes any such implication that could be found in the language of Condition 2 of the 2006 and earlier commitment forms.

The commitment also excepts matters in the "gap" between the effective date of the commitment and the recording of the instrument to be insured:

> 2. Schedule B of the policy or policies to be issued will contain exceptions to the following matters unless the same are disposed of to the satisfaction of the Company:
> Defects, liens, encumbrances, adverse claims or other matters, if any, created, first appearing in the public records or attaching subsequent to the Effective Date but prior to the date the proposed Insured acquires for value of record the estate or interest or mortgage thereon covered by this Commitment.

The "gap" exception is a general exception for all matters which first affect the property after the effective date. The insurer has no duty to discover matters in the "gap" unless it undertakes that responsibility by some affirmative act.[82] When the effective date is extended, either before or after closing, the insurer may remove the general exception and insert as specific exceptions any matters it finds in the "gap." The gap exception is not waived or removed unless the proposed insured negotiates that coverage with the insurer.[83]

Insurers may be induced by a variety of means to protect against matters in the recording gap. At a "New York-style" table closing, this is accomplished by the insurer removing the gap exception and extending the effective date of the commitment to the expected date of recording. The insurer typically delivers the insured instruments for recording. In escrow states, the escrow instructions

Appeals majority effectively 'transformed Transnation's preliminary commitment into an abstract of title, a guarantee of the condition of the title,' and 'impose[d] duties upon Transnation which exist neither by statute [n]or in the applicable document itself.'" In Michak, the Supreme Court also reversed the court of appeals' ruling that an amendment to the commitment would be effective only if the proposed insured actually knew of the amendment and understood its effect.

However, an insurer was found to have a duty to disclose a restriction recorded after the effective date of the commitment but before closing, because it was notarized by an officer of the title agency and disclosed by other commitments to insure issued the same date. Tess v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 251 Neb. 501, 557 N.W.2d 696 (1997). Also, a title insurer was denied summary judgment as to a matter that it alleged fell within the recording gap, because the insureds asserted that the policy was issued without exception for the gap matter, but without further comment by the court on the effect of the gap exception, in Boyce v. Cassese, 941 So.2d 932 (Ala. 2006).

usually require the escrowee to obtain an update of title immediately before breaking escrow. See §13.1 for further discussion of this and other closing styles.

The insurer is not obligated to protect against matters in the gap unless it binds itself to that coverage in some fashion. Thus, when an escrow company was instructed not to break escrow unless the insurer was prepared to issue a policy free of any intervening matters, it was the escrowee's obligation to obtain that assurance from the insurer. The insurer, for its part, was not obligated to protect against a gap lien by paying funds and recording the documents, at the escrowee's direction, especially given the fact that the insurer never saw the escrow instructions regarding the state of title.[84]

In a "New York-style" closing, the insurer may be liable for gap liens that result from delayed recording of the insured instruments, whether or not the delay is the insurer's fault. In Banco Popular De Puerto Rico v. First American Title Ins. Co.,[85] for example, the mortgage to be insured was rejected by the register of deeds the first time it was delivered for recording. As a result, a judgment obtained priority over the mortgage before its eventual recording. The agent nonetheless issued a policy free of the judgment. The insurer was found liable on the policy, not on negligence in the recording process.

The gap exception applies to matters after the effective date of the title insurance commitment. Therefore, its removal does not protect the insured against matters that existed prior to the effective date and which are not covered because of other exceptions in the commitment.[86]

To be effective, the insurer must advise the proposed insured of the amendment to the commitment before the transaction is consummated. When the insurer accepted escrow instructions obligating it to issue the policy in a certain form, it was not permitted to add an easement to Schedule B without advising the proposed insured before breaking escrow.[87] If the insurer conducts a table (non-escrow) closing, it should tell the proposed insured of the additional matter to be added to the policy before the closing is consummated.

Sometimes, the defect is so fundamental that the insurer is not willing to insure the transaction once it is made aware of the matter. In such a case, the insurer may rescind the offer to insure.[88] The insurer is well advised to promptly cancel a commitment in writing, and return with the letter any premium paid. The insurer does not waive the right to cancel a commitment by accepting

The insured argued that he obtained coverage against the contract purchaser by removal of the gap exception. payment of premium, but has a duty to return premium if it refuses the risk.[89]

If the insurer cancels the commitment, it has a duty to pay losses incurred by the proposed insured in clearing or attempting to obtain title in reliance on the commitment.[90] See §6.9 regarding damages under the commitment.

6.8 Reliance On Commitment

FORM 31, Appendix A
No reliance on commitment

As a condition to making a claim under the commitment, the proposed insured must prove that it relied on the commitment. Condition 3 of the 2006 ALTA Commitment for Insurance states:

> Liability of the Company under this Commitment shall be only to the named proposed Insured and such parties included under the definition of Insured in the form of policy or policies committed for and only for actual loss incurred in reliance hereon in undertaking in good faith (a) to comply with the requirements hereof, or (b) to eliminate exceptions shown in Schedule B, or (c) to acquire or create the estate or interest or mortgage thereon covered by this Commitment. In no event shall such liability exceed the amount stated in Schedule A for the policy or policies committed for and such liability is subject to the insuring provisions and Conditions and the Exclusions from Coverage of the form of policy or policies committed for in favor of the proposed Insured which are hereby incorporated by reference and are made a part of this Commitment except as expressly modified herein.

The 2016 ALTA Commitment for Title Insurance contains Condition 5, which adds several important limitations to the proposed insured's right to recover for reliance damages:

> 5. LIMITATIONS OF LIABILITY
> (a) The Company's liability under Commitment Condition 4 is limited to the Proposed Insured's actual expense incurred in the interval between the Company's delivery to the Proposed Insured of the Commitment and the delivery of the amended Commitment, resulting from the Proposed Insured's good faith reliance to:
> (i) comply with the Schedule B, Part I—Requirements;
> (ii) eliminate, with the Company's written consent, any Schedule B, Part II—Exceptions; or > (iii) acquire the Title or create the Mortgage covered by this Commitment.
> (b) The Company shall not be liable under Commitment Condition 5(a) if the Proposed Insured requested the amendment or had Knowledge of the matter and did not notify the Company about it in writing.

(c) The Company will only have liability under Commitment Condition 4 if the Proposed Insured would not have incurred the expense had the Commitment included the added matter when the Commitment was first delivered to the Proposed Insured.

(d) The Company's liability shall not exceed the lesser of the Proposed Insured's actual expense incurred in good faith and described in Commitment Conditions 5(a)(i) through 5(a)(iii) or the Proposed Policy Amount.

(e) The Company shall not be liable for the content of the Transaction Identification Data, if any.

(f) In no event shall the Company be obligated to issue the Policy referred to in this Commitment unless all of the Schedule B, Part I—Requirements have been met to the satisfaction of the Company.

(g) In any event, the Company's liability is limited by the terms and provisions of the Policy.

The policy, by contrast, does not state an explicit reliance requirement. The reason this provision exists in the commitment is that, under the commitment, loss is measured as the costs incurred by the proposed insured in attempting to close the transaction up to the time the commitment is amended or cancelled.

The requirement of reliance also dictates the elements of damage that may be claimed in a claim under a commitment. For example, assume that a valid easement was not disclosed under the commitment or policy, and that the claim was resolved by payment of money to the insured. Under the policy, the measure of loss would ordinarily be the diminution in value to the land caused by the easement. Under the commitment, by contrast, the proposed insured's loss would usually equal the cash outlay made by that party in justifiable reliance on the status of title as originally shown in the commitment. The insurer is not liable under the commitment for the diminution in the property's value as a result of the easement. It also has no duty to clear the easement from the title on behalf of the proposed insured.

A proposed insured proves reliance on the commitment by showing that it took actions to obtain or clear title while proceeding on the mistaken assumption that title was in the condition shown. Reliance must be justified. A proposed insured that actually knows about the title matter not shown on the commitment has no right to rely. For example, in JIJ Corp. v. Yamato Development Canada, Inc.,[91] a litigation guarantee was issued that did not except a deed of trust. The insurer apparently removed the deed of trust because a reconveyance was recorded. However, a short time later, a document was recorded purporting to revoke the reconveyance. The guarantee was amended to show the deed of trust a week after it was issued. The revocation was not excepted in the guarantee, but the insurer sent a copy of the document to the attorney who ordered the commitment. The court found that the attorney and client had no right to rely on the guarantee as a representation that the deed of trust had been extinguished. Further, because the guarantee was amended after only one week, there was no evidence that any damage was incurred during the short time in which it failed to show the deed of trust.

The proposed insured cannot prove reliance when it receives the commitment after it obtains title. A lack of reliance may be established when the proposed insured did not apply for title insurance until after taking title.[92] A proposed insured cannot establish reliance on a commitment if it is issued before closing but the insured admits that he or she did not review it.[93] If the insurer cannot establish that a proposed institutional lender did not review the commitment, it will typically have to overcome the lender's assertion that it customarily does review the commitment before closing a loan.[94] A proposed insured that does not close on the transaction, whether a purchase or loan, may collect from the insurer only those expenses it is able to prove it incurred in reliance on the state of title as shown in the commitment, in eliminating title exceptions or in taking action to obtain the interest in the property that was to have been insured.[95] The fact that coverage is conditioned on reliance does not make the commitment illusory:

Conversely, when the proposed insured testified that he did not see the commitment before closing, the insurer was unable to establish his knowledge of a mortgage disclosed on the commitment but not the policy. Thus, the insurer was not permitted to reform the policy based on mutual mistake. Baumann v. Puget Sound Title Ins. Co., 184 Wash. 9, 49 P.2d 914 (1935). Similarly, in Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co. v. Ozark Global, L.C., 956 F.Supp. 989 (S.D.Ala. 1997), the insured ordered the title insurance policy after receiving its conveyance. Further, the deed recited six state tax liens to which the property was subject. The commitment did not. The court found no liability under the commitment, saying: "Global's non-reliance upon Commonwealth for advisement as to whether the purchased land was encumbered is of utmost importance, for this fact displaces the general rule that a title insurer is liable for all title defects not specifically listed as exceptions to coverage." Id at 4. However, the insurer was not entitled to reform the policy to make exception for the tax liens, because the mistake was not mutual. Id. at 6.

An assignee of a deed of trust did not rely on a commitment prepared for another party and which the assignee did not review before purchasing the loan. White v. West, 1996 WL 585267 (Wash.App.Div. 2) (unpublished).

[94] In Shamrock Bank of Florida v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 1304694 (S.D.Ill. 2014) (unpublished), a third party testified that the bank was aware of the encumbrance not shown in the commitment, and the evidence about when the commitment was delivered to the lender was equivocal. The court accepted the testimony of the lender that it would not typically close a commercial loan without first reviewing the title insurance commitment.

[95] In George v. Lemay Bank and Trust Co., 618 S.W.2d 671 (Mo.App. 1980), the proposed buyer did not prove that he suffered any loss or expense as a result of encumbrances on the property, when he elected not to close on the purchase. Similarly, in Tess v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 251 Neb. 501, 557 N.W.2d 696 (1997), an insurer was not liable to a purchaser for having failed to disclose a restriction on a commitment, because the buyer "did not see the title insurance commitment prior to closing and did not rely upon any representations in the commitment in deciding to proceed to closing in this matter. As such, we determine that any alleged acts of [insurer] in failing to note the protective covenants ... are not the proximate cause of any damage to [insured]." Tess is discussed in Comment, Title Insurance Law Newsletter, January 1997, p. 3. See the introduction to this text for further information about that periodical.

> Chicago Title's promise under the title commitment is neither empty nor optional. The commitment only excludes recovery for damages caused by a defect in title if the insured did not rely on the commitment to acquire the title. It clearly covers losses suffered by an insured who relies on the commitment. Such a promise is not illusory, but contingent upon the loss occurring after the insurance takes effect.[96]

A person who is already the owner of the land will not typically be able to establish that he or she took action in reliance on the state of title as shown in the title insurance commitment, particularly if the title issue is a matter created or allowed by the owner, or which attaches to the property due to that person's ownership of the property.[97]

However, some courts have permitted people already in title to recover under title insurance commitments, when the title matter not excepted in the commitment also was not known to the proposed insured and the insurer did not establish that the owner ordered insurance in order to get coverage against a known defect in title.[98] See §11.3.3 for a complete discussion of cases in which the insurer has asserted Exclusion 3(b) as to matters that the insured concealed or misrepresented in applying for insurance.

To some extent, the reliance requirement of the commitment is also carried forward into the policy in Exclusion 3(a), for matters "created, suffered, assumed or agreed to" by the insured. In Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. Research Loan & Invest. Corp.,[99] the purchaser applied for insurance

[96] W.E. Erickson Const., Inc. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 641 N.E.2d 861, 864 (Ill.App. 1994).

[97] In W.E. Erickson Const., Inc. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 641 N.E.2d 861 (Ill.App. 1994), a purchaser ordered a title insurance commitment two days after obtaining a deed to the property. The Army Corps of Engineers notified the proposed insured that it claimed title to the property. The insurer cancelled the commitment when it was notified of the claim. The court ruled that the insurer was permitted to cancel the commitment, and that the lack of reliance was a bar to any loss payable under the commitment. In Edwards v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 575953 (Ariz.App. 1 Div. 2014) (unpublished), the court dismissed an action brought by an insured owner against the insurer for fraud, due to its failure to include exceptions in the commitment or policy for two judgments that had been entered against the insured and that automatically attached to the property when he took title.

[98] In Fohn v. Title Ins. Corp. of St. Louis, 529 S.W.2d 1 (Mo. 1975), the insureds already owned the property when they applied for title insurance, but were not aware of the title defect when they applied for insurance. The court found that their lack of reliance on the commitment did not void coverage for the defect. It relied on this statement from 45 C.J.S. Insurance § 968, p. 1162: "A present owner who insures his own title, which subsequently proves to be defective, although in fact he has lost nothing because he never did have the interest he supposed he had, may recover for the loss of what he supposedly had… ." Similarly, in Laabs v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 72 Wis.2d 503, 241 N.W.2d 434 (1976), the insured requested a policy after owning the property for some time. The insurer presented evidence that she was aware of the boundary line dispute against which she obtained coverage by presenting a survey, and the neighbor brought suit not long afterward. However, the court refused to rescind the insurance or to apply Exclusions 3(a) or 3(b) because there was no proof that the insured had definite knowledge, when she applied, that the lawsuit was imminent. In Livingston v. American Title & Ins. Co., 133 So.2d 483 (Fla.App. 1961), the proposed insured discovered that there was a title defect and then did not close. The fact that the insured had not parted with any money was an affirmative defense to his claim under the commitment loss.

shortly after obtaining the deed. The purchase agreement obligated the insured to assume all existing obligations affecting the real estate. The court concluded that the insured had agreed to accept title in whatever form it was later revealed to be:

> If Research had applied for title insurance prior to closing the deal we would have an entirely different situation. In that event, it would be reasonable to conclude that Research was relying on the title insurer to advise it of the true state of the record title and intended to assume, in the context of the policy condition, only those obligations which the title search revealed. However, in this case the application for title insurance was made after the deal had been closed and there is no evidence showing that Research was relying on the title insurer to advise it of encumbrances. The only possible conclusion is that the "assumed or agreed to" condition applies to the four Berg deeds of trust since Research did assume by deed all existing obligations, did not rely on the title insurer to advise it of encumbrances, and did have reason to believe the prior owners had placed such encumbrances on the property.[100]

Sometimes, the commitment contains an exception for a matter, but the policy does not include the same exception. In such cases, the insurer may seek to reform the policy on the grounds of mutual mistake. See §11.2.3 for a complete discussion of reformation of the policy.

6.9 Measure Of Loss Under Commitment

FORM 31, Appendix A
No reliance on commitment

The classes of damage payable under the commitment are as stated in Condition 3 of the 2006 ALTA Commitment for Insurance, which says:

> Liability of the Company under this Commitment shall be only to the named proposed Insured and such parties included under the definition of Insured in the form of policy or policies committed for and only for actual loss incurred in reliance hereon in undertaking in good faith (a) to comply with the requirements hereof, or (b) to eliminate exceptions shown in Schedule B, or (c) to acquire or create the estate or interest or mortgage thereon covered by this Commitment. In no event shall such liability exceed the amount stated in Schedule A for the policy or policies committed for and such liability is subject to the insuring provisions and Conditions and the Exclusions from Coverage of the form of policy or policies committed for in favor of the proposed Insured which are hereby incorporated by reference and are made a part of this Commitment except as expressly modified herein.

The liability provision of the 2016 ALTA Commitment for Insurance, found in Condition 5, is recited in §6.8. The proper measure of loss is the expenses incurred by a named proposed insured in taking action to purchase or clear title to the property, in reliance on the title as described in the commitment. The 2016 ALTA Commitment for Insurance puts a cap on liability, found at Condition 5(d), which states:

> The Company's liability shall not exceed the lesser of the Proposed Insured's actual expense incurred in good faith and described in Commitment Conditions 5(a)(i) through 5(a)(iii) or the Proposed Policy Amount.

Thus, while the measure of loss under a policy for an omitted lien would be the amount of the lien, the proper measure of loss under the commitment might be the sums spent attempting to remove the lien, or to obtain title in the event the lien thwarted that attempt. When the proposed insured discovered that there was a record title defect and then did not close, he stated a cause of action for breach of the commitment. However, the fact that the insured had not parted with any money was an affirmative defense to loss.[101]

6.10 Commitment Exceptions

A title insurance commitment contains Schedule B-II, which recites exceptions for matters that affect the title to the parcel to be insured. Exceptions are discussed in full in Chapter 12. So-called special exceptions are discussed at §12.7. The claim that a title insurance commitment is in the nature of an abstract of title is discussed in Chapter 15. These special duties notwithstanding, the commitment itself provides that the exclusive remedy under the commitment is according to its terms. See §6.11 for further discussion of the exclusive-remedy provision.

Because of the commitment's purpose of providing information in addition to committing to insure risk, much information is provided in a commitment which it is not appropriate to include in a policy. For example, the commitment may contain an array of facts regarding taxes, including the tax parcel number, amount of last year's taxes, amount of any installments due, information regarding charges which do not rise to the level of assessments, special assessments, water, sewer and utility charges, and the fact that the property is in a tax incremental financing or special services tax zone. This is useful information for the person doing tax prorations for the closing statement. However, it has no place in the policy, which should contain a simple statement as to the tax liens affecting the property. Information is sometimes conveyed in a commitment in the form of a "note," or is labeled "for information only."[102] Insurers in every jurisdiction have an obligation not to intentionally misrepresent the status of title.[103] In some jurisdictions, an insurer may "insure over" a title matter. See §3.4.4 for a complete discussion of that subject.

[101] Livingston v. American Title & Ins. Co., 133 So.2d 483 (Fla.App. 1961).

[102] It is not proper to label the entire commitment in such fashion. "The words 'Preliminary report only. No liability hereunder' printed on the litigation report are not sufficient to exculpate the title company from responsibility for its own negligent acts. An agreement insulating one from liability for his own negligence must specifically so provide and is strictly construed against the party asserting the exemption, especially where he is the author of the agreement [citations omitted]." Viotti v. Giomi, 230 Cal.App.2d 730, 41 Cal.Rptr. 345 (Cal.App. 1 Dist. 1964).

6.11 Commitment Terms As Exclusive Remedy

Condition 4 of the 2006 ALTA Commitment states that the sole remedy of the proposed insurer for breach by the insurer shall be as provided by the terms of the commitment:

> This Commitment is a contract to issue one or more title insurance policies and is not an abstract of title or a report of the condition of title. Any action or actions or rights of action that the proposed Insured may have or may bring against the Company arising out of the status of the title to the estate or interest or the status of the mortgage thereon covered by this Commitment must be based on and are subject to the provisions of this Commitment.

In W.E. Erickson Construction, Inc. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co.,[104] the court found that a claim of negligent misrepresentation in the title insurance commitment was barred by this provision.

6.12 Collecting Premiums And Cancellation Charges; Pirating Of Commitment Information

Because the title insurance commitment is a valuable source of information as well as an offer to insure, the failure of a proposed insured to pay the premium is more than merely a rejection of the offer to insure. There are three general categories of situations in which the premium is not paid, with different results for each.

First, the proposed insured may obtain the interest which was to be insured, but elect not to purchase the title insurance. Such a party is not an insured, as discussed above. Nonetheless, the party may be found obligated to pay for the reasonable cost of producing the information which he or she relied on in closing the transaction.

When the transaction closes, the insurer may also seek payment from the party who ordered the title work. An attorney who orders title insurance on behalf of a client may be liable personally for payment of the premium, but only when the attorney expresses his or her intent to be personally liable for the premium. This may be established by a pattern of conduct over time.[105] An insurer may refuse to issue title work for a person unless the ordering party guarantees payment.[106]

[103] In Milbrandt v. Huber, 149 Wis. 2d 275, 440 N.W. 2d 807 (Wis.App. 1989), the title agency apparently intentionally made its commitment appear to show one Huber in title, when in fact title was vested in Mathes. The court affirmed summary judgment for the insurer, however, based on the fact that there was no evidence that a premium was ever paid.

[106] In Williams v. Blount, 741 P.2d 595 (Wyo. 1987), the title insurer told a bank officer that it would not do title work

Second, the proposed insured may not close the transaction. In such cases, the party cannot obtain insurance, but again may be obligated to pay for the labor incurred by the title insurer, particularly if the parties had agreed in advance that a cancellation fee would be owed.

In Lawyers' Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Kelly,[107] the transaction died. The court approved the insurer's cancellation fee, but refused to order the proposed insured to pay the full premium as if the transaction had taken place. Similarly, a cancellation fee of 50% of the premium was enforced in Inland Title Co. v. Comstock.[108] In Inland Title, a commitment was ordered by phone and delivered to the seller in contemplation of a sale. The owner asked for a revision of the commitment. No sale occurred. The court found that the commitment was an accepted offer, and thus a contract.[109] In C & W Manhattan Assoc. v. Attorney's Title Co. of Henderson County, Texas,[110] by contrast, the title agent made a claim in quantum meruit against the proposed insured for the benefit of its title search. The court rejected the claim, finding that the party had received no benefit.

> Prior to the time that appellant canceled the order for the title insurance, appellee updated the title examination and apparently was ready to issue the policy. This work, however, was performed by appellee for its own benefit and not for the benefit of appellant. Appellee, by updating the title, was merely apprising itself of the condition of the title in order that it may decide whether to issue a policy.[111]

In Eagle Land Title Agency, Inc. v. Affiliated Mortgage Co.,[112] the customer agreed in advance to pay for certain expenses plus 20% of the search and examination fee in the event of cancellation of a series of orders. Some orders closed and some did not. The cancellation agreement was found to be "valid as liquidated damages" and not a penalty, and therefore enforceable. However, a seller was not obligated to pay a title premium and document preparation fees charged by the title agent when the seller did not order the commitment, agree to pay the fees, or sell the property.[113] The title work was ordered by the broker after it found a buyer. The sellers elected not to sell. The court found no for a certain person "unless you guarantee payment because he is having financial difficulty." The statement about the party's financial condition was found protected by a conditional privilege, since it was a statement between two parties having an interest in the subject of the communication, and said honestly in order to protect that common interest. The party about whom the statement was made failed to prove malice, a requisite in a suit for defamation.

privity of contract between seller and title agent, and no promise to pay.

The intentional dissemination of a policy containing a mistake, done with the purpose of entrapping the recipient title agent into assuming the liability for the title defect, was found grounds for a judgment based on fraud in Executive Re Indemnity, Inc. v. National Title Resources Corp.[114] In this strange case of jealous rivalry, National Title was found liable in fraud for passing on an order to Network Title, its rival, with National's commitment attached. The order originally came to National as part of an existing claim based on a mortgage not disclosed in the commitment. Rather than issue the new policy itself, National sent the order and commitment to Network. Notes on the file copy of the commitment warning of the missed mortgage were intentionally whited out. When Network Title took the bait of preparing its commitment in reliance on the defective commitment, the owner of National "became very excited and told his employees that he had 'screwed'" the other company. After paying the claim, the underwriter for Network obtained judgment against National for fraud. The court rejected the argument that Network's negligence in failing to search the title should bar the judgment.

Third, the proposed insured may close the transaction but obtain insurance from another insurer. Of course, a party is free to choose its insurer. However, on occasion, the first insurer's work product is adopted wholesale by a second company, depriving the first insurer of the premium and allowing the second company to collect a premium without having invested any substantial labor. In this last situation, the proposed insured or the party who ordered the first commitment should be obligated to pay the reasonable cost of producing the title information, especially if that party has handed over the first title commitment to the second insurer with the express or implied agreement that the insurer will work from that information. However, as the cases below show, it is difficult for the first insurer to establish a cause of action directly against the second insurer in such a situation.

A title company may claim a copyright to the information in the commitment, and that a competitor violates those rights by copying the exceptions.[115] However, there is no copyright protection for "sweat of the brow"--that is, a copyright claim based solely "on the strength of sheer industry" it takes to compile non-original information.[116] In Mid-America Title Co. v. Kirk,[117] one company sued another, claiming that its copyright was violated when its commitment was copied word for word. The action survived a motion to dismiss for failure to state a claim on which relief may be granted. However, the court warned that the action would not make it past summary judgment if the defendant proved "that all examiners will seek out the same data and that, effectively, all title commitments will be essentially identical."[118] Similarly, in Pacific Title, Inc. v.

Pioneer National Title Ins. Co.,[119] Pioneer National Title appointed Pacific Title its agent in a certain county. Later, the agency contract was terminated and Pioneer appointed a new agent, to whom it gave copies of the policies issued by Pacific. The new agent used the policies as a "starter" title plant. Pacific sued Pioneer, claiming that it had an exclusive right to use the information in the policies. The court rejected the argument, holding that the agency contract made no provision that the policies would remain the property of the agent, or that Pioneer would not share the information with others. Further, the court found that the information in the policies was not "secret" or "confidential" trade information to which Pacific could claim an exclusive right, since it was derived from the public records and was not a patent-worthy invention, process or secret formula.

7 Insureds and Claimants

The benefits of a title insurance policy run to the insured. A claim administrator must determine if the claimant is the insured, particularly if the claimant is not the named insured shown on Schedule A of the policy. Also, if there has been a transfer of the property after the policy date, the claim administrator must determine if the grantee is a successor insured, or if the transfer has caused the policy to terminate. If a natural person who was the named insured has died, or if an entity insured has been dissolved, the administrator must determine which party has become the successor insured by operation of law. If the loan secured by the insured lien has been assigned, the administrator must determine if the claimant is the owner of the loan and thus the insured.

Issues concerning the named insured are discussed at §7.1. The policy also provides that certain other parties become insureds by succeeding to the interest of the named insured. Under the loan policy, a subsequent holder of the indebtedness is a successor insured, as discussed at §7.4. The subject of those parties who become successor insureds, either by operation of law or on a transfer of the property to a related party identified in the policy as a successor insureds, is discussed at §7.2. The Texas promulgated owner's policy also has a definition of successor insureds that is broader than the 1992 policy. The Texas definition is discussed at §7.6. The issue of the rights of parties who hold interests in or who are members of the named insured is discussed at §7.5. The claims made by parties who claim to be beneficiaries of the policy are discussed at §7.7.

Title insurance policies state that the policy terminates when the insured conveys the property to a purchaser, but continues in effect to protect the insured as long as the insured "retains an interest" in the property, or remains liable under covenants of warranty. The subject of the policy's continuation and termination is discussed at §7.3 (owner's policies) and §7.9 (loan policies).

7.1 Named Insured

Policy coverage is afforded to the named insured.[1] When the policy incorrectly names the [1] A policy must be issued in order for any party to obtain the status of insured. When no policy was issued, and the purported proposed insured discovered that the title insurance commitment it had received was fake, it never became an insured. Federal Deposit Ins. Corp. v. United General Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 3611835 (E.D.N.Y. 2014) (unpublished).

wrong party as the insured, it may be reformed to correct the named insured to conform to the parties' intent.[2]

An owner's policy may be issued to a party that owns a partial fee simple interest in the property. If the property is owned by more than one person or entity and not all owners obtain title insurance, the policy does not protect the owners who elected not to obtain insurance.[3]

A person who receives an interest in the property from an owner insured does not become an insured. For example, a person who later marries the insured does not become an insured by virtue of the marriage.[4] Such a grantee falls under the category of a "purchaser" from the insured who does not receive policy benefits. When two people are both insured as owners, the conveyance by one party to the other insured extinguishes the grantor's policy coverage, but the policy continues in effect as to the grantee insured.[5] However, if the named insured conveys a partial interest in the property, retaining the balance, the policy remains in effect in favor of the insured. The ALTA policies do not contain a term that would reduce the amount of insurance on a conveyance by the insured of a partial interest in the property. See §7.3, concerning the conditions that cause an owner's policy to terminate.

An essential tenet of insurance is that, to qualify for insurance, a party must have an insurable interest in the property. A party claiming rights through the insured may be deemed to have a sufficient interest in the property to qualify him or her to make a claim under the policy on behalf of the insured.[6] However, a party does not establish that it is an insured merely by proving that it holds

However, the same court refused to dismiss the action as to a claim on a file in which a title agent issued both a fake commitment and a fake policy.

[2] Title Ins. Co. of Minn. v. Costain Arizona, Inc., 164 Ariz. 203, 791 P. 2d 1086 (Ariz.App. 1990). In Stockton Mortgage, Inc. v. Tope, 233 Cal.App.4th 437, 183 Cal.Rptr.3d 186 (Cal.App. 3 Dist. 2014), reh.den. (Jan. 13, 2015), rev.den. (March 25, 2015), the loan policy named the trustee under the deed of trust as the insured. The beneficiary-lender, which was a related entity, assigned the loan. Then a tax debt was discovered and paid. The court held that the named insured, the trustee under the deed of trust, never had an insurable interest in the land or was the owner of the debt, and thus never had coverage, while the beneficiary of the deed of trust had already assigned the debt and was no longer an insured.

[3] In Mississippi Valley Title Ins. Co. v. Malkove, 540 So.2d 674 (Ala. 1988), title was vested in four people but the policy named only two as insureds. The court found that the policy provided no coverage to the non-insured property owners.

[4] In Van de Bovenkamp v. United Title Co., 2006 WL 3530473 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), the court held that the policy issued to an individual did not cover the interest of his spouse, whom he married after the policy date and who did not take title: "Nothing in the [complaint] asserted the existence of a contract or insurance policy to which she was a party. … As appellants concede, she was not involved in the purchase of the property and is not a title owner. That she is now married to Ernst and has been sued by the Developer does not give her standing to pursue a claim under a policy that could not have included her."

[6] In Warczak v. Attorneys' Title Guaranty Fund, Inc., 2015 WL 3884451, 2015 IL App (2d) 140677-U (Ill.App. 2 Dist. 2015) (unpublished), the court stated that, because Illinois courts have held that the beneficiary of a passive Illinois land trust is entitled to bring a lawsuit about land while it is titled in the name of the trustee, such a beneficiary also has an interest in the land that would be insurable.[7] See §7.5 concerning the rights of parties who have interests in the named insured.

The policy is not an assurance as between the named insureds as to what their respective rights in the property may be. Thus, the insurer is not obligated to defend one insured in a lawsuit brought by a co-owner to recharacterize their interests in the property.[8]

7.2 Successor Insureds Under Owner's Policy FORM 69, Appendix A Voluntary conveyance terminating coverage

All versions of the ALTA owner's policy provide that the definition of "insured" includes not only the named insured but also a party to whom title passes by operation of law from the named insured. Conditions and Stipulations 1(a) of the 1992 ALTA owner's policy states:

> "insured": the insured named in Schedule A, and, subject to any rights or defenses the Company may have had against the named insured, those who succeed to the interest of such insured by operation of law as distinguished from purchase, including, but not limited to, heirs, distributees, devisees, survivors, personal representatives, next of kin, or corporate or fiduciary successors.

the right to make a claim under a title insurance policy in which the trustee of the land trustee was the named insured.

[7] In Sandler v. New Jersey Realty Title Ins. Co., 36 N.J. 471, 178 A.2d 1 (1962), the named insured conveyed the property to his son, who later reconveyed the property to the father. The court held that the policy was revived when the insured reacquired an insurable interest in the property. See §7.3 for a complete discussion of cases that have considered the issue of when an owner's policy terminates. In Heyden v. Safeco Title Ins. Co., 175 Wis.2d 508, 498 N.W.2d 905 (Wis.App. 1 Dist. 1993), the court found that the corporation insured was the alter ego of its sole shareholder, and that the shareholder had an insurable interest in the real estate. The court extrapolated from its questionable ruling on insurable interest to a finding that the shareholder had standing as an insured. The New Jersey Supreme Court rejected a similar theory based on alter ego, however, noting that the doctrines of alter ego and piercing of the corporate veil are legal constructs used to allow creditors to get at assets that are being sheltered to defraud creditors. Those concepts are not used to determine who is insured under a policy. "Here, the Shotmeyers set up different, legitimate business structures to further their personal and business plans. They did not use their partnerships to commit fraud or defeat the ends of justice. The alter ego doctrine, therefore, does not apply." Shotmeyer v. New Jersey Realty Title Ins. Co., 195 N.J. 72, 87, 948 A.2d 600, 608 (N.J. 2008). Shotmeyer was cited with approval in the later New Jersey case of Carney-Dunphy v. Title Co. of Jersey & Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2009 WL 1874060 (D.N.J.) (unpublished).

[8] In Kachel v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 1999 WL 123807 (S.D.N.Y.) (unpublished) aff'd 2001 WL 527480 (S.D.N.Y.) (unpublished), the court held: "No matter what the respective rights are among the insureds, none of the insureds obtained insurance against title claims by their co-owners. Rather, they, as do all title insurance purchasers, sought to insure that the property they bought had free and clear title." Id. at *1. In Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. JDC (America) Corp. 818 F.Supp. 1543 (S.D.Fla. 1993), aff'd 52 F.3d 1575 (11th Cir. 1995), a loan policy was issued to a lender. The lender was also a member of the owner-borrower joint venture. When the lender foreclosed, the other joint venture members attacked the mortgage on the grounds that the lender was foreclosing against itself. The court found that the insurer had no duty to defend the action, because the policy was not intended to protect the insured against a dispute with its co-owners and borrowers.

Most transfers by "operation of law" occur as a result of a change in legal status of the insured, such as the death or dissolution of the titleholder, as discussed below. An agent of the named insured is not a successor insured.[9]

The sale of stock in an insured corporation is not a transfer of the real estate from the named insured. Therefore, a stock transfer does not invoke any term of the policy.[10] However, the stock purchaser does not become an insured.[11] In addition, the policy does not insure against any matter after the date of policy. Therefore, the purchaser of the stock ordinarily seeks an endorsement, where available, extending the date of policy. In addition, any knowledge of the outgoing officers, directors and employees continues to bind the insured corporation as to any title defect. This defense to coverage is partially or fully waived if the insurer issues a non-imputation endorsement at the time of the stock sale.

The terms "distributee" and "corporate successor" are not defined in the ALTA policies, but courts have supplied common sense definitions for those terms.[12] The 1992 ALTA Owner's policy

[9] In Alameda Corridor Trans. Authority v. Stewart Title Ins. Co. 2004 WL 2943877 (9th Cir.(Cal.)) (unpublished), the cities of Los Angeles and Long Beach bought a rail line. The claim involved an easement that crossed the property. The cities obtained a policy from Stewart Title that did not except the sewer easement. The cities incurred an expense in the relocation of the sewer that was borne by the Alameda Corridor Transportation Authority ("ACTA"). The cities and ACTA sued Stewart Title for the relocation cost. Stewart won on summary judgment before the district court, and the Ninth Circuit affirmed, saying: "Neither the purchase and sale agreement nor the insurance policy name ACTA as a grantee or an insured. The Cities also did not seek to add ACTA as an insured by paying for an additional endorsement. … Plaintiffs argue that ACTA became an insured under the policy 'by operation of law' when it contracted with the Cities to take responsibility for management and construction of the project. 'Operation of law' can be defined as '[t]he means by which a right or a liability is created for a party regardless of the party's actual intent.' Black's Law Dictionary 1124 (8th Ed. 2004). … Here, there is no basis for concluding that ACTA is a successor to any interest in the land by operation of law 'regardless of the party's actual intent.' Any interest it acquired was through the contract it intentionally entered into with the Cities. Because no insured party suffered loss or damage, plaintiffs' claims are excluded under Exclusion 9(c) of the policy." The case may be the first in which a party has claimed to be a successor insured because it took over management of the property.

[12] In Durbano & Garn Investment Co., LC v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2014 UT App 150, 330 P.3d 119 (Utah App. 2014), cert.den. 337 P.3d 295, Oct. 1, 2014, the court said that the most accurate meanings of the terms "distributee" and "corporate successor" should be inferred from the characteristics of the other terms in the definition. It said: "'That several items in a list share an attribute counsels in favor of interpreting the other items as possessing that attribute as well.' Beecham v. United States, 511 U.S. 368, 371 (1994). Here, all of the neighboring words listed in the policy--heirs, devisees, survivors, personal representatives, next of kin, and fiduciary successors--are descriptive of one who 'succeed[s] to the interest of the named insured' regardless of the successor’s intent. And while this type of transfer is generally not complete absent some affirmative act on the part of the successor—e.g., accepting delivery of an executor’s deed to effect a devise of property as called for in a will—the underlying rights and obligations to the property or interest 'come to the transferee without any act or cooperation on [its] part.' … See also Black’s Law Dictionary 1201 (9th ed.2009) (defining 'operation of law' as the 'means by which a right or a liability is created for a party regardless of the party’s actual intent'). Because the underlying rights and obligations devolve automatically by operation of law, the states that "corporate or fiduciary successors" are successor insureds. This refers to a successor to a named insured that held title in a fiduciary capacity, such as a trustee, and does not encompass the trustee of a new trust to whom the insured conveyed the property after date of policy.[13] See §7.3 for a complete discussion of the effect of a voluntary transfer by the named insured to a related party for no consideration.

The term "by operation of law" is also not defined in the policy, but almost every court has applied its standard definition, meaning a transfer that is automatic, and that occurs according to a legal principle or statute.[14] modest steps required to complete the transfer are merely confirmatory." In Kwok v. Transnation Title Ins. Co., 170 Cal.App.4th 1562, 89 Cal.Rptr.3d 141 (Cal.App. 2 Dist. 2009), rev.den. April 29, 2009, the Kwoks argued that, because no consideration changed hands and no transfer tax was paid on the conveyance from the insured LLC to them as trustees of a revocable trust, the deed was not a purchase, and every type of transfer other than a purchase falls under the "by operation of law" category of transfer. The court disagreed, saying: "But such an interpretation not only ignores the controlling phrase by operation of law, it deprives it of all meaning. A transfer can occur that does not involve a purchase, but nevertheless does not arise by operation of law. For example, a gift of the property may not involve the exchange of any consideration, but a donee cannot be said to succeed to the property by operation of law. A transfer of property by gift is clearly a voluntary act that does not arise automatically upon death or dissolution." 170 Cal.App.4th at 1571, 89 Cal.Rptr.3d at 148. In Butera v. Attorneys' Title Guar. Fund, Inc., 321 Ill.App.3d 601, 704 N.E.2d 949, 254 Ill.Dec. 537 (Ill.App. 1 Dist. 2001), a trustee deeded to a corporation controlled by the trust's beneficiaries. The court found that the corporation was found not a successor "distributee," because the trust was not dissolved, and the corporation would not have been the distributee by the trust's own terms if it had been dissolved: "While the Policy uses the term generally, a distribution from a trust does have a specific meaning. Black's Law Dictionary defines a trust distribution as "[t]he cash or other property paid or credited to a trust beneficiary." Black's Law Dictionary 488 (7th Ed. 1999)." In First American Title Ins. Co. v. Kessler, 452 So.2d 35 (Fla.App. 1984), the court used the commonly-accepted view of a distributee by operation of law, in finding that, when the insured trust dissolved, the policy continued in force in favor of the distributees of the trust. In Alameda Corridor Trans. Authority v. Stewart Title Ins. Co. 2004 WL 2943877 (9th Cir.(Cal.)) (unpublished), the court said: "'Operation of law' can be defined as '[t]he means by which a right or a liability is created for a party regardless of the party's actual intent.' Black's Law Dictionary 1124 (8th Ed. 2004). … Here, there is no basis for concluding that ACTA is a successor to any interest in the land by operation of law 'regardless of the party's actual intent.' Any interest it acquired was through the contract it intentionally entered into with the Cities."

[13] "A 'fiduciary successor,' more frequently called a 'successor fiduciary,' is a 'fiduciary who is appointed to succeed or replace a prior one.' Black's Law Dictionary 640 (7th ed.1999) (emphasis added)… In this case, the Trust did not succeed or replace any prior fiduciary--it simply was the entity to which Mrs. Carney voluntarily transferred her interest in the Property. The Trust thus was not a fiduciary successor." Carney-Dunphy v. Title Co. of Jersey & Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2009 WL 1874060 (D.N.J.) (unpublished). In Horowitz v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2017 WL 2836990 (D. Hawaii) (unpublished), the court held that individual grantees on several successive voluntary conveyances were not successor insureds by operation of law, because they were not assisting the insured entity in winding up its affairs.

[14] In Durbano & Garn Investment Co., LC v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2014 UT App 150, 330 P.3d 119 (Utah App. 2014), cert.den. 337 P.3d 295, Oct. 1, 2014, the court said the phrase means that "the underlying rights and obligations to the property or interest 'come to the transferee without any act or cooperation on [its] part.' … See also Black’s Law Dictionary 1201 (9th ed.2009) (defining 'operation of law' as the 'means by which a right or a liability is created for a party regardless of the party’s actual intent'). Because the underlying rights and obligations devolve automatically by operation of law, the modest steps required to complete the transfer are merely confirmatory." In Shotmeyer v. New Jersey Realty Title Ins. Co., 195 N.J. 72, 948 A.2d 600 (N.J. 2008), the court said that a transfer occurs by "operation of law" only when it is automatic or involuntary under the law. However, in North Fork Land & Cattle, LLLP v. First American Title Ins. Co., 362 P.3d 341, 2015 WY 150 (Wyo. 2015), the court refused to apply the legal meaning of the legal phrase "by operation of law," and the numerous decisions such as Shotmeyer that have

When the insured is a natural person, a party may become a successor insured on a transfer by operation of law if the party was an heir, distributee, devisee, survivor or next of kin. The successor insured must receive title after the death of the insured; a transfer by the insured during his or her life is not by operation of law.[15] The personal representative of the named insured's estate is also a successor insured, having the capacity to make a claim under the policy on behalf of the insured's estate.

When the insured is an entity, a party that takes title to the property by operation of law on the dissolution of the entity becomes a successor insured. In order for the transferee to qualify as a successor insured, the named insured must first be dissolved, and its assets distributed thereafter.[16] A transfer of the real estate before a dissolution of the insured entity does not qualify the transferee as an insured.[17] A voluntary dissolution of the insured entity causes the policy to terminate if the provided its ordinary definition. The court said that it wanted instead to consider "how a reasonable insured would understand the policy language," based on the phrase's "plain meaning." It resorted to various sources, such as a 1944 U.S. Supreme Court decision about a bank consolidation that interpreted the term "wholly by operation of law." The North Fork court concluded that three successive voluntary transfers, from the named insured to several related entities, were all by operation of law. The primary motivator behind the ruling appeared to be the court's determination that, if the insureds had held 2006 ALTA policies, at least the first such transferee might have been considered a successor insured.

[15] In Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. Ruggiri, 2013 WL 812502 (Conn.Super.) (unpublished), the court said that a deed from the insured to her husband was not by operation of law because the individual gave the deed while alive, even though it was in anticipation of her death while she was terminally ill. The deed terminated both the policy and the pending claim, which was in litigation; the policy claim was not an asset of the estate and the husband had no standing to sue.

Co.*, 184 N.J.Super. 282, 445 A.2d 1174 (Ch. 1981), aff'd in part, rev'd in part, 190 N.J.Super. 567, 464 A.2d 1177 (App.Div. 1983) (successor on corporate dissolution became the insured). In Grill v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 2011 WL 320422 (Cal.App. 3 Dist.) (unpublished), a corporation distributed the insured parcel of real estate to its shareholder as the corporation was being dissolved, and the insurer acknowledged that the shareholder became a successor insured.

[17] In Durbano & Garn Investment Co., LC v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2014 UT App 150, 330 P.3d 119 (Utah App. 2014), cert.den. 337 P.3d 295, Oct. 1, 2014, Durbano & Garn Investment Company bought land and got a policy in 1993. In 1994, it gave a quit claim deed to its related entity, Durbano Properties. Durbano Properties learned of a title problem when it contracted to sell the property in 2002. Durbano & Garn filed a claim. The court held that the policy had terminated, and rejected the argument that Durbano Properties was a "distributee" or "corporate successor" to the named insured. The court said that the most accurate meanings of the terms "distributee" and "corporate successor" should be inferred from the characteristics of the other terms in the definition. It said: "'That several items in a list share an attribute counsels in favor of interpreting the other items as possessing that attribute as well.' Beecham v. United States, 511 U.S. 368, 371 (1994). Here, all of the neighboring words listed in the policy--heirs, devisees, survivors, personal representatives, next of kin, and fiduciary successors--are descriptive of one who 'succeed[s] to the interest of the named insured' regardless of the successor’s intent. And while this type of transfer is generally not complete absent some affirmative act on the part of the successor—e.g., accepting delivery of an executor’s deed to effect a devise of property as called for in a will—the underlying rights and obligations to the property or interest 'come to the transferee without any act or cooperation on [its] part.' … See also Black’s Law Dictionary 1201 (9th ed.2009) (defining 'operation of law' as the 'means by which a right or a liability is created for a party regardless of the party’s actual intent'). Because the underlying rights and obligations devolve automatically by operation of law, the modest steps required to complete the transfer are merely confirmatory." Because the deed to the related entity was signed long before there was any plan to dissolve the insured corporation, the policy terminated when that deed was issued. In Kwok v. Transnation Title Ins. Co., successor entity is found not to have taken title by operation of law. In Fairway Development Co. v. Title Ins. Co. of Minn.,[18] the court held that the policy terminated when the title holding partnership was voluntarily terminated and a new one formed, because the successor reconstituted partnership did not receive title to the property by operation of law. This case spawned what is known as the Fairway endorsement, which provides that a reorganization of the insured partnership shall not cause the policy to terminate. The 2006 ALTA Owner's policy states that successor insureds include a successor to the named insured by "reorganization," a new term, which likely does away with the Fairway issue.

In some jurisdictions, title insurers offer endorsements that expressly recognize that a successor owner of the property is a successor insured, although the party did not take title by operation of law. These "successor owner" endorsements are of two types. The prospective version expands the definition of "insured" to include transferees in various classes, such as trustees of revocable trusts. The second type is issued after a transfer, and names the grantee as an insured.[19] Successor insured endorsements are available in many jurisdictions, permitting a transferee to become an insured if the endorsement is secured.[20] This fact emphasizes that a voluntary transferee does not have a reasonable expectation of coverage without such an endorsement.[21]

The ALTA Homeowner's Policy expands the list of successor insureds to include certain parties who obtain title other than by operation of law. Conditions 2.b of the 2010 version of that policy states:

b. This Policy also insures:
(1) anyone who inherits Your Title because of Your death;
(2) Your spouse who receives Your Title because of dissolution of Your marriage;
(3) the trustee or successor trustee of a Trust to whom You transfer Your Title after the Policy Date; or
(4) the beneficiaries of Your Trust upon Your death; or
(5) anyone who receives Your Title by a transfer effective on Your death as authorized by law.

This provision adds to the list of successors a trustee under either a living or testamentary trust, or a spouse who receives title to the property as part of a divorce proceeding.

The 2006 ALTA Owner's and Loan policies further expands the list of successor insureds who take title other than by operation of law. That policy's definition includes "successors to an Insured by its conversion to another kind of Entity." Also included is a grantee under a deed from an insured if "delivered without payment of actual valuable consideration" and if the insured is sole owner of the grantee, the grantee wholly owns the insured, or the insured and grantee are both owned by the same entity. "Entity" is defined as a corporation, partnership, trust, LLC or "other similar legal entity." The continuation provision (Conditions 2) has been similarly revamped to include successor entities of the classes listed in this definition. The language of these two definitions is elegantly simple, given the complexity of the issue.

The 2006 ALTA policies thus recognize as successor insureds the grantees in many types of voluntary transfers for no consideration in which the grantee was not a successor insured under the 1992 and prior policies, and that transfers in fact caused those policies to terminate.[22] There are limits to the spectrum of such grantees who become successor insureds, however. The 2006 ALTA policy language is unambiguous in saying that the insured must wholly own the grantee, or vice versa. A partnership that takes title from the named insured, but in which a party other than the named insured is also a partner, does not qualify as a successor insured, and the 2006 policy terminates on such a transfer. Further, in order for the grantee to qualify as a successor insured, the conveyance must be without payment of "actual valuable consideration." In Gebhardt Family Investment, L.L.C. v. Nations Title Ins. Co. of New York, Inc.,[23] the insureds argued that the conveyance to their own limited liability company was not a "purchase" because no consideration passed at the time of the deed. However, the court found the consideration to be in the fact that the deed "provided the Gebhardts with all of the benefits conferred by a Virginia limited liability company, including limited liability and certain estate planning benefits." Thus, it would appear that the Maryland court has already ruled that a shielding from liability is "actual valuable consideration."

[22] In Keys v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2012 WL 4510471 (S.D.Miss.) (unpublished), the insured individual got a 2006 policy. She submitted a claim on the policy, then transferred the property to herself as trustee of a revocable trust. When the insurer did not pay the claim, she sued it in her individual capacity only. The court held that she had standing to sue, particularly since she remained the insured in her capacity as trustee. The court also held that Ms. Keys, as trustee, did not have to submit a new notice of claim after she transferred the property to herself as trustee.

7.3 Owner's Policy Termination; Warranty Liability

The owner's title insurance policy continues in effect as to the named insured as long as the insured retains an estate or interest in the land, including a purchase-money mortgage, or has liability on warranties of title. The 2006 ALTA Owner's policy states:

> The coverage of this policy shall continue in force as of Date of Policy in favor of an Insured, but only so long as the Insured retains an estate or interest in the Land, or holds an obligation secured by a purchase money Mortgage given by a purchaser from the Insured, or only so long as the Insured shall have liability by reason of warranties in any transfer or conveyance of the Title. This policy shall not continue in force in favor of any purchaser from the Insured of either (i) an estate or interest in the Land, or (ii) an obligation secured by a purchase money Mortgage given to the Insured.

However, coverage under most forms of the ALTA owner's policy terminates when the insured makes a voluntary conveyance of the property.[24] The policy also terminates when the insured loses title involuntarily, such as on foreclosure, or when the insured disclaims his or her interest in [24] For example, in Washington Temple Church of God in Christ, Inc. v. Global Properties and Associates, Inc., 37 Misc.3d 1211(A), 2012 WL 5187556, 2012 N.Y. Slip Op. 51997(U) (N.Y.Sup. 2012) (unpublished), the court held that an owner's policy terminated when the insured sold the property, and that the insurer had no duty to defend the insured in a lawsuit about the property that was filed after the sale. See also Gebhardt Family Investment, L.L.C. v. Nations Title Ins. Co. of New York, Inc., 132 Md.App. 457, 752 A.2d 1222 (Md.App. 2000), and other cases cited in this section. However, in Cocco v. Hamilton, 2010 WL 2011003 (N.J.Super.A.D.) (unpublished), the court refused to find that the policy terminated on a sale by the insured to a purchaser, as to a claim made by the insured before the sale took place. The court did not even recite the provision of Conditions 2, which states that the policy does not continue in force in favor of a purchaser. Further, although the court overturned summary judgment in favor of the insurer, the decision did not unequivocally grant summary judgment in favor of the insured. In Back Creek Partners, LLC v. First American Title Ins. Co., 213 Md.App. 703, 75 A.3d 394 (Md.App. 2013), the court found that a lawsuit brought against the insureds after they sold the property, about matters that occurred after the policy date, for which the insureds tendered their defense only after trial, did not create a duty to defend, primarily because the policy terminated on the voluntary conveyance. In First American Title Ins. Co. v. Two Seventy Three Water Street, LLC, 2013 WL 811878 (Conn.Super.) (unpublished), the court found that a deed from the named insured (under an ALTA 1992 Owner's policy) to a new entity whose members were the same as the owners of the insured terminated the policy, and the insured did not retain an interest in the property after the conveyance. The fact that such a transfer would not cause the termination of a 2006 ALTA Owner's policy did not change the policy coverage. However, the court said there was a disagreement amongst the jurisdictions about whether or not such a transfer terminates the insured's pending claim. The insured had submitted a claim, and the insurer had made a disputed loss payment, before the transfer. Therefore, it did not grant summary judgment to the insurer. However, in North Fork Land & Cattle, LLLP v. First American Title Ins. Co., 362 P.3d 341, 2015 WY 150 (Wyo. 2015), the court used tortured reasoning to find that a voluntary transfer for no consideration did not cause the policy to terminate. The court acknowledged that its ruling was directly opposite many prior decisions to the contrary from other states.

the property.[25] A leasehold owner's policy terminates on the extinguishment, expiration or termination of the leasehold estate, or on the assignment of the leasehold interest from the insured to another party without warranty.[26] The insurer has no duty to defend an insured in a lawsuit filed after the policy has terminated.[27]

The ALTA Homeowner's Policy, by contrast, states that the policy "insures You forever, even after You no longer have Your Title." That phrase has been held to cause the policy to continue after a voluntary transfer by the insured.[28]

Conditions 2 of the 2006 ALTA Owner's policy says that it does not continue in effect in favor of a purchaser. Thus, a purchaser from the insured does not become an insured.[29] A voluntary [25] In Gumapac v. Deutsche Bank Nat'l Trust Co., 2012 WL 3150657 (C.D.Cal.) (unpublished), the court found that an owner's policy terminated when the insured's title was extinguished by foreclosure, after which time the owner could not suffer a loss due to the alleged defect in title. In Royale Westminster Retirement, LLC v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 2011 WL 2582101 (Cal.App. 4 Dist.) (unpublished), a title insurer was found not to have any duty to indemnify or defend a person who had already disclaimed any ownership in the property because his title stemmed from a forged deed.

However, in Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co. v. OMG Americas, Inc., 2012 WL 4856391 (D. Utah) (unpublished), the court held that the lessor's voluntary and unilateral termination of the lease did not terminate the policy, although Conditions 2 says the policy continues only as long as the insured retains its interest in the land. The court accepted the insured's view that, if the policy terminated when the lease did, this "would make the most serious category of title insurance claims (those involving total loss of title) self-invalidating." It ruled that "Condition 2 limits coverage only for voluntary conveyances… ."

In Back Creek Partners, LLC v. First American Title Ins. Co., 213 Md.App. 703, 75 A.3d 394 (Md.App. 2013), the court found that a lawsuit brought against the insureds after they sold the property, about matters that occurred after the policy date, for which the insureds tendered their defense only after trial, did not create a duty to defend, primarily because the policy terminated on the voluntary conveyance. Using Gebhardt as its primary precedent, the court stated that, "[i]f the Smith Action had alleged claims relating to defects in the title Back Creek conveyed to its buyers, those defects passed to Back Creek's successors-in-interest at the time of conveyance and would not be covered."

[28] In CSK Investments, LLC v. Select Portfolio Servicing, Inc., 2011 WL 1158551 (D.Ariz.) (unpublished), the court found that a Homeowner's policy continued in force after the individual named insured contributed the property to a partnership. In First American Title Ins. Co. v. Ordin, 2011 WL 4062208 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), a court refused to overturn an arbitrator's finding that the Homeowner's policy continued even after three transfers to related entities—first a corporation, then a trust, then an LLC—all controlled by the named insureds. That ruling may have been based on the successor insured provision rather than the "insures you forever" phrase, however, the court said.

transfer to a party related to the insured is not by operation of law, and the grantee does not become a successor insured.[30] See §7.2 for a complete discussion of which classes of parties qualify as successor insureds under the owner's policy. The policy does not terminate if the named insured conveys only part of the insured parcel, however.[31]

The term "purchase" has been construed to include all transfers that are not by operation of law, both arm's-length sales and conveyances from the insured to a related party for no consideration.[32] In Butera v. Attorneys' Title Guar. Fund, Inc.,[33] the court held that "'purchase' in real estate law covers any acquisition of title by the voluntary act of the parties." The court synthesized the prior decisions in perhaps the most articulate expression of the dividing line between transfers by operation of law and those that represent a purchase:

[30] Also, on the transfer of the property from one related corporation to another, the grantee corporation does not succeed by operation of law, and is not an insured, even if the transfer was for no consideration. See Pioneer Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. Child, Inc., 401 A.2d 68 (Del. 1979). In Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. Cae-Link Corp., 45 F.3d 426 (Table) (4th Cir. (Md.) 1995) (unpublished), the insurer issued its policy to Singer Corporation. Singer formed a new corporation, Link Military Simulation Corporation. At that time, Singer conveyed the real estate to Link. The stock of Link was later sold to CAE-Industries of Canada, which then merged Link into a CAE subsidiary. The court found the conveyance to Link to be voluntary, thus terminating the coverage of the policy. The Cae-Link case is discussed in Reinhardt and Rader, Recent Developments in Title Insurance Law, 31 Tort & Insurance L.J. 513 (1996). In Realty Alliance of Texas, Ltd. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 1997 WL 13651 (Tex.App.-Houston) (unpublished), a seller asserted that the insurer had paid a claim as a volunteer because, before the claim was made, the insured had conveyed the property to a corporation he controlled, by a limited warranty deed. The insurer accepted the claim "after much deliberation," because it considered the case "a close call." However, the numerous decisions issued since then have erased any uncertainty in this issue.

[31] In First American Title Ins. Co. v. 273 Water Street, LLC, 157 Conn.App. 23, 117 A.3d 857 (Conn.App. 2015), the court held that the policy did not terminate on a voluntary conveyance of part of the land, even though the land conveyed was the portion of the property on which the insured claimed to have suffered a loss. In Centennial Development Group, LLC v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 233 Ariz. 147, 310 P.3d 23 (Ariz.App. Div. 1 2013), when an insured discovered an easement after buying the property and elected to give most of the land back to the seller in lieu of foreclosure of its purchase money deed of trust, the deed back to the seller did not cut off the insured's right to sue the insurer for the alleged diminution in value. In Centennial, the policy did not terminate, because the insured still owned some of the insured land.

[32] In Kwok v. Transnation Title Ins. Co., 170 Cal.App.4th 1562, 89 Cal.Rptr.3d 141 (Cal.App. 2 Dist. 2009), review denied Apr. 29, 2009, the Kwoks argued that, because no consideration changed hands and no transfer tax was paid on the conveyance from the insured LLC to them as trustees of a revocable trust, the deed was not a purchase, and every type of transfer other than a purchase falls under the "by operation of law" category of transfer. The court disagreed, saying: "But such an interpretation not only ignores the controlling phrase by operation of law, it deprives it of all meaning. A transfer can occur that does not involve a purchase, but nevertheless does not arise by operation of law. For example, a gift of the property may not involve the exchange of any consideration, but a donee cannot be said to succeed to the property by operation of law. A transfer of property by gift is clearly a voluntary act that does not arise automatically upon death or dissolution." 170 Cal.App.4th at 1571, 89 Cal.Rptr.3d at 148. Notwithstanding Kwok, however, a California court ruled in an unpublished decision that "by operation of law" includes every type of transfer without consideration, causing the successive grantees to become successor insureds. The named insured transferred the property, and there followed a series of additional voluntary conveyances to various parties and entities in which the named insured had an interest or to whom he was related. The court held that none of the transfers terminated the policy. It said the policy was only extinguished when title was defeated by a competing owner. Shah v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 2016 WL 4987150 (Cal.App. 6 Dist.) (unpublished). The court did not cite Kwok and based its rulings on the musings found in two books written by professors.

> ATG contends successors "by operation of law" under the Policy are those who acquire enforceable property rights without the necessity of conveyance of a deed, as distinct from those who purchase property where paper title changes hands. In each of the examples provided in the Policy, the individuals or entities have relationships to the named insured that preexisted the exchange of title. The "heirs," "devisees," "corporate successors," etc., are successors of the named insured because they take the property not from the insured, but through the named insured by operation of law.
>
> We agree that this interpretation of the policy language gives meaning to all the terms in the provision and fulfills the intent of the parties. It is also consistent with the results reached by the Historic Smithville and Child courts. In Child, the property was deeded by the named insured Child Foundation to the du Ponts, who then deeded it to another entity, Child, Inc. Applying our interpretation, it becomes clear that Child, Inc., was a stranger to the property, having no preexisting relationship to either the Child Foundation or the du Ponts. On the other hand, the property in Historic Smithville was transferred to the shareholders and through the named insured corporation based on their relationship to the corporation.
> This interpretation also correlates with public policy. Title insurance is an unusual type of insurance. It is not a recurring policy: there is a single premium, and the policy remains outstanding forever to protect the property owner. ... In its definition of "insured," ATG's title insurance policy anticipated changes in the title owner of the insured property, and, thus, changes in the named insured. The Policy, however, placed limits on who could obtain the property and still remain insured under the Policy. Our interpretation of successors "by operation of law" restricts the definition of "insured" to certain foreseeable groups of individuals. Transfers by purchase, on the other hand, would expose the insurer to significantly greater risk because the number of possible transferees is limitless.

Thus, a voluntary transfer by an insured who is a natural person to an entity formed by the insured, such as a limited liability company, has also been repeatedly held to terminate the coverage of the policy, absent a specific provision making the transferee a successor insured.[34] A deed into a trustee

Co. of New York, Inc*., 132 Md.App. 457, 752 A.2d 1222 (Md.App. 2000), the insureds argued that the conveyance was not a "purchase" because no consideration passed at the time of the deed. However, the court found consideration in that the deed "provided the Gebhardts with all of the benefits conferred by a Virginia limited liability company, including limited liability and certain estate planning benefits." The Gebhardts also argued that the payment of a transfer tax was not evidence of a transfer, and the value figure was put on the deed solely to calculate the tax due. The court responded: "[t]he argument is circular, however, in that a transfer tax is a tax imposed on the transferring of property.' of a trust formed for estate planning purposes is a voluntary conveyance that terminates the policy.[35] The issue of policy termination on transfers to related entities for no consideration, particularly for estate planning, has received considerable scholarly comment.[36]

When the insured retains a recognized property right in the land, the policy continues for the protection of that interest.[37] However, the insured does not retain an interest in the land after he or she has transferred it to a related entity of which the insured is a member or partner. A number of courts have held that a partnership or member interest is personal property, and does not constitute an interest in the real estate retained by the insured after his or her conveyance to a limited liability company or partnership in which the insured is a member or partner.[38] In addition, the interest of the

When the individual insured transferred the property into a trust in stages before her death, and her children made a further conveyance to settle their rights in the property after the insured's death, the transfers were voluntary and not distributions by operation of law. Carney-Dunphy v. Title Co. of Jersey & Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2009 WL 1874060 (D.N.J.) (unpublished). The court made this comment: "This case emphasizes the need for persons making estate planning arrangements to pay close attention to title insurance policies for real property which has been voluntarily transferred by the insured property owner to a trust."

Co. of New York, Inc.*, 132 Md.App. 457, 752 A.2d 1222 (Md.App. 2000), the Gebhardts, the insureds, formed a limited liability company and conveyed the property to it. The Gebhardts remained in the property, paid the taxes, and were the members of the LLC. A title dispute arose, and the insurer rejected the claim because the policy had terminated. The Gebhardt LLC sued for breach. The Gebhardts argued that they were the effective owners of the property, and therefore should continue to have insurance coverage despite the conveyance. The court rejected the argument: "[W]hen the Gebhardts conveyed their interest in the property to the L.L.C., they effected a "transfer from one entity or person to another." ... The Gebhardts and the L.L.C. are separate entities. The Gebhardts may not file suit in their own names on behalf of the L.L.C. Nor may they be held individually insured in the property must be the same estate that was insured. In Proto-Cam, Inc. v. Transamerica Title Ins. Co.,[39] the insured conveyed the fee simple estate and leased the property back. The court held that the leasehold estate was not a retained interest in the property, saying "[w]hile it may be said that plaintiff retained an interest in the use and enjoyment of the land, plaintiff did not retain an interest in the land itself. Rather, it transferred its interest in the land itself to Tennine." Insureds sometimes assert that, following the conveyance of the property to a trust of which the insured is the beneficiary, the insured "retains an interest" in the property due to his or her beneficial interest in the trust.[40] liable for wrongful conduct of the L.L.C. While the Gebhardts have an interest in the L.L.C., they no longer have an interest in the property. Rather, it is the L.L.C. that has the interest in the property. To hold otherwise would be to disregard the nature and viability of limited liability companies." Similarly, in Gray v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2003 WL 220606 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished) (reh.den. 3/4/2003), the insureds conveyed to a partnership of which they were members. The court found that the Grays did not retain an interest in the land, and the partnership was not an insured. In Point of Rocks Ranch, L.L.C. v. Sun Valley Title Ins. Co., 143 Idaho 411, 146 P.3d 677 (Idaho 2006), the policy was found to have terminated on the transfer of the property from the insureds to their limited liability company. In Shotmeyer v. New Jersey Realty Title Ins. Co., 195 N.J. 72, 948 A.2d 600 (N.J. 2008), the policy was found to have terminated on the transfer of the property from the insured general partnership to a limited partnership having the same partners. The court relied on Gebhardt in rebuffing the claimant's alter ego argument. In Londen Land Company, LLC v. Title Resources Guar. Co., 2012 WL 313574, 467 Fed.Appx. 708 (Table) (9th Cir. (Ariz.)) (unpublished), the policy terminated when the insured limited liability company deeded the property to another LLC controlled by the same person. The title claim that the insurer had already accepted was mooted when the insurer discovered the transfer. After the trial court ruled in the insurer's favor, the insured asked the insurer for a successor owner endorsement, and an underwriter sent an e-mail telling the insured she may not need an endorsement to prevent policy termination. The underwriting counsel was not aware of the pending litigation against the company. The insured filed a motion for relief from the judgment, pleading that the e-mail supported her position that coverage had not terminated. The court denied the motion, observing that "[t]here could be no end to litigation if the Courts were undo summary judgment orders every time, without more, an employee/agent of a party is found to have spoken a legal view arguably inapposite the party line." Londen Land Company, LLC v. Title Resources Guar. Co., 2011 WL 643421 (D.Ariz.) (unpublished). The Ninth Circuit affirmed.

[40] In Bengeyfield v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2005 WL 2045947 (Mich.App.) (unpublished), the court ruled that an insured does not "retain an interest" in the property after conveying to his trust, and the policy terminates on that transfer. See also, Carney-Dunphy v. Title Co. of Jersey & Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2009 WL 1874060 (D.N.J.) (unpublished), which held that "A 'fiduciary successor,' more frequently called a 'successor fiduciary,' is a 'fiduciary who is appointed to succeed or replace a prior one.' Black's Law Dictionary 640 (7th ed.1999) (emphasis added)… In this case, the Trust did not succeed or replace any prior fiduciary--it simply was the entity to which Mrs. Carney voluntarily transferred her interest in the Property. The Trust thus was not a fiduciary successor." In Butera v. Attorneys' Title Guar. Fund, Inc., 321 Ill.App.3d 601, 704 N.E.2d 949, 254 Ill.Dec. 537 (Ill.App. 1 Dist. 2001), the court did not reach the question of the beneficial interest in an Illinois land trust directly, but it did hold that the beneficiaries did not retain an interest when the insured trustee conveyed the property to a corporation owned by the beneficiaries. In Butera, the insured was an Illinois land trust of which the Buteras held the beneficial interests. The trustee deeded to a corporation controlled by the Buteras, which conveyed to the Buteras. Thus, the transfer was from trustee to beneficiary rather than the reverse, and there was a second conveyance also. The court said the Buteras did not retain an interest in the land. Also, see the discussion of the nature of a beneficial interest in a trust in Kwok v. Transnation Title Ins. Co., 170 Cal.App.4th 1562, 89 Cal.Rptr.3d 141 (Cal.App. 2 Dist. 2009), review denied Apr. 29, 2009. In that case, the insured was a limited liability company whose members were a husband and wife. The property was conveyed from the LLC to

The policy also continues in effect if the insured takes back a mortgage secured by the insured parcel at the time the insured sells the property.[41] Coverage terminates when the mortgage is released or assigned, however. Thus, when an insured took back a purchase money mortgage but later assigned it, policy coverage terminated.[42]

Policy coverage also continues in favor of an insured to protect against a claim that the insured has breached a warranty of title due to a matter for which the policy provides coverage.[43] Some practitioners advocate the use of warranty deeds in transfers to trusts and other related entities, on the theory that this invokes the continuation clause protection for "liability by reason of covenants of warranty." However, the insurer has no duty to defend the grantee. The insured must be personally liable on its warranties for the policy to remain in force. A seller's title insurer was not liable for a judgment against the grantor based on warranties, when the judgment exculpated the insured personally and was enforceable by its terms only against the grantor's title insurer.[44] However, an insurer was rejected when it sought to deny liability for a judgment against the insured

the husband and wife as trustees of a revocable trust. The individuals argued that they had always had a beneficial interest in the property, which they retained after the transfer. The court rejected the argument, holding that the insured LLC was a separate legal entity, and the individuals who claimed to retain beneficial interests in the property had never been the insureds. The court said there was no evidence that the Kwoks had maintained the same interests in the two different entities. Further, they were seeking to disregard the same separate entity that they had created for their own protection. Most importantly, however, the court said the discussion of beneficial interests was not applicable, because "the issue before us is not whether there was a change in the beneficial ownership of the property, but rather whether appellants, as trustees of their family trust, succeeded as insureds under the terms of the policy. There is nothing in the policy definition of 'insureds' that identifies 'beneficial owners' as insureds." 170 Cal.App.4th at 1571, 89 Cal.Rptr.3d at 147-8. In *Mulhearn v. Lawyers Title Ins. Co*rp., 2014 WL 213554 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), rev.den. April 9, 2014, the policy insured Mr. Mulhearn in his fiduciary capacity as the title-holding trustee of a trust. Mr. Mulhearn was sued both as a trustee and as an individual. The insurer defended the claims brought against him as a trustee, but not in his individual capacity. The court held that Mr. Mulhearn had not proven that he was a beneficiary of the trust as he claimed but that, even if he was, Kwok had established that a beneficiary of a trust is not an insured entitled to be defended by the insurer.

[41] In Aboussie v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 949 S.W.2d 207 (Mo.App.E.D. 1997), this provision was inaccurately extended to apply on the grounds that the insured owner remained liable on a debt secured by a deed of trust on the property. Aboussie was followed in a second Missouri decision shortly thereafter, which also held that a policy remained in effect as to an insured who was still liable on a note secured by the insured property. Belden v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 958 S.W.2d 54 (Mo.App.E.D. 1997), reh.den. In Aboussie, the insured no longer held an interest in the land, however. The insured had conveyed the property away after the title defect was discovered.

In a later decision in the same case, however, the court held that the lawsuit was barred by the statute of limitations, and that the highly unusual warranties given by the insured did not prolong the policy or toll the statute of limitations. *Grill v. on proof that the insured was in such poor financial condition that he had no assets that the judgment creditor could seize.[45]

Also, the policy provides indemnity solely by reason of liability under covenants of warranty. Courts have found a number of reasons for holding that an insured does not have liability under warranties made to the insured's related entity. Some courts also held that any liability under the covenants of warranty is too speculative to require the insurer to defend or take any action. In Gray v. First American Title Ins. Co.,[46] the insureds conveyed to their partnership by grant deed, and argued that the policy continued by virtue of their warranty liability. However, the court held that no such liability had been proven. The court rejected the argument because of the speculative nature of the potential liability: "[t]he Grays were no longer insureds when they tendered the claim, and the claim concerned possible future events, we need not and do not discuss these other issues." A limited warranty deed has been found not to invoke warranty coverage for a matter created by the insured, which is excluded from coverage by Exclusion 3(a).[47] Also, the warranty protection of the policy was not invoked by a lawsuit against the former-owner insured that alleged fraudulent concealment of a title defect, but not breach of warranty.[48] Several other courts have found no warranty liability because the deeds were made without warranties, or with warranties against the grantor's acts only.[49]

[47] In ASK Realty II Corporation v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2004 WL 1254005 (D.Md. 2004) (unpublished), the insured was sued for its own actions while in title. The court found no duty to indemnify or defend, due to Exclusion 3(a): "Most applicable to the dispute between FATICO and ASK is the exclusion of risks 'allowed' by ASK. The ordinary meaning of allowed is permitted or consented to, similar to the term 'suffered' used in other title insurance policies, which 'has been deemed synonymous with 'permit,' which implies the power to prohibit or prevent the claim from arising.' … If ASK permitted one of the covered risks to arise through its own knowing and intentional inaction, though it had the power to prevent the claim from arising, this risk would be excluded from coverage. In sum, based on these authorities and the ordinary meaning of the phrase 'created, allowed or agreed to,' the FATICO policy does not cover any defect in the title resulting from knowing and intentional action or inaction by ASK. FATICO's duty under the title insurance policy to defend ASK does not extend to any legal claims against ASK for such a defect. ... By the very nature of these claims, Amzel and Batchelor's lawsuit only concerned knowing and intentional conduct by ASK. This is precisely the kind of conduct by the insured that is excluded by the FATICO title insurance policy as 'created, allowed or agreed to' by ASK. Even if the lawsuit succeeded, there was no possibility that the claim would be covered by the policy, and thus FATICO had no duty to defend ASK under the policy."

Therefore, the court found no possible liability based on their limited warranties: "There is no suggestion that the alleged cloud on title was created by any action or inaction on the part of the Gebhardts while the property was titled in their names. The Gebhardts thus transferred from themselves to the L.L.C. the

In Stevens v. Dakota Title and Escrow Co.,[50] the insured gave a full warranty deed to his related entity. The insurer denied the claim based on the termination provision, and the insured argued that the policy should protect him against his warranty liability to the transferee, Aslan Companies. The unusual fact in Stevens was that the title defect was discovered when a new policy was issued to Aslan and its lender. The court found no warranty liability:

> ...[T]he flaw in this argument is that Aslan had notice of the "buffer zone" agreement through its own title insurance policy and thus, took title to the subject property with notice of the "buffer zone" agreement. Consequently, Stevens [sic] did not have a duty to defend title to the subject property.

Most courts have found that a policy that has terminated on conveyance by the insured is not revived if the property is conveyed back to the insured.[51] In Stevens, the entity controlled by the insured conveyed one of the parcels back to the insured well after the claim was submitted, for the stated reason that there had been a mutual mistake between the insured and the entity. Noting that only one of the two parcels had been reconveyed, the court held that there was no revival of the policy because, in Nebraska, rescission of a contract must be in full:

> Consequently, the attempted rescission was ineffective because it did not return Stevens and Aslan to the status quo as required by Nebraska law, and thus Stevens' coverage under the title insurance policy was not revived.[52]

Also, in Gray v. First American Title Ins. Co.,[53] the Grays, the insureds, deeded the full fee simple to a partnership. Later, the partnership conveyed an undivided interest in the property back to the Grays, who again conveyed it to the partnership. The Grays argued that their claim rights should not have been cut off by the first deed because the title defect existed but merely lay dormant before they conveyed the property. The court rejected the argument:

problem of the cloud on title as to the 4.75 acres. > Under this title insurance policy, the Grays could not preserve a previous claim they may have had before the conveyance to G-B Partners. And, unlike a comprehensive general liability (CGL) or professional liability policy, a title insurance policy does not cover occurrences; it only provides indemnity for a contingency which actually develops while the insured holds an interest in the land. ... The Grays had transferred the property, and coverage ceased before they tendered the claim. ... When a title insurer issues a title insurance policy, it is providing a contract which only indemnifies against losses actually sustained in the event that a specific contingency, affecting title, actually occurs while the insured retains title.

However, in a 1962 decision construing a 1946 policy that was not an ALTA form, an insured conveyed the property, terminating the policy, but the property was later reconveyed to him. The court held that the policy did not terminate because it did not contain a termination provision, and was revived when the insured regained an insurable interest in the property.[54] The reasoning of that decision would not apply to a modern ALTA owner's policy.

Former insureds sometimes assert that, even if the policy has terminated due to a voluntary transfer, the right to pursue a pending title insurance claim survives the transfer. However, several courts have held that a transfer moots a title insurance claim submitted before the conveyance.[55] The [54] Sandler v. New Jersey Realty Title Ins. Co., 36 N.J. 471, 178 A.2d 1 (1962), involved an owner's policy issued by New Jersey Title in 1946. The relevant New Jersey Title policy language bears no resemblance to modern ALTA policies. American Land Title Association had not even promulgated an owner's title insurance policy form as of 1946. See §9.1.3.4. An endorsement on the "back" of the Sandler policy said: "Policies are not assignable to grantees (purchasers) but only to mortgagees of insured or assignees of mortgagees as hereinbefore provided. Purchasers should protect themselves by obtaining Policy of title insurance at reduced re-issue rates as provided in this Policy." The court said that no provision of the policy "expressly or impliedly, terminates the liability to the insured upon his conveyance of the fee." The only "limitation upon future liability" was the provision allowing for an assignment of the policy to a lender. The court concluded that "the policy contains no provision, express or implied, which would finally terminate defendant's liability to Sandler upon a conveyance by and a subsequent reconveyance to him, where the claim is made for defects of title which existed at the time of his original acquisition of title and the issuance of the policy." 178 A.2d at 6. The court then made the further leap to find that the policy, which had never terminated, was revived when the named insured came back into title, which it based on New Jersey law not specific to title insurance policies. It said: "There appears, therefore, no reason why, under the circumstances here present, the conveyance by Sandler to Sandler Realty Co. should finally terminate defendant's liability. As above noted, the policy contains no such provision. The conveyance did not increase defendant's risk nor change the nature of its liability. The reconveyance to him served merely to re-establish the status which existed at the inception of the insurance contract. The policy was, at most, only suspended during the time that Sandler Realty Co. held title and was revived upon the reconveyance to him. Thereafter, under its terms, the indemnification inured to the benefit of the plaintiffs as devisees of a one-third interest in the tract." 178 A.2d at 7. One commentator has pointed to the holding in Sandler to support for the assertion that "an insured does not lose its claim despite filing the claim against the title insurer after selling the property interest." Palomar, Limited Liability Companies, Corporations, General Partnerships, Limited Partnerships, Joint Ventures, Trusts--Who Does the Title Insurance Cover?, 31 Real Property, Probate and Trust J. 605, 609 (Winter 1997). The result in Sandler, however, was dictated by the terms of the New Jersey Title policy, and its conclusion was based entirely on the wording of that policy.

leading case is Gebhardt Family Investment, L.L.C. v. Nations Title Ins. Co. of New York, Inc.,[56] in which the insureds asserted that their claim survived the termination of the policy on a transfer to a limited liability company of which they were the members. They based their argument on a quote from a treatise that "a transfer of title terminates future coverage, so long as the insured held title at the time of its loss, the insured's subsequent transfer of title does not terminate its pre-existing claim."[57] The court disagreed, ruling that, when the insureds transferred the property, their potential loss was extinguished. The Gebhardts had admitted that they had not yet suffered a monetary loss. By transferring the property to an uninsured party, they had assured that they never would:

> Assuming arguendo that there is a "known overlap"--and the record is unclear in that regard--the fatal flaw in this reasoning is that the Gebhardts successfully conveyed the entire property, including the 4.75 acres in question, to the L.L.C. by way of a special warranty deed. As we have explained, the L.L.C. is a separate entity. The problem of the cloud on title is now the problem of the L.L.C. and not the Gebhardts. If any loss is suffered because of the cloud on title, it will be suffered by the L.L.C., which was not an insured under the policy either before or after the conveyance.

After the property is transferred, the named insured has no right to pursue a claim under the policy for the additional reason that he or she no longer has an insurable interest in the property.[58] However, other courts have held that a voluntary transfer does not cut off the right to pursue a claim pending on the date of transfer, or have found sufficient a question of fact as to whether or not the transfer terminated the pending claim.[59] One court found that an insured who was sued for trespass after it

[58] In Covalt v. First American Title Ins. Co., 105 F.3d 669 (Table), 1997 WL 4273 (10th Cir. (Wyo.) 1997) (unpublished), the insured, Mr. Maytag, died after transferring to a trust. Therefore, the court found, he "had no insurable interest in the ranch" and was not entitled to make a claim. Another recent case also acknowledged that a transfer of the property after a defect was discovered may terminate policy coverage. In New England Federal Credit Union v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 171 Vt. 326, 765 A.2d 450 (Vt. 2000), an insured lender learned of a problem with the property while attempting to sell it after foreclosure. The lender conveyed the property, with a claimed reduction in sale price as a result of the title issue. It apparently did not submit the claim until after closing, however. The Vermont Supreme Court sent the case back to the trial court "for a determination of whether NEFCU had an insurable interest in the land as of the date of its claim." If not, the high court's implied instruction to the trial court was to find that the policy had terminated.

[59] In Point of Rocks Ranch, L.L.C. v. Sun Valley Title Ins. Co., 143 Idaho 411, 146 P.3d 677 (Idaho 2006), the insureds "cite authorities holding that a conveyance of the property after discovery of a claim under a title policy should not prevent recovery under the policy." The court did not address the merits of the argument, because in that case the conveyed the property was entitled to a defense.[60]

In Fairway Development Co. v. Title Ins. Co. of Minn., [61] one partnership was terminated and

insureds conveyed before they discovered the title defect. The court also rejected the related argument that the termination provision is an illegal restraint on alienation, because it prevents the insured from transferring the property after discovery of the claim until it is resolved. In Keys v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2012 WL 4510471 (S.D.Miss.) (unpublished), the court found that an individual continued to have a sufficient interest in the property to give her standing to sue for a policy loss incurred before she conveyed the property to herself as trustee of a revocable trust. The policy at issue in Keys was an ALTA 2006 Owner's policy, and the insurer acknowledged that the insured, in her capacity as trustee, was a successor insured under the policy. In First American Title Ins. Co. v. Two Seventy Three Water Street, LLC, 2013 WL 811878 (Conn.Super.) (unpublished), the court found that a deed from the named insured (under an ALTA 1992 Owner's policy) to a new entity whose members were the same as the owners of the insured terminated the policy, and the insured did not retain an interest in the property after the conveyance. The fact that such a transfer would not cause the termination of a 2006 ALTA Owner's policy did not change the policy coverage. However, the court said there was a disagreement amongst the jurisdictions about whether or not such a transfer terminates the insured's pending claim. The insured had submitted a claim, and the insurer had made a disputed loss payment, before the transfer. In denying summary judgment to the insurer, the court said that the policy language, "as demonstrated by the parties' arguments as well as the conflicting case law, is susceptible to interpretation that claims arising during the policy period and asserted within the policy period are not defeated by subsequent transfer of the property to a third party." However, the cases that this court found to favor the insured were Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. 100 Investment Limited Partnership, 355 Fed.3d 759 (4th Cir. 2004), which found a duty to defend but not to indemnify, and Keys v. Chicago Title, which construed a 2006 ALTA policy and merely found that the grantee was a successor insured, which provision was not found in the Two Seventy Three Water Street policy. In Centennial Development Group, LLC v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 233 Ariz. 147, 310 P.3d 23 (Ariz.App. Div. 1 2013), when an insured discovered an easement after buying the property and elected to give most of the land back to the seller in lieu of foreclosure of its purchase money deed of trust, the deed back to the seller did not cut off the insured's right to sue the insurer for the alleged diminution in value. In Centennial, the policy did not terminate, because the insured still owned some land. The issue was whether or not the insured's right to make a claim about a defect in title to a portion of the insured land terminated when it conveyed that land. The court said that the policy did not explicitly say that it terminates on conveyance, or that a pending claim terminates with the policy. It also relied on Barlow Burke, Law of Title Insurance § 5.02 (3d. Ed. Supp.2012), which says that a "post-coverage claim" may be made on a title insurance policy "so long as the damages were sustained during coverage." Finally, it cited Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. 100 Investment Ltd. Partnership, 355 F.3d 759 (4th Cir.2004), although it admitted that both sides relied on that case. In 100 Investment, the court found a duty to defend but no duty to indemnify.

[60] In Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. 100 Investment Limited Partnership, 355 Fed.3d 759 (4th Cir. 2004), an insured sued years after conveying the property, for damages caused by alleged trespass onto the plaintiff's land while the insured was in title. The court found that the insurer had a duty to defend the insured, even though it was not required to reimburse the insured for money it paid to clear title. The court asserted that a title insurance policy is not a "claims made" policy, but indemnifies against "any 'loss or damage' during the policy period," and that "the loss or damage alleged in the Kahn litigation occurred during that period." Because the policy was in effect while the alleged trespass occurred, the court ruled that there was a duty to defend the insured in the suit. This reasoning illustrates why it is dangerous to construe policy coverage by analogy rather than by interpreting the policy's own terms. Title insurance is not in effect for a term. Further, policy coverage is limited to matters that occur before the insured takes title, not during the insured's "term" of ownership. However, the 100 Investment court ruled that the insurer was not required to indemnify the insured for money paid to procure title to the land that was the subject of the trespass claim. Relying on Gebhardt, the court found that the defect in title was now the responsibility of the grantee and not the insured, and that the duty to indemnify terminated on the conveyance.

[61] 621 F.Supp. 120 (N.D. Ohio 1985).

a new one formed. The partnership dissolution was held not to be involuntary, which would have made the second partnership a successor insured. Therefore, the policy was found to have terminated when the partnership dissolved, and the insurer's liability extinguished. The decision has caused enough concern to have generated what is commonly referred to as the Fairway endorsement. Although more than one form of the endorsement exists, its essence is usually that the insurer waives the right to assert that a referenced act has caused the policy to be terminated.

7.4 Successor Insureds Under Loan Policy

The loan policy states that the holder of the mortgage debt is the insured. A loan assignee becomes a successor insured when it purchases the debt secured by the insured mortgage.[62] Typically, the mortgage is also assigned to the successor insured. If the mortgage assignment is recited on Schedule A, the policy assures against the invalidity or unenforceability of the assignment, and in that sense the successor insured is a named insured.[63] If the successor's mortgage assignment is not described on Schedule A of the policy, the successor must establish to the insurer that it holds the debt in order to prove its status as an insured.[64]

A governmental entity that was an insurer or guarantor of the debt is an insured under the ALTA policies, whether or not it takes an assignment of the loan.[65] This includes the Veterans' Administration and Federal Housing Administration. The policy does not state that these entities must establish that they have satisfied an insurance or guaranty obligation, or that they have taken an assignment of the loan. If the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation takes over a bank and takes an assignment of its assets, it becomes an insured as a successor owner of the Indebtedness, not as an [62] Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. National Enterprises, Inc., 133 F.3d 929 (Table), 1997 WL 800294 (9th Cir. Cal.) (unpublished) (RTC did not retain right to make policy claim under terms of loan sale agreement, because title matter had not yet matured at time of sale; leaves open the question of whether or not such an agreement could be effective if claim were mature); Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. Matrix Financial Services Corp., 255 Ga.App. 874, 567 S.E.2d 96 (Ga.App. 2002) (insured lender that assigned loan became insured again on forced repurchase after borrower's default).

[63] The policy insures the validity If an assignment shown on Schedule A of the policy. In most such cases, then, this risk is transferred to the insurer. Covered Risk 12 of the 2006 ALTA Loan policy protects against "[t]he invalidity or unenforceability of any assignment of the Insured Mortgage, provided the assignment is shown in Schedule A, or the failure of the assignment shown in Schedule A to vest title to the Insured Mortgage in the named Insured assignee free and clear of all liens."

[64] In Branch Banking & Trust Co. v. Nevada Title Co., 2011 WL 1399810 (D.Nev.) (unpublished); related decision, 2011 WL 1399833 (D.Nev.) (unpublished), the court dismissed claims against the title agent because the lender had not proven that it bought the loan from the FDIC and became the successor insured. Similarly, in Federal Deposit Ins. Corp. v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 2016 WL 7231455 (W.D.Wash.) (unpublished), the court ruled that the claimed insured was required to prove that it had made the loan, and was not merely a warehouse lender, particularly because the note, mortgage, policy and loan closing instructions all identified a different entity as the lender.

[65] This provision is found in subsection F of Conditions 1 of the 2006 ALTA Loan Policy, which says that the following governmental bodies are also insureds: "any government agency or instrumentality that is an insurer or guarantor under an insurance contract or guaranty insuring or guaranteeing the Indebtedness secured by the Insured Mortgage, or any part of it, whether named as an Insured or not… ." The ALTA policies state that the insurer does not have the right to assert policy defenses against a governmental entity that was an insurer or guarantor of the debt.

insurer or guarantor of the loan.[66] The FDIC insures deposits with the financial institution, but does not insure its loans. Likewise, Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation and Federal National Mortgage Association are not loan insurers or guarantors. An entity's status as either an assignee of the debt or as its insurer or guarantor alters the loan policy's terms as to coverage defenses that the insurer may assert. See §7.10 for a complete discussion of what policy defenses the insurer may assert against either a governmental insurer or guarantor, or a successor insured.

The policy insures only one party at a time. The insurer is required to defend only the party that is the insured, and that duty also terminates when the party ceases to be the insured under the policy, typically when it assigns the loan to another party.[67] If there are competing claimants to the debt, the party claiming to be the insured must settle that dispute in order to establish coverage in its favor.[68] However, the fact that the definition of insured in the ALTA Loan policy says that it "also includes" successor owners of the loan was interpreted to mean that insureds accumulate as the loan is sold, but do not drop off as they cease to hold interests in the insured mortgage.[69]

A lending institution does not qualify as a successor insured when there is no valid

[66] See, for example, Shamrock Bank of Florida v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 1304694 (S.D.Ill. 2014) (unpublished), in which a bank that had been a loan participant took an assignment of the loan from the FDIC after the insured mortgagee went into receivership, and claimed to be an insured based on three different bases—as loan participant, as the holder of the Indebtedness, and as the assignee of the insurance policy under a vague asset purchase agreement with the FDIC. The court rested its determination that the bank was the insured based both on its ownership of the debt and on the assignment of the policy.

[67] Manufacturers and Traders Trust Co. v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 2012 WL 5462887 (D.Or.) (unpublished) (title insurer not required to defend named insured in a lawsuit seeking to set aside the transaction after it assigned the loan and insured deed of trust to another party, which became the successor insured).

[68] For example, see Mur-Ray Management Corp. v. Founders Title Co., 169 Ariz. 417, 819 P.2d 1003 (Ariz.App. 1991), in which parties disputed ownership of a note which had been partially assigned and pledged, and was being held by an escrowee. In Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. v. MLD Mortg., Inc., 2012 WL 6139366 (D.Minn.) (unpublished), an originating lender was permitted to add the title insurer to the loan assignee's lawsuit demanding repurchase of the loan due to its lack of access, despite the insurer's protest that the originator would not become the insured again unless and until it buys back the loan. The court reasoned that one or the other of the two lenders was the insured. Similarly, in Sher v. Luxury Mortg. Corp., 2012 WL 5869303 (D.Md.) (unpublished), the court refused to dismiss the complaint against the insurer based on the insurer's argument that the plaintiff had not yet bought back the loan, although it had been asked to do so.

[69] In Colonial Mortgage Service Co. v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 6237852 (E.D.Pa.) (unpublished), the named insured assigned the loan after closing. The policy was issued with the insured's name shown in Schedule A as being "Colonial Mortgage Service Company of America Its Successors and/or Assigns as Their Interests May Appear." Both Colonial and its assignee were sued by a party claiming an equitable lien on the property. The court found that the insurer owed Colonial a defense although it held no interest in the loan or the insured mortgage, based on the phrasing of Schedule A and the definition of insured, which stated that "[t]he term 'Insured' also includes" successor owners of the debt. Thus, the court said, as the loan is assigned, every assignee becomes an insured while none of the assignors cease to be insureds, notwithstanding the fact that they no longer hold the lien or insurable interests, a concept the court called "concurrent coverage." In Stockton Mortgage, Inc. v. Tope, 233 Cal.App.4th 437, 183 Cal.Rptr.3d 186 (Cal.App. 3 Dist. 2014), reh.den. (Jan. 13, 2015), rev.den. (March 25, 2015), however, the court held that the lender ceased to be an insured when it assigned the debt, and had no more rights under the policy.

indebtedness, because it is unable to establish that it is a successor holder of the debt. In one case, the originating lender stole all of the loan funds after they were delivered from the funding lender and failed to pay off the loan that was to have been refinanced. The borrowers also claimed that the note secured by the insured deed of trust was forged. The court ruled that the funding lender did not own a valid debt, and was not a successor insured.[70] In a second case involving the same originating lender that diverted loan funds fraudulently, the court affirmed that the funding lender must establish that its money was delivered to the borrowers in order to create a valid debt, not merely that it delivered money to the defrauding intermediate party.[71]

A debt may not be assigned after foreclosure. Thus, the successor insured chain ends when a deed is issued on foreclosure or a trustee's sale. The loan policy terminates if the insured owner of the debt does not take title on foreclosure, as discussed at §7.9.[72] The policy continues in effect after the insured takes title for the benefit of the insured, only to the extent stated in the policy. See §7.9 concerning the termination and continuation of title provisions of the loan policy.

Except as described above, a party who does not own the indebtedness does not qualify as an insured under the loan policy.[73] A loan participant under an unrecorded participation agreement is not an insured.[74] A loan broker or servicer also is not an insured under a loan policy.[75] A lender's

[70] First American Title Ins. Co. v. XWarehouse Lending Corp., 177 Cal.App.4th 106, 98 Cal.Rptr.3d 801, 09 Cal. Daily Op. Serv. 11,201 (Cal.App. 1 Dist. 2009). The title insurer relied on cases that have held that the policy does not protect against the unenforceability of the mortgage due to the fact that it does not support a valid debt. The insured, Access, insisted that the deed of trust was also forged, and coverage against forgery is fundamental to the policy. The court disagreed. "Any losses suffered by Access are not due to defects in the title or mortgage liens, but are entirely due to the failure of an existing indebtedness between the named borrowers and CHL." It said that, even if the deeds of trust had borne genuine signatures, they would still be void because there was no valid debt to support them. The court also found one important fact distinguished the decisions upholding the forgery coverage: "in those cases, and unlike this case, moneys had been actually disbursed or credited to the named borrower by either the lender or its assignee."

[71] "In all of the cases [cited by the lender that found coverage], the lender actually disbursed funds or credit to the borrower or to one purporting to act in the name of the borrower, whether acting fraudulently or not. Consequently, in all of the cases distinguished by First American there was an indebtedness; none of the cases conclude that the underlying debt was either invalid, never existed, or had been otherwise extinguished, and none addressed the question before us--whether coverage exists under the insurance policies in the absence of an existing indebtedness." Gateway Bank, FSB v. Ticor Title Ins. Co. of Calif., 2009 WL 4190455 (Cal.App. 1 Dist.) (unpublished).

[72] See in particular Property Asset Management, Inc. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 173 F.3d 84 (2nd Cir. N.Y. 1999), discussed at §7.9.

[73] In LJC Financial, LLC v. Alliant Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 7190872 (S.D.Tex.) (unpublished), the court held that a loan broker did not become an owner of the debt or an insured under a loan policy by its payment of outstanding real estate taxes, even though the policy definition of "Indebtedness" includes taxes paid by the insured. However, in Aries Investments, LLC v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2015 WL 11237041 (N.J.A.D. 2016) (unpublished), a New Jersey appeals court affirmed a jury verdict in favor of a party claiming to be an insured under a loan policy based solely on the party's self-proclaimed "reasonable expectation" of being an insured under the policy, and despite the lack of any evidence that it had either funded the loan or purchased it. The claimant's lack of bona fides may actually have been aided by the fact that no policy was ever issued.

[74] In Border City Savings & Loan Ass'n v. First American Title Ins. Co. of Mid-America, 768 F.2d 89 (6th Cir. 1985), a loan participant under an unrecorded participation agreement was found not to be an insured or a third party beneficiary collateral assignment of a mortgage does not negate its status as the "owner of the indebtedness."[76]

The holder of the Indebtedness may not sell the loan but carve out the right to pursue a policy claim, or keep the policy. Thus, when the Resolution Trust Company assigned the note and mortgage, but purported to reserve the right to pursue a pending policy claim, the court found that it had ceased to be the insured and thus had lost any right to pursue the policy claim.[77] However, the Federal Deposit Insurance Company has repeatedly asserted that it may retain a claim under a closing protection letter as a carve-out from the assignment of a loan.[78] It is even more disconcerting that the FDIC's assignees have also asserted the converse, that the FDIC form of loan assignment agreement grants to the assignee a specific assignment of the policy, as an agreement that is ancillary to the loan.[79] under a policy issued to the mortgagee of record. The participation agreement stated that the lender of record was permitted to deal with the property and the borrower "as though an absolute owner" of the indebtedness. There also was no evidence that the insurer knew or should have known of the participation agreement. In Shamrock Bank of Florida v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 1304694 (S.D.Ill. 2014) (unpublished), the court found that a bank did not become an insured based on a participation interest in the loan, although it later became a successor insured when it took a full assignment of the loan.

[75] The court held, in U.S. Bank, N.A. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2014 WL 1096961 (D.Colo. 2014) (unpublished), that a loan servicer was not an insured and that the ALTA policy did not obligate the insurer to defend it in litigation over the insured deed of trust. The fact that the plaintiff in the action incorrectly asserted that the servicer owned the loan did not make the allegation true or cause the servicer to become an insured. Also, a loan broker was not an insured, and had no right under the policy based on the claim that it had "advanced" money on behalf of the insured lenders to pay off outstanding real estate taxes that were not excepted in the policy. LJC Financial, LLC v. Alliant Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 7190872 (S.D.Tex.) (unpublished).

[77] Resolution Trust Corp. v. American Title Ins. Co., 901 F.Supp. 1122 (M.D.La. 1995). Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. National Enterprises, Inc., 133 F.3d 929 (Table), 1997 WL 800294 (9th Cir. (Cal.)) (unpublished), involved a similar loan sale agreement under which the RTC retained title insurance claims rather than transfer them to the loan purchaser. In that case, however, the retention provision was found not to apply, because the title claim had not yet matured at time of sale. The court did not decide the issue of whether or not such a retention of claim provision could be effective as to the insurer. The RTC v. American Title and related cases are further discussed in Comment, The Title Insurance Law Newsletter, October-November 1995, p. 5.

[78] See JP Morgan Chase Bank, N.A. v. First American Title Ins. Co., 795 F.Supp.2d 624 (E.D.Mich. 2011), in which the court accepted the FDIC's claim that it had assigned the loan but not the right to make a claim under the closing protection letter for a portion of the claimed loan loss.

[79] See, for example, Shamrock Bank of Florida v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 1304694 (S.D.Ill. 2014) (unpublished), in which a bank that had been a loan participant took an assignment of the loan from the FDIC after the insured mortgagee went into receivership, and claimed to be an insured based on three different bases—as loan participant, as the holder of the Indebtedness, and as the assignee of the insurance policy under a vague asset purchase agreement with the FDIC. The FDIC assigned certain loans and the "Collateral Documents," which included every "loan agreement or other agreement or document... securing in any manner the performance or payment by any Borrower of its obligations or the obligations of any other Borrower under any Note evidencing a Loan." The bank said that the insurance policy was a "Collateral Document." The insurer was understandably concerned that the FDIC might later assert that its own definition of "Collateral Document" was so vague that its real intent was to retain the policy.

The policy provides that the insurer may assert against any successor insured all coverage defenses it would have had as to the named insured, unless the successor insured proves that it was a purchaser for value without actual knowledge of the defect or lien as to which the insurer would have a coverage defense.[80] That policy provision is fully discussed below, at § 7.10.

7.5 Rights Of Parties Who Hold Interests In Named Insured Entities

A party that holds an interest in or is a member of an insured title-holding entity is not an insured. However, some owners or members have certain rights they may assert under a policy issued to the entity.

When a policy is issued to a corporation that holds title to real estate, the shareholders are not insureds under the policy.[81] This includes a parent company that owns the stock in the named insured corporation.[82] If the stock of the corporation is sold, the policy remains in effect, because the insured corporation is still the owner of the property.[83] However, the stock purchaser does not become an insured.[84] A sole shareholder of an insured corporation has such control over the insured that his or her interest is tantamount to the status of insured in relation to a claim of indemnity under the policy, but the policy does not obligate the insurer to defend the sole shareholder in litigation.[85] If the sole [80] The definition of "insured" in the 1992 ALTA Loan Policy reserves, as to a successor owner of the debt, "all rights and defense as to any successor that the Company would have had against any predecessor insured, unless the successor acquired the indebtedness as a purchaser for value without knowledge of the asserted defect, lien, encumbrance, adverse claim or other matter insured against by this policy as affecting title to the estate or interest in the land." Conditions & Stipulations 1(a)(i). The same provision is found in Conditions 1(e)(ii) of the 2006 ALTA Loan Policy.

First American Title Ins. Co*., 2000 ME 21, 745 A.2d 975 (Me. 2000), a shareholder of the insured corporation was found not to have a cause of action against the insurer for emotional distress allegedly caused by the handling of the corporation's claim. The court found that the emotional distress claim was in tort, not contract, so it was barred not by the policy terms but by the lack of tortious conduct on the insurer's part. In Geiger v. King, 158 Ohio App.3d 288, 815 N.E.2d 683, 2004-Ohio-4227 (Ohio App. 10 Dist. 2004), app.den. 104 Ohio St.3d 1410, 818 N.E.2d 711, 2004-Ohio-6364 (Ohio December 1, 2004), the shareholder of a corporation that sold to the insured was found not to have a cause of action for damages as a result of money that the corporation was allegedly shorted at closing.

[82] In Realty Mortgage Corp. v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2011 WL 1134461 (Bkcy.S.D.Miss.) (unpublished), the court found that the parent company of the named insured on a loan policy was not a successor owner of the debt, and thus did not become an insured although it had funded the loan, and its mere possession of the original policy also did not give it the right to make a claim.

In Daca, Inc. v. Commonwealth

shareholder presents a claim as if he or she were the insured, all policy defenses that may be asserted against the insured are equally applicable to the shareholder.[86] When a party takes title as the nominee of a corporation, and the insurer is aware of the named insured's status as nominee when the policy is issued, the corporation may disregard its title-holding agent and directly assert a claim for indemnity under the policy.[87]

A member of a limited liability company may not sue under a policy issued to the company.[88] The also rejected the member's assertions that, because he was the sole member, he was the "equitable" owner of the real estate and the "effective" owner because the Internal Revenue Service disregards single-member LLCs for income tax purposes.[89]

When a policy is issued to the title-holding trustee of a trust, the coverage runs to the named insured in that fiduciary capacity, and the policy does not create a duty to defend the trustee against claims brought against him or her as an individual.[90] The beneficiaries of the trust are not insureds, but may have the right to submit claims for indemnity to the extent of their beneficial interests in the trust.[91]

When a partnership holds title to real estate and is the named insured, the partners in the Land Title Ins. Co., 822 S.W.2d 360 (Tex.App. 1992), a mortgagee policy was issued to Daca, Inc., which had made a loan secured by the property. A lawsuit was filed naming as a defendant Callie Davenport, "d/b/a Daca, Inc." Davenport was the sole shareholder of Daca. The pleading alleged claims based on the actions of Callie Davenport as an individual. The insurer filed an answer for the insured corporation, to avoid having a judgment taken against its insured. The court held that the insurer correctly refused to defend Davenport, the shareholder.

[91] In Spellings v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 644 S.W.2d 804 (Tex.App. 1982), the holders of beneficial interests in a trust were permitted to make claims on a policy issued to the title-holding trustee. The court justified its holding on the assertion that the insurer was aware of the identities of the beneficiaries at the time the policy was issued. In Kwok v. Transnation Title Ins. Co., 170 Cal.App.4th 1562, 89 Cal.Rptr.3d 141 (Cal.App. 2 Dist. 2009), rev.den. April 29, 2009, the court held that the holder of a beneficial interest in a trust is not an owner of real estate held by the trustee, and therefore a policy issued to the individual terminates on a transfer to a trustee. In *Mulhearn v. Lawyers Title Ins. C*orp., 2014 WL 213554 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), rev.den. April 9, 2014, the policy insured Mr. Mulhearn in his fiduciary capacity as the title-holding trustee of a trust. Mr. Mulhearn was sued both as a trustee and as an individual. The insurer defended the claims brought against him as a trustee, but not in his individual capacity. The court held that Mr. Mulhearn had not proven that he was a beneficiary of the trust as he claimed but that, even if he was, Kwok had established that a beneficiary of a trust is not an insured entitled to be defended by the insurer.

partnership are not insureds under a policy.[92] When the partnership terminates, so does the coverage of the policy, except as to distributees.[93]

All or most jurisdictions consider a joint venture not to be a separate legal entity, but a business that operates through its members under the name of the venture. When the title to real estate is held by a joint venture, it is common for the title insurance policy to name the joint venture and its members as insureds, in which case the policy defense and indemnity obligations run to all members. If, however, the named insured in the policy is the joint venture, the members have rights in the policy, to the extent of their interests in the venture as established by the law of the jurisdiction. In a state that recognizes a joint venturer as an owner of the real estate, the insurer will have a duty to defend the joint venturers if they are named in litigation concerning or attacking the title to the insured property.[94] However, the insurer is not obligated to prosecute or defend any of the joint venturers in a lawsuit about a dispute in their respective rights, and in which the members are adverse to each other.[95] If an insured contributes the insured parcel to a joint venture after the date of policy, the policy continues in effect as to the named insured, but the joint venture and its other members do not become insureds or obtain the right to be defended by the insurer if title is attacked.[96]

Co.*, 2002 WL 1503080 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished). It is highly unusual for a title insurer to provide a courtesy defense to a party that is not the insured but related to it. The decision to provide a courtesy defense is at the insurer's discretion, as the term implies, and that election is typically made only when the insurer has determined that doing so will advance or protect the interest of the insured in the defense of its title.

The individual joint venturers were sued in litigation concerning the title to the property. The court held that, because under state law the joint venturers are considered to be owners of property titled in a joint venture name, they are entitled to a defense under a policy naming the joint venture as the insured.

The lender was also a member of the owner-borrower joint venture. When the lender foreclosed, the other joint venture members attacked the mortgage on the basis that the lender was foreclosing against itself. The court found that the insurer had no duty to defend the action, because the sole attack on the insured mortgage was based on the lender's other interest in the property, which it assumed intentionally and by agreement.

[96] In Van Winkle v. Transamerica Title Ins. Co., 697 P. 2d 784 (Colo.App. 1984), a policy was issued to an individual when he took title. He later conveyed the property to a joint venture of which he was a member. The insurer was found to have a duty to defend the named insured in a lawsuit that named all of the members of the joint venture, but not to have a defense duty to the other members. The policy did not terminate, because the named insured retained an ownership interest in the property after the conveyance, as is the case on a conveyance by the insured of a part interest to a tenant in common.

7.6 Texas Definition Of Insured

The current version of the T-1 Owner's Policy of Title Insurance promulgated by the State of Texas, effective January 3, 2014, has the same definition of insured as is found in the 2006 ALTA Owner's policy. However, an earlier version of the T-1 owner's policy contained a somewhat expanded definition of successor insureds, similar to the list found in the Homeowner's policy form.[97]

7.7 Third Party Beneficiary Claims

Courts generally do not consider other parties to the transaction to be third party beneficiaries entitled to seek payment from the insurer. Such parties have not negotiated for insurance coverage, and generally have no insurable interest in the property. Even in those cases in which the party has an insurable interest in the property, the fact remains that it has not paid a premium. See §7.1 for further discussion of the issue of insurable interest.

Accordingly, a seller is not an insured or third party beneficiary of the policy, and the insurer does not owe a duty to the seller.[98] The fact that the seller paid the premium is often raised as an argument, but does not change the result. Rather, the reason the seller pays the premium is not to obtain insurance, but because local custom and the purchase agreement require it.[99] An insurer has no fiduciary duty or duty of confidentiality to a seller.[100]

The sellers had sought to extend the holding of Sears Mortgage Corp. v. Rose, 134 N.J. 326, 634 A.2d 74 (N.J. 1993), which imposed liability based on a closing protection letter.

Some states are seller-pay and some are buyer-pay. Local custom regarding who pays the premium is not dictated by the insurer. The insurer does not assume special risk because of the seller-pay custom in some states. See Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. Becker, 930 S.W.2d 748 (Tex.App.-Corpus Christi 1996), in which the parties claiming a right to a defense were interim joint purchasers who assigned their interest in the purchase contract to the named insured and had paid their "pro rata share" of the premium. However, when a commitment listed the proposed insured as to be determined, the proposed sale fell through, and the seller paid the premium anyway and claimed that he asked for a policy, there was enough of an issue about whether or not the seller could claim to be an insured to prevent entry of an order permitting the insurer to cancel the commitment. Amerimont, Inc. v. Co. of Houston, 1996 WL 134962 (Tex.App.-San Antonio) (unpublished), in which the court noted: "The Settlement Statement signed by plaintiff and her husband clearly shows that she instructed Commonwealth not to disburse funds for an owner's policy but only for the lender Citicorp's coverage." Id. at *4. Similarly, in Bancoklahoma Mortgage Corp. v. Capital Title Co., Inc., 194 F.3d 1089 (10th Cir. (Okla.) 1999), the court found that borrowers had no right to assume that they would get title insurance in connection with refinance loans. In one case, a court held that the borrowers' claim of third party beneficiary status was a question of fact. Fox v. Title Guaranty and Abstract Co. of Mobile, Inc., 337 So.2d 1300 (Ala. 1976). In that case, the insurer missed an IRS lien against the borrower. The insurer bought the property at the tax sale. The borrower argued that the insurer's search negligence had coverage, it is that party's obligation to request and pay for it, a California court ruled:

> In short, a title insurer prepares a preliminary report to limit its own risk--by locating and excluding items from coverage--and not on behalf of any party to a real estate transaction. A party who does not purchase title insurance may not rely on the title insurer to protect his or her interests or to disclose all detrimental information contained in the recorded files. Parties who desire protection against the possibility that negative information exists that was not revealed in the title insurer's search of the records must obtain title insurance. Sections 12340.10 and 12340.11 leave no room for the existence of a duty of care based on the title company's search of records and issuance of a preliminary report and title insurance policy [to the lender].[102]

Similarly, a Texas decision (involving a claim under the state deceptive claim handling practices act) rejected the argument that the borrower's payment of premium made him an insured, because otherwise the borrower "would enjoy the fruits of the contractual relationship he seeks with First American without buying the coverage."[103]

When the borrower signs a form at closing disclosing that the loan policy is not for his benefit, and that the borrower may pay a premium to obtain an owner's policy, this waiver of insurance is good evidence that the borrower had no right to rely on the loan policy.[104] However, the (unpublished), a title insurer that issued a loan policy only was found not to owe a duty to the borrower to remove a lien from his property that had been recorded well before the loan policy date. In Watson v. State of Nebraska, 749 Fed.Appx. 485 (Mem) (8th Cir. (Neb.) 2019) (unpublished), the court dismissed a borrower's claim that the title insurer should have paid a claim made by his lender. In Dillon v. Bayview Loan Servicing, ___ F.Supp.3d ___, 2019 WL 4781847 (D.Nev.) (not yet released for publication), the court dismissed the borrower's claims against the title insurer because they were premised on a policy issued to her lender and she was not an insured or a third party beneficiary of that policy.

Marler*, 83 Cal.App.3d 1, 147 Cal.Rptr. 655 (Cal.App. 1 Dist. 1978), the owner sought the benefit of the insurer's removal of the survey exception from the loan policy only. The court rejected that claim, saying: "Assuming arguendo that the ALTA lenders policy is a representation that the contingencies insured against will not occur, a purchaser insured by a CLTA standard coverage may not recover for damages sustained as a result of his reliance upon them. Thus, even if Transamerica had represented to Columbus and Wells Fargo that the house was located entirely on parcel 4, and did not encroach onto parcel 1, Transamerica would be liable for negligent misrepresentation only to Columbus and Wells Fargo. There would be no liability to Walters if he relied upon such representations to his detriment, even if such reliance was reasonably foreseeable. To hold otherwise would give the purchaser the benefit of extended coverage without having paid the additional premium therefor. (*Contini v. Western Title Ins. insurer is not obligated to instruct the borrower of his right to purchase insurance.[105]

A party to an escrow, or who makes a deposit into escrow, does not thereby become an insured under a policy issued in relation to the transaction.[106] The policy also does not cover a person who buys from the insured[107] or the holder of a lien against the insured parcel.[108] A party who took a collateral assignment of a deed of trust was not a proposed insured on a commitment prepared for the original lender.[109] The assignee of an existing mortgage on the property is not a beneficiary of the policy entitled to sue the insurer-escrowee for having paid off the loan to the wrong party.[110] A builder who reviewed a title commitment prepared for the construction lender had no right to rely on the commitment in determining what setback lines affected the location of the house.[111] A loan broker or servicer is not an insured under a loan policy.[112] have addressed the issue of whether or not a purchaser at sheriff's sale is a third party beneficiary of a title report prepared for the foreclosing lender. It is a common practice for a title insurer to issue commitments for foreclosure actions showing a proposed insured to be named. Such a commitment is prepared for use by the foreclosing lien holder or trustee. A New Jersey case found that a purchaser at sheriff's sale is not a third party beneficiary of an inaccurate title report prepared for the foreclosing lender.

> Because the purpose of the title report was to ascertain the proper parties defendant and to give the appropriate information to the sheriff for the advertisement and the announcements at sale, plaintiff here was at best an incidental beneficiary and without contractual rights against Chicago.[114]

An Illinois court also found that the bidder at sale is not a beneficiary of the foreclosure title report, having elected not to purchase title insurance of his own.[115] However, a federal court sitting in Virginia held that a purchaser at sale had a right to a policy protecting against liens not disclosed in the foreclosure commitment. In MacDonald v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp.,[116] the commitment failed to show six mechanics' liens. The insurer was notified of the error before the sale was conducted, but failed to revise its commitment. A third party was the successful bidder at sale. The insurer added the liens to the commitment after the sale. The purchaser sued to require the insurer to issue a policy protecting against them. The insurer argued that it had no duty to issue a policy because the proposed insured was never identified. The court disagreed, pinning its ruling on the insurer's stipulation to the following fact:

> It is the customary practice in Virginia that when a foreclosing trustee obtains a commitment for title insurance prior to foreclosure, the named insured and amount of the policy are left open to be determined by the high bid at the foreclosure sale.[117]

The court thus found that, by using the phrase "To Be Determined,"

> …the parties to the Commitment indicated that they had reached some sort of agreement as to the identity of the proposed insured. ... The identity of the proposed insured and the amount of the policy are determined by the high bid at the

foreclosure sale.[118]

The Smith decision from New Jersey accurately reflects that the only intended beneficiary of a foreclosure commitment is the foreclosing lender, to whom it is issued and from whom payment is received. The Virginia MacDonald opinion was influenced both by the insurer's failure to amend the title commitment before sale, and its stipulation that the proposed insured was the purchaser at sale. In most jurisdictions, the facts stipulated to in MacDonald would not be accurate.

Also, a party whose rights are adverse to the insured is not a beneficiary of the policy entitled to sue for damages resulting from an error in the policy or due to a covered risk. Thus, when the policy insured an access easement that was determined not to be valid, the party over whose property the easement was claimed was not within the class of those who foreseeably could be injured by defendants' negligent conduct.[119] Therefore, the claimant was not entitled to pursue the insurer for expenses incurred in the lawsuit (in which the insurer had paid to defend the insured against the claimant).

The true owner of property has no standing to sue the title insurer that issued a policy to the grantee, when the insured deed or mortgage was forged or the product of fraud.[120]

Similarly, a party has no rights against the insurer for a claimed interference with, failure to acknowledge, or insurance over the party's rights in the insured property.[121] Similarly, a lender that (unpublished), in which a son falsely claimed to be the general partner of a partnership in a fraudulent sale of property, the escrowee and title insurer had no duty to the father, who was the real general partner, to detect or prevent the fraud. In Anthony v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2007 WL 1144802 (S.D. Ohio) (unpublished), a record owner who claimed that her signature on a deed was forged had no standing to the insurer that issued a policy issued to the grantee. The court said the party was not an insured and the insurer owed her no duty. Similarly, in Hicks v. Saboe, 555 A.2d 1241 (Pa. 1989), an owner whose signature was forged on the prior deed in the chain of title was found not to be an insured or an intended beneficiary of the insurance contract. Slip Op. 00698 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept. 2016), the court held that a property owner may not sue a title insurer for fraud based on the fact that it insured title the owner said had been fraudulently conveyed. In Celestin v. Simpson, 153 A.D.3d 656, 59 N.Y.S.3d 773, 2017 N.Y. Slip Op. 06153 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept. 2017), the owner of property sued the insurer when someone forged a deed to his property. The court did not address the substance of the claim because the court dismissed the lawsuit as being time-barred. In Sanchez v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 2018 WL 2041999 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), the court held that the act of rerecording a forged deed of trust did not make the title company liable to the property owner, whose harm was caused by the person who committed the forgery. In Gutierrez v. Stewart Title Co., 550 S.W.3d 304 (Tex.App.-Houston 2018), the court dismissed a lawsuit brought by an estate against a title insurer in which the estate representative alleged that the insurer had a duty to prevent heirs from selling the property in violation of the terms of the will. However, the court tossed the suit based on the statute of limitations without reaching the question of whether or not the estate had standing to sue the insurer.

[121] A title insurer did not tortiously interfere with a right of first refusal by insuring over that right by the taking of an indemnity, in CS-Lakeview at Gwinnett, Inc. v. Simon Property Group, 283 Ga.App. 686, 642 S.E.2d 393 (Ga.App. 2007). The court also noted that the seller had already decided not to offer the property to the holder of the right before the title commitment was issued. In Walker v. Anderson-Oliver Title Ins. Agency, Inc., 309 P.3d 267, 741 Utah Adv.Rep.

did not get paid off at a closing had no right to sue the title insurer that insured the new loan, because the insurer owed no duty to the old lender. Further, the old lender held an agreement by the borrowers not to sell or mortgage the property, but not a lien. The court held that the title insurer did not participate in a conspiracy to violate that agreement by the transfer of the property to a bankruptcy-remote entity as part of the new loan.[122] Similarly, a borrower is not a third party beneficiary of a loan policy commitment. When the commitment called for the delivery of the borrower's paid promissory note from a loan to be paid off, the borrower had no cause of action against the insurer when the insurer waived its own requirement and did not collect the cancelled note.[123]

7.8 Assignment Of Policy Or Claim

The ALTA policies do not provide for assignment of the policy, or a claim under the policy, from the insured to a purchaser. To the contrary, the 2006 ALTA policies state, in Conditions 2:

> This policy shall not continue in force in favor of any purchaser from the Insured of either (i) an estate or interest in the Land, or (ii) an obligation secured by a purchase money Mortgage given to the Insured.

In most states, therefore, an owner-insured may not assign its claim under the policy to a purchaser of the property, or retain the claim on sale. A Michigan decision held that the assignment of a policy and claim by the insured to his purchaser was void. The purchaser was not an insured under the policy, and the coverage of the policy terminated as to the named insured when the insured ceased to have an insurable interest in the land. There was no "warranty liability" because the insured conveyed without warranty.[124] When the insurer owes money to an insured owner in payment of a claim, a lender may establish that it is entitled to receive the money after the insured owner borrower has defaulted on the loan, based on the terms of the loan agreement or the security interest granted to the lender, analogous to the lender's right to insurance proceeds payable on a casualty loss.[125] The provision allowing the insurer to pay a lender and receive credit for that payment toward the owner's loss is discussed at §3.2.2.

37, 2013 UT App 202 (Utah App. 2013), a title insurer that did not make exception for two purported easements was found not to be liable to the easement holder for claimed interference with his property rights.

[125] In Van Buren Estates Lenders, LLC v. Fiegl, 2015 WL 4931502 (Cal.App. 4 Dist.) (unpublished), the court found that a provision in a deed of trust stating that the lien also encumbered insurance proceeds was broad enough to include money paid by a title insurer into escrow in settlement of a policy claim made by the owner, which had defaulted on the loan. The lender thus had a claim to the money that was superior to that of a junior lien holder, who had obtained a court-ordered lien on the money.

Several early decisions concerned older policy language that permitted assignment of the policy.[126] Those decisions interpreted policy terms that do not appear in modern ALTA policy forms, making their reasoning inapplicable to the construction of an ALTA policy.[127]

The ALTA Homeowner's Policy unequivocally states that the policy may not be assigned. Conditions 1.h of that policy says that "You cannot assign this Policy to anyone else." Other ALTA policies do not contain an explicit prohibition on the assignment of the policy. On the other hand, the Homeowner's policy does not contain the statement found in other ALTA policies that a purchaser does not become an insured. The non-assignability provision thus serves the purpose of making it clear that a purchaser from the insured does not become an insured. The purchaser statement is not necessary in the Homeowner's policy, because it does not define successor insureds as those persons "who succeed to the interest of such insured by operation of law as distinguished from purchase." With no reference to purchase in the policy, there is no need to explain that purchasers are not insureds.

A particular state's general law regarding insurance contracts may be that a claim is assignable, once discovered and tendered to the insurer. Such cases involving other lines of insurance should not be precedential as to the title insurance contract, which is different in its nature from other lines of insurance.[128] An assignment of the proceeds from a claim under the policy is different from a purported assignment of the policy itself. If state law recognizes a policy holder's right to assign the proceeds of an insurance claim to a third party, such an assignment of a title insurance claim may be enforceable.[129] However, the assignment of the proceeds of a claim does not (unpublished), the court held that a loan policy terminated when the insured lender conducted a trustee's sale and a third party made the successful bid. The lender assigned its policy claim to the bidder, but the court said this did not prevent the policy from terminating. The court did not directly rule that the assignment was ineffective, however. In Property Asset Management, Inc. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 173 F.3d 84 (2nd Cir. N.Y. 1999), the court held that, once the policy terminated due to a conveyance to a party who was not an insured, the insured had no power to assign a policy claim to the grantee.

Dec. 212, 535 N.E.2d 977 (1989), the lender assigned not the policy but the proceeds of the pending title insurance claim to the purchaser of the loan. The assignee sued to enforce its right to the claim proceeds, after the insurer paid the assignor. In In re Longview Power, LLC, 516 B.R. 282 (D.Del. 2014), the insured lenders assigned to two lien claimants the right to money paid by the title insurer to extinguish those lien claimants' liens, reserving to the insureds all of their other policy rights. This assignment was made as a deal to compromise claims in the bankruptcy estate of the borrower-owner. The court held that the partial assignment of proceeds only was enforceable, holding that: "Nothing in Shamrock or in the Policy provides that all rights must be assigned before a party can assert any rights. There is no reason a partial assignment must fail. Because the claims at issue relate to Policy proceeds in which the Debtors have a stake, the Debtors have standing to assert these claims." The assignment did not make the assignee the insured, but gave it the authority to pursue the claim as well as to receive any claim payment. The court referred to Shamrock Bank of Florida v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 1304694 (S.D.Ill. 2014) (unpublished), which held that an assignment of both the loan and the policy (in full) gave the confer on the assignee the status of an insured.

7.9 Loan Policy Continuation And Termination

If the lender takes title to the property, Condition 2 states that the policy remains in effect while the lender is the owner.[130] Once the insured lender becomes the owner of the insured property, all three predicate conditions to the insured's entitlement to make a claim for a title defect are considered to have been fulfilled. For example, whereas an insurer might respond to a lender's claim based on an easement with watchful waiting when the insured holds a mortgage, the insurer will take action to resolve the easement claim once the lender owns the insured parcel. See §§3.2.4 and 3.2.4.1 for a complete discussion of the predicate conditions for a loan policy claim and the method used to determine the amount of the insured's loss due to a covered lien.

However, the loan policy terminates if the insured conducts a foreclosure sale for the insured mortgage but does not take title through that sale.[131]

If the lender takes title to the property, invoking the continuation provision, the policy terminates when the lender voluntarily conveys the property, with two exceptions. The policy continues further to the extent of the insured's liability for warranties of title it made in conveying assignee standing as an insured.

[130] Condition 2 states: "The coverage of this policy shall continue in force as of Date of Policy in favor of an Insured after acquisition of the Title by an Insured or after conveyance by an Insured, but only so long as the Insured retains an estate or interest in the Land, or holds an obligation secured by a purchase money Mortgage given by a purchaser from the Insured, or only so long as the Insured shall have liability by reason of warranties in any transfer or conveyance of the Title. This policy shall not continue in force in favor of any purchaser from the Insured of either (i) an estate or interest in the Land, or (ii) an obligation secured by a purchase money Mortgage given to the Insured." See Preservation Capital Consultants, LLC v. First American Title Ins. Co., 406 S.C. 309, 751 S.E.2d 256 (S.C. 2013), which acknowledged that the loan policy continues after the lender takes title.

[131] In Hovannisian v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2017 WL 3141099, 2017 WL 3477122 (Cal.App. 5 Dist.) (unpublished), the court held that a loan policy terminated when the insured lender conducted a trustee's sale and a third party made the successful bid. The court said that the lender's assignment of its policy claim to the bidder did not alter the result. In Property Asset Management, Inc. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 173 F.3d 84 (2nd Cir. N.Y. 1999), Midlantic Bank made a mortgage loan on New York property and obtained a title policy from Chicago Title. Midlantic foreclosed. Midlantic was the successful bidder. The next day, Midlantic assigned the loan to ALI, Inc., a subsidiary of Lehman Brothers. A different subsidiary of Lehman Brothers, Property Asset Management, Inc. (PAMI), was substituted as plaintiff in the foreclosure action. PAMI obtained a deficiency judgment. More than a year later, ALI assigned the mortgage to PAMI, but backdated the assignment to the date on which Midlantic had assigned to ALI. Apparently, the reason for the late assignment was to help PAMI assert a claim against the title insurance policy, which PAMI did shortly thereafter. PAMI never took title to the real estate. Chicago Title denied the claim because PAMI was not the successor insured under the policy. As the court explained, "PAMI cannot assert a claim on the insurance policy as the assignee of ALI and Midlantic unless an assignment was validly made prior to the entry of the deficiency judgment... . Entry of the deficiency judgment terminated the mortgage loan, and it was on that loan that the title insurance policy was issued. Once the mortgage loan went out of existence, the holder of that loan--whoever that might be--no longer had an interest in the policy to assign. …The district court concluded that the evidence did not support a finding that PAMI had been in exclusive control of the loan between June 8 and August 7, 1995. We agree. Without such a showing, PAMI cannot maintain that it came into possession of the loan before that loan was extinguished on June 23. And if it did not own the loan, it has no claim under the insurance policy issued on that loan."

the property,[132] and also continues in effect as to any mortgage taken back by the insured from a subsequent purchaser. Most cases interpreting the continuation provision have been decided under owner's policies. Those cases are collected at §7.3. See also §7.4, concerning successor insureds under a loan policy.

If the lender does not come into title to the insured property, the loan policy terminates when the indebtedness secured by the insured mortgage is fully paid.[133] The full credit bid or one-recovery

[132] In M & I Marshall & Ilsley Bank v. Wright, 2011 WL 181292 (D.Ariz.) (unpublished), the court refused to find the policy terminated because the lender had resold the property, because it had made a claim before selling the property. The court said "coverage may still exist for damages sustained during the coverage period, even if a claim is submitted after the coverage period." It cited Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. 100 Investment Ltd. Partnership, 355 F.3d 759, 765-66 (4th Cir. 2004). In Hovannisian v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2017 WL 3141099, 2017 WL 3477122 (Cal.App. 5 Dist.) (unpublished), the court held that the insured lender conveyed the property without warranty and did not take back a mortgage, so that the continuation of coverage provision was not invoked. The Hovannisian court also cited 100 Investment, but for its statement that "[i]f a preexisting defect in title were to remain after the insured conveyed the land, the risk inherent in that defect would pass to the purchaser and the insured would no longer have risk, nor coverage." The Hovannisian court thus rejected the notion that the insured could continue to make a claim after conducting a sale at which a third party took title. Most decisions concerning warranty coverage and the continuation provision concern owner's policies. Those decisions are reviewed in §7.3.

[133] Conditions & Stipulations 9(c) of the 1992 ALTA Loan policy states that full payment of the debt terminates all liability under the policy. Note that this provision is not found in the 2006 ALTA Loan policy, which states at Conditions 9(b) that "[t]he voluntary satisfaction or release of the Insured Mortgage shall terminate all liability of the Company except as provided in Section 2 of these Conditions." However, Conditions 8(a)(ii) of the 2006 policy states that the amount of loss is the least of policy limits, the property's value, the amount paid by a governmental entity on a guaranty or "the Indebtedness," which is a defined term in the 2006 policy. The 1992 ALTA Loan policy also contains the pro tanto payment provision, Conditions & Stipulations 9(a), which says that all payments "by any person of the principal of the indebtedness ... shall reduce the amount of insurance pro tanto." The termination provision was enforced in Hodas v. First American Title Ins. Co., 696 A.2d 1095 (Maine 1997), which stated: "After an insured mortgagee purchases the mortgaged premises at foreclosure, coverage continues provided there remains unpaid principal indebtedness. Coverage is limited, however, to the lesser of the outstanding indebtedness or the stated policy limit." The Hodas court found the policy to remain in effect after the lender's purchase at foreclosure sale up to the amount of the loan deficiency amount. See also First Midwest Bank, N.A. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 355 Ill.App.3d 546, 823 N.E.2d 168 (Ill.App. 1 Dist. 2005), which held that a loan policy was terminated on the payoff of the insured loan following a refinance by the same lender. The lender had argued that the new loan was not intended to satisfy the debt secured by the insured mortgage, but was really a wraparound loan. The court rejected the argument, noting that the original note had been cancelled and the mortgage released. In Morrison v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 711 F.Supp.2d 369 (M.D.Pa. 2010), the court found that an insurer's duty to defend a lender insured ceased when the loan was paid off, and that the insurer was permitted to retender defense to the insured while the lawsuit was still pending. Also, in Joglor, LLC v. First American Title Ins. Co., 261 F.Supp.3d 224 (D.P.R. 2016), the insured lender's acceptance of cash in a settlement under which it released the borrower from all liability under two notes extinguished the debt and the mortgages, and terminated the loan policies. The court also held that a purported assignment of the mortgages to the borrower in the settlement agreement did not make the borrower a successor insured under the policies. However, in Branch Banking & Trust Co. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 714 S.E.2d 514 (N.C.App. 2011), the borrower signed a renewal note two years after the insured deed of trust was recorded, and the lender recorded a new deed of trust and released the old. The policy insured the first deed of trust. The court held that the policy was not terminated because the debt had not been satisfied; effectively, the policy was deemed to insure the later deed of trust. Essentially the opposite result from Branch Banking was obtained in Pekkola v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 2013 WL 3873233 (D.Or.) (unpublished), the court held that a loan policy terminated when the insured lender replaced the promissory note with a new debt instrument after the policy date. The court noted that, although the policy insured the deeds of trust and not the debt, the references in Conditions 8(d)(i) to subsequent rule adopted in some states treats a full credit bid at foreclosure as a satisfaction of the debt. Having bid in the full amount of the debt at a foreclosure sale, the lender cannot seek to collect the debt from the borrower or third parties:

> The lender's full credit bid establishes the value of the security as being equal to the amount of the indebtedness. Hence, the lender cannot establish any impairment of security and cannot recover any damages [against the borrower] for waste.[134]

The full credit bid rule corresponds to the 1992 ALTA Loan policy term stating that payment of the debt in full by any person extinguishes the policy. Some courts have held that this rule precludes a lender from recovering from a title insurer any amount that the lender made as a credit bid at sale.[135] However, some courts have held that a full credit bid is not a "payment" of the debt that terminates the policy.[136] One issue those courts have raised is that Condition 2 of the ALTA Loan policy states indebtedness made it "clear … that the parties intended the policy to be connected to the original note between Plaintiffs and Bundy." When the parties signed a new note and a new security agreement, that tie was severed, and insurance coverage forfeited: The court said it did not have sufficient facts to decide the case based on the insurer's claim that the policy had been extinguished on repayment of all of the debt that existed as of the date of policy. Condition and Stipulation 8(d)(i) of the 1992 ALTA policy says that there is no coverage for post-policy advances. The parties disagreed on how repayments should be applied, with Fidelity arguing that all repayments should be applied first to the original loan. The Pekkolas argued that the policy did not say how advances were to be applied, and the borrower and lender had not established their agreement on the subject either. The court said it was impossible to determine that issue on summary judgment.

[135] In Freedom Mortgage Corp. v. Burnham Mortgage, Inc., 2006 WL 695467 (N.D.Ill., March 13, 2006) (No. 03 C 6508) (unpublished), the lender sought to recoup losses caused by loan fraud from various parties, including title insurers, after having made full credit bids at its foreclosure sales. Relying on the California decisions in Cornelison and Romo cited above, the court held that the lender was precluded from recovering from any of the third parties, because otherwise the lender could in effect obtain double recovery: "These cases instruct that, absent proof that a lender's credit bid was the proximate result of fraud, the bid stands as against third parties (not, as Plaintiff contends, only against borrowers or junior creditors). … In this case, Freedom was not stuck with appraisals potentially tainted by fraud. … There simply has not been, nor could there be on the record before the Court, any allegations that the credit bids were proximately caused by any of the Defendants' fraudulent misrepresentations. … In other words, Freedom knew the actual values of the Properties, and had the power to bid the way it wanted to protect its interests." In Federal Deposit Ins. Corp. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2015 WL 5276346 (N.D.Ill. 2015) (unpublished), the court applied Freedom Mortgage in a suit against a loan closer, not under a title insurance policy claim, to hold that the maximum amount that the FDIC could recover against a loan closer for its alleged failure to inform the defunct lender about double escrows was the amounts of the deficiency judgments taken by the FDIC after its credit bids on foreclosure. The FDIC made numerous arguments seeking to distinguish Freedom Mortgage, all of which the court rejected. In Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. Dedmore, 2014 WL 4354663 (Cal.App. 1 Dist.) (unpublished), California's one-action or anti-deficiency law was applied to preclude a title insurer from collecting from the owners on the note after the insurer bought the loan and reconveyed the property in order to resolve the claim under the loan policy. In Dedmore, the insurer did not make a credit bid and did not assert in the reconveyance that the debt had been paid or discharged, so that the anti-deficiency law was not invoked.

[136] In M & I Marshall & Ilsley Bank v. Wright, 2011 WL 181292 (D.Ariz.) (unpublished), a federal court sitting in that it continues in effect if the insured comes into title and, typically, the insured lender comes into title through the sale at which it makes its full credit bid. Also, the 2006 ALTA Loan policy does not say that the policy terminates on full payment of the debt secured by the mortgage.

The loan policy also terminates if the lien of the mortgage is released, unless the insured lender comes into title contemporaneously with the mortgage release.[137] Under the 2006 ALTA Loan policy, voluntary satisfaction or release of the insured mortgage is the only stated event under which the policy terminates.

The loan policy also terminates when the insured mortgage is extinguished by the foreclosure of a superior lien that is excepted in the policy. This event is not listed in the policy termination provision. However, Condition 2 states that the policy remains in effect "only so long as the insured retains an estate or interest in the land... ."[138]

Arizona refused to apply the full credit bid rule to a title insurance claim even though the rule has been applied by a state court to a casualty insurance claim, saying: "… casualty insurance and the title insurance policy at issue here are not the same. One is related to problems with the property itself, while another specifically addresses the mortgagee's lien. … While it may make sense that a full credit bid should extinguish any right to demand further compensation related to the value of the property, losses arising from the unenforceability of the lien are separate, and may be resolved independently." In Bank of Idaho v. First American Title Ins. Co., 156 Idaho 618, 329 P.3d 1066 (Idaho 2014), the court held that the lender's full credit bid at its foreclosure sale did not reduce the policy amount, pursuant to Conditions & Stipulations 9(c), which provides that "[p]ayment in full by any person or the voluntary satisfaction or release of the insured mortgage shall terminate all liability of the Company except as provided in Section 2(a) of these Conditions and Stipulations." The court said the reference to Conditions 2(a), the continuation provision, was the flaw in the insurer's analysis that the bid was a payment. The court said that the bid was the act that permitted the lender to come into title. If that same bid extinguished the policy, coverage would not continue after the lender took title. The 2006 ALTA Loan policy does not state that the policy is terminated on payment in full of the debt. Conditions 10(b) of the 2006 policy limits policy termination to the event of the "voluntary satisfaction or release of the Insured Mortgage," and states "except as provided in Section 2 of these Conditions." Similarly, in Preservation Capital Consultants, LLC v. First American Title Ins. Co., 406 S.C. 309, 751 S.E.2d 256 (S.C. 2013), the loan policy amount was $3,075,000. The loan was secured by three parcels, including a defective lien on a small parcel that the lender knew would be in second position. The lender foreclosed on the main parcel, making a credit bid of $3,250,000. By the time of that sale, the debt with interest was $3,641,190. After subtracting the bid amount, the loan balance was $391,190, just over the amount of the lost equity in the second-lien parcel. The court held that the credit bid did not extinguish the policy, saying simply that it was unfair to reduce the policy amount dollar-for-dollar based on the credit bid amount. In Equity Income Partners LP v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 241 Ariz. 334, 387 P.3d 1263 (Ariz. 2017), the Arizona Supreme Court held that a lender's credit bid did not constitute a "payment" under Condition 9(b), basing its decision largely on the Bank of Idaho decision and supporting the M & I Arizona federal court ruling from six years earlier.

[137] Condition 10(b) of the 2006 ALTA Loan policy states: "The voluntary satisfaction or release of the Insured Mortgage shall terminate all liability of the Company except as provided in Section 2 of these Conditions." Condition 2 is the continuation of coverage provision. In RNT Holdings, LLC v. United General Title Ins. Co., 230 Cal.App.4th 1289, 179 Cal.Rptr.3d 175 (Cal.App. 2 Dist. 2014), the first California decision on the issue, the court held that a lender's reconveyance of the insured deed of trust terminated a loan policy. In Wells Fargo Bank, N.A. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2016 WL 4455070 (D.S.C. 2016) (unpublished), the insured lender released its lien on payment of less than the full amount owed, after the insurer denied its claim as premature. The court held that the release was not an adequate basis on which to dismiss the lender's suit for breach of policy. However, the insurer also argued in the alternative that the release was a voluntary settlement. The latter was the only policy provision analyzed in the decision.

[138] In First Midwest Bank, N.A. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 355 Ill.App.3d 546, 291 Ill.Dec. 158, 823 N.E.2d 168 (2005), the court held that the full release of the insured mortgage terminated the policy. In Countrywide Home Loans,

The purchase of a loan by an assignee is not a payment that terminates the policy. Rather, the new owner of the debt becomes a successor insured.[139] The loan assignee's status as a successor insured is discussed at §7.4.

Several courts have held that an insured lender is entitled to be defended in an action in which the borrower seeks to rescind the payoff of the insured's loan, when a revival of the insured lien would also resuscitate the insured's claim for a covered defect in the title.[140] However, the mere fact that the borrower seeks to rescind the loan payoff has been held not to trigger a duty to defend; the action must also make claims against the insured that invoke the potential for policy coverage.[141]

Inc. v. United General Title Ins. Co., 109 A.D.3d 950, 971 N.Y.S.2d 353 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept. 2013), 2013 N.Y. Slip Op. 05981, when an insured lender voluntarily released the insured mortgage after learning from the true owner that it had been signed by an impersonator, and the release was issued before the policy claim was made, the release did not terminate policy coverage. The case of Bluff Ventures Limited Partnership v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 950 F. 2d 139 (4th Cir. 1991), presents an unusual situation in which the court found that the policy remained in effect after the lien was wiped out in the foreclosure of a senior lien. The insured lender, William L. Walde, held a second mortgage. He discovered a judgment lien affecting the property. Then the first mortgagee foreclosed. Walde submitted a claim after he became the successful bidder at sale. The insurer stipulated that the assignment of Walde's rights to a partnership he would form would not terminate policy coverage, but the insurer insisted at the same time that the policy had been terminated because the completed foreclosure extinguished the lien of the second mortgage. Walde completed the bid anyway, got rid of the judgment and sued the insurer. The court never directly addressed or ruled on the issue of policy termination, because the issue was not raised by the insurer on appeal. The court did hold that there was a policy and that the insurer had a duty to pay damages to the assignee partnership. There are two factors in Bluff Ventures that distinguish it from the usual case in which an insured lien is extinguished by foreclosure. First, the claim was made before the sale was confirmed, and the insurer specifically agreed that whatever rights Walde had could be assigned to the partnership. Second, although Walde lost his lien on the property, he became the fee owner. He therefore continued to have "an interest" in the property. Nonetheless, the insurer was correct in its first assessment that the policy terminated when the insured mortgage was foreclosed.

[139] In C.A.M. Affiliates, Inc. v. First American Title Ins. Co., 306 Ill.App.3d 1015, 715 N.E.2d 778, 240 Ill.Dec. 91 (Ill.App. 1 Dist. 1999), the named insured sold the loan while its suit against the insurer for a claimed policy loss was pending. The insurer argued that the money paid for the loan was a full payment of the debt that terminated the policy under Conditions & Stipulations 9(c) of the 1992 ALTA Loan policy. The court disagreed, saying: "C.A.M.'s payment was not a repayment of the principal of the indebtedness. Rather, it was simply a transfer of the indebtedness from one entity to another for a premium. Consequently, this section of the insurance policy does not apply, and First American is responsible for the claims made by plaintiffs against their policies."

[140] In Paramount Properties Co. v. Transamerica Title Ins. Co., 1 Cal.3d 562, 83 Cal.Rptr. 394, 463 P.2d 746 (Cal. 1970), the insured lender and others were sued on the grounds that the borrower had obtained title by fraud. The insurer defended the lender. In the settlement of the case, the lender was paid off. Shortly thereafter, however, the lender was sued again, on the assertion that the payoff was made under duress in order to make a sale of the property go through. The insurer refused a tender of defense. The court found that there was a duty to defend, however, because the policy terminates on "payment in full." The borrower's second action contested the legal effectiveness of the payment. Similarly, in Davis v. Elite Mortgage Services, Inc., 2009 WL 1514548 (N.D.Ill.) (unpublished), the insured lender was paid off through a later loan, but the former owner sued to rescind the sale and also the payoff to the lender. The court found that the policy was not terminated, and the title insurer had a duty to defend the lender.

[141] In Deutsche Bank Nat'l Ass'n v. First American Title Ins. Co., 465 Mass. 741, 991 N.E.2d 638 (Mass. 2013), the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court held that a title insurer had no duty to defend claims by the borrower against the insured lender to rescind the loan and for tortious conduct in the making of the loan, even though one remedy the

7.10 Imputation Of Named Insured's Knowledge To Successor

As described above, a successor in interest or party related to the insured may become an insured. The knowledge and actions of the predecessor insured are imputed to the successor. For example, when a sole shareholder was found to be an insured under a policy naming the corporation as insured, all defenses that the insurer might have against the corporation could be imputed against the shareholder.[142] In commercial transactions involving partnerships or corporate stock acquisitions, the new owner often obtains a non-imputation endorsement. Most forms of the endorsement are written as a waiver of the insurer's right to impute knowledge of the named officers or directors to the insured as a defense to coverage under knowledge-of-the-insured exclusion, which is Exclusion 3(b) in most ALTA policy forms.

The ALTA loan policy provides that the insurer may assert against a successor insured owner of the debt all defenses that would be available against the named insured unless the successor acquired the debt as a purchaser for value without knowledge of the title defect.[143] This provision closely tracks the Uniform Commercial Code concept of a holder in due course of an indebtedness. An insured with knowledge of a title defect may not assign the loan to a nominee, for no consideration, in order to avoid the invocation of a policy defense.

However, when a court reforms the policy to alter its terms, such as to add exceptions, based on the acts and knowledge of the named insured, the policy as reformed is binding on the successor insured also.[144]

In order to assert policy defenses against a loan assignee insured, the insurer must establish that the defense existed as to the named insured, and that the assignee purchased the loan with actual knowledge of the defect, lien, encumbrance or other matter insured against by the policy.[145] Title borrower sought was to rescind the insured mortgage. Deutsche tendered its defense to its title insurer, First American, because Brown sought to rescind both the loan and the insured mortgage. The court held that First American correctly declined to defend because, as the insurer put it, "Brown does not challenge that she granted the mortgage, rather she claims that she was misinformed as to the terms of the note." This did not invoke a Covered Risk, and several exclusions applied.

[142] Peachtree Management & Inv. Co., Inc. v. Pioneer Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 541 F.Supp. 51 (N.D.Ga. 1981).

[143] The definition of insured in the 2006 ALTA Loan Policy states at (ii): "[w]ith regard to (A), (B), (C), (D), and (E) reserving, however, all rights and defenses as to any successor that the Company would have had against any predecessor Insured, unless the successor acquired the Indebtedness as a purchaser for value without Knowledge of the asserted defect, lien, encumbrance, or other matter insured against by this policy." The successor insureds described in A through E of the definition includes all such successors other than " any government agency or instrumentality that is an insurer or guarantor under an insurance contract or guaranty insuring or guaranteeing the Indebtedness secured by the Insured Mortgage, or any part of it, whether named as an Insured or not… ."

[144] In BAPCO LLC v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 2019 WL 5576863 (Ariz.App. 1 Div.) (unpublished), the court reformed a policy to add exceptions for the two senior deeds of trust that the lender knew to exist. The insurer was not barred from enforcing the policy as reformed against the successor holder of the loan, because reformation alters the policy as originally written.

[145] In Northern California Community Development Corp. v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2019 WL 1397040

insurers routinely request from loan assignee insureds the information disclosed to them before the purchase of the loan. One source of information about a title defect can be a later title report that discloses the issue. Another source of information can be the credit report, if it discloses the debt or lien that is at issue. When loans are sold at auction, there is typically a disclosure package delivered to potential bidders. That package is often the means by which the title defect is disclosed to the bidder.

A governmental entity that was an insurer or guarantor of the debt is an insured under the ALTA policies, as discussed in full at §7.4. The ALTA Loan policy states that the insurer does not have the right to assert against a governmental insurer or guarantor those policy defenses that were available against a predecessor owner of the debt. As a result, if the Veterans' Administration, (Cal.App. 3 Dist.) (unpublished), the court held that a community development corporation that bought two old loans for one dollar each, in an assignment that disclosed that the subdivision project had flopped, had no title insurance coverage against a court order for a partition sale of the development as the only way for people to get back their investments. In GreenPoint Mortgage Funding Inc. v. Stewart Title Ins. Co., 12 Misc.3d 1194(A), 2006 WL 2337967, 2006 N.Y. Slip Op. 51568 (N.Y.Sup. 2006) (unpublished), the named insured was Royal Mortgage Bankers, which made a loan to its owner, Louis Crispino. After Crispino died, his wife sued to set aside the mortgage because Crispino had forged her signature. Royal had sold the loan to GreenPoint Mortgage. The insurer accused Royal of sloppy lending practices and sought to impute Crispino's acts to it, then assert Royal's negligence as a defense to GreenPoint under the successor provision. The court refused to employ the provision to negate coverage because, it found, there was no evidence that either Royal or GreenPoint actually knew about the forgery, despite the lax lending practices. In Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. Matrix Financial Services Corp., 255 Ga.App. 874, 567 S.E.2d 96 (Ga.App. 2002), the loan was assigned back to the original lender after discovery of a title defect. The insurer asserted that the lender had been careless, but was unable to prove that it had actual knowledge of the title defect. The court acknowledged that the lender would be subject to title defects of which it had actual knowledge, but found that the provision did not come into play because the lender had no such actual knowledge. In Johnsen and Allphin Properties v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2013 WL 6230344 (D. Utah) (unpublished), on a motion to dismiss, the court ruled only that a successor holder of the loan must be shown to have had actual knowledge of the lien in dispute at the time it bought the loan, which may or may not be evidenced by a title report it received that disclosed the lien. The court held that actual knowledge does not encompass inquiry notice. It did note the irony that, had the assignee conducted no due diligence, the insurer would have no possible coverage defense based on knowledge, which appears to reward sloth. In a later decision, the court made few new rulings other than that there was a question of fact about what the insured knew that would require a trial. Johnsen and Allphin Properties, LLC v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2016 WL 6459579 (D. Utah 2016) (unpublished). See §11.3 for a complete discussion of Exclusion 3(b). In Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. National Enterprises, Inc., 133 F.3d 929 (Table), 1997 WL 800294 (9th Cir. (Cal.)) (unpublished), the court held that the purchase of the loan by a party that knows of a title defect does not by itself invoke the exclusion. In Southern Title Ins. Co. v. Crow, 278 So.2d 294 (Fla.App. 1973), cert den. 284 So.2d 221 (Fla. 1973), the court held that a policy defense against the named insured could not be asserted against an assignee of the loan, because the insurer had offered no proof that the assignee bought the loan with knowledge of the issue. Housing Development Corporation made a loan that was eventually assigned to the Crows. The mortgage was held to be invalid because Housing Development did not comply with Truth-in-Lending Act. The Crows sued under the policy. The court said that the policy "excludes defects 'known to the insured Claimant.' Appellant reads this as if it said 'named insured,' and that is the fallacy in its argument." The court said that there was "no claim that either of the ‘insured Claimants' knew of the defect, and while the defense might be good against the original insured, it is not available against the appellees, who took without notice of the defective title." In Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. RM Kids, LLC, ___ Ga.App. ___, 835 S.E.2d 21 (Ga.App. 2019), the named insured lender had actual knowledge of the existence of a recorded notice of groundwater contamination. It sold the loan. The assignee insisted that the notice was not disclosed to it when it purchased the loan, which prevented the insurer from asserting Exclusion 3(a). The successor insured obtained a large jury verdict against the insurer based on the effect of the notice, which was not excepted in the policy.

Federal Housing Administration or another governmental body insures or guarantees the loan and later takes an assignment of it on payment under its insurance or guaranty contract, that entity is not subject to coverage defenses that would have been available against the named insured, principally Exclusions 3(a) and 3(b).

However, the bar to asserting defenses against government insurers or guarantors does not encompass every governmental entity that may become the owner of the loan. For example, if the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation takes over a bank and briefly holds its assets, the bar to the assertion of policy defenses does not apply, because the FDIC was not an insurer or guarantor of the Indebtedness. The FDIC insures deposits with the financial institution, but does not insure its loans.[146] Likewise, Federal Home Loan Mortgage Corporation and Federal National Mortgage Association are not loan insurers or guarantors, and the insurer is not barred from asserting policy defenses against them. Further, if a loan is held by the VA and then sold to a private party who buys the loan with knowledge of the title defect, the insurer may assert all policy defenses. The policy does not get scrubbed of policy defenses just because it passed through the hands of a governmental insurer or guarantor.

For a complete discussion of knowledge and notice under Exclusion 3(b), see §11.3.2.

[146] See Shamrock Bank of Florida v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 1304694 (S.D.Ill. 2014) (unpublished), in which the FDIC took over the institution that made the loan and assigned the loan to one of its loan participant banks. The insurer produced a witness who testified that the named insured lender's president and its board member were both aware of the reverter that was the subject of the claim, and had agreed to allow the borrower to obtain its release after the loan was made. However, the president denied it. The court found that the predecessor's knowledge could be asserted as a defense against the assignee, but held that the evidence of that lender's conduct was too equivocal to invoke Exclusion 3(a).

8 Estate and Land Insured

The first subject of this chapter is the resolution of claims in which there is a dispute over whether or not the insured holds the estate named on Schedule A. The second subject of this chapter is questions over the scope of the policy's coverage as to the parcel and rights in land that the policy insures. The policy defines "Land" as the parcel or parcels described in Schedule A, plus the improvements located thereon that are considered by state law to be affixed to the real estate.[1] The policy does not insure ownership of any appurtenant rights that may exist in adjacent property, including rights in any adjacent public street, unless the policy contains an additional affirmative assurance of such rights.

8.1 The Insured Estate

Schedule A of the policy is in the nature of a declarations page. It recites the policy number, its date, the amount of insurance, the name of the insured, the description of land whose title is insured, and the estate held by the insured (or, in the case of the loan policy, the estate held by the borrower). Schedule A is not a statement of covered risks. Thus, the recital of the insured's estate, and the tenancy in which title is held, is not an assurance in the nature of a covered risk. The policy merely recites the estate and tenancy drawn from the conveyance to the insured.

However, Covered Risk 1 indemnifies the insured in the event that title is not vested in the insured, as described in the policy. When the insured does not hold the full estate as insured, and as described in Schedule A, Covered Risk 1 may be invoked. The covered risk is typically invoked when the insured intended to receive the estate that is described in the policy, but that interest was not conveyed to the insured, whether by mistake or because the seller held a lesser or different estate than as insured.[2] However, if the policy recites an estate that was not created by the conveyance

[1] Condition 1(g) of the 2006 ALTA policies defines "Land" as: "The land described in Schedule A, and affixed improvements that by law constitute real property. The term 'Land' does not include any property beyond the lines of the area described in Schedule A, nor any right, title, interest, estate, or easement in abutting streets, roads, avenues, alleys, lanes, ways, or waterways, but this does not modify or limit the extent that a right of access to and from the Land is insured by this policy."

[2] For example, in Black v. Pioneer Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 138 Ga.App. 138, 225 S.E.2d 689 (1976), Schedule A insured instrument, the policy is a product of a mutual mistake because the insured did not purchase the estate or interest stated in Schedule A; in such cases, the insurer is entitled to reform the policy to correct the error, and no loss is payable to the insured.[3] See §11.4 regarding Exclusion 3(c) ("no loss"), and §11.2.1 for the cases under Exclusion 3(a) for matters agreed to in the purchase contract. The insurer should be prepared to demonstrate from the transaction documents that the policy wording was a mere error, and not a judgment call.[4] Conversely, when the policy correctly recites the estate for which the insured bargained but the conveyance instrument recites the wrong estate, the insurer may have an obligation to the insured, which is typically resolved by seeking to reform the deed.[5] See §3.4 regarding the right to clear title.

Schedule A also sometimes recites the tenancy by which the insureds hold title. Covered Risk 1 may grant coverage if the insured can establish that he or she intended to receive a particular tenancy, such as a joint tenancy with survivorship rights, and that tenancy was insured in the policy but was not conveyed due to an error or deficiency in the conveyance.[6] However, the coverage for such a claim is dubious when the sole title issue is that two or more insureds who took title jointly received undivided interests of a different nature than what is recited in the policy. The conveyance expresses the true mutual intent of the grantees to a deed. If the policy describes the tenancy differently from the true intended tenancy, none of the insureds suffer actual monetary loss or damage as a result. The policy should be reformed, if necessary, in such cases.

The policy does not obligate the insurer to defend an insured in a lawsuit brought by a co-

the fee simple of an area "[l]ess and except that portion of said property embraced within the bounds of Interstate Highway No. 26 and subject to right-of-way easement of Westvaco Corp. crossing said property... ." Schedule B referred to the Westvaco Corp. interest as a right-of-way. In fact, rather than an easement, Westvaco owned the fee simple of that area. To solve the defect, the insured purchased the land from Westvaco. The court required the insurer to reimburse the insured, because title was not vested as shown. Also, in Rudolph v. Title & Trust Co. of Fla., 402 So.2d 1275 (Fla.App. 1981), a claim was payable when Schedule A erroneously stated that the insured held fee simple, while in fact the interest was a leasehold. In Allison v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 907 F.2d 645 (7th Cir. 1990), the court held that the insurer had a duty to defend the insureds when a bankruptcy trustee sought an order declaring that the insureds held not leaseholds, as insured, but "equity" interests in a ski resort. The insurer would be liable to the insured because the policy recited that the insured held the property in a joint tenancy, when it was a tenancy in common, unless the insurer could reform the conveyance, in Elliott v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 123 Ill.App.3d 226, 78 Ill.Dec. 521, 462 N.E.2d 640 (1984).

[3] For example, in Armstrong v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 138 Ga.App. 727, 227 S.E.2d 409 (1976), the policy stated that the insured held the full fee simple title to the property, but the insured owned only an undivided one-half interest. The court held that the insurer would be entitled to have the policy reformed to correctly recite the estate held by the insured only if the insurer was able to prove that the insured had contracted to buy only the one-half interest. The court made the same ruling in Foehrenbach v. German-American Title & Trust Co., 217 Pa. 331, 66 A. 561 (1907).

[4] See Armstrong v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. 138 Ga.App. 727, 227 S.E.2d 409 (1976).

[5] Elliott v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 123 Ill.App.3d 226, 462 N.E.2d 640 (1984).

[6] In Hall v. San Jose Abstract & Title Ins. Co., 172 Cal.App.2d 421, 342 P.2d 362 (Cal.App. 1 Dist. 1959), the insured obtained a judgment against the insurer because the policy stated that she and her late husband owned the property as joint tenants, but they were later found to have been tenants in common, the effect of which was that the insured did not take the entire estate as survivor on the husband's death. The court founded the decision on the couple's intent to create a joint tenancy.

owner to recharacterize their respective interests in the property.[7] This is because the policy is not an assurance as between the named insureds, or the insureds and the non-insured co-owners of the property, as to what their respective rights in the property may be:

> No matter what the respective rights are among the insureds, none of the insureds obtained insurance against title claims by their co-owners. Rather, they, as do all title insurance purchasers, sought to insure that the property they bought had free and clear title.[8]

Thus, when a developer represented that an enclosed courtyard was a limited common element, but the condominium plat did not make it so, the title insurer was not obligated to pay for a lawsuit brought by the other unit owners claiming that the courtyard was a common element.[9] Similarly, in Burke v. Ramblewood Manor Homes Ass'n,[10] the court found that the title insurance policy for a condominium unit did not assure title to a carport that had originally been assigned to the unit, but which had been reassigned to another unit before the insured bought. A document evidencing the reassignment had been recorded, but was not excepted in the policy. However, neither did the policy insure Mr. Burke that he owned the carport space. His claim was dependent entirely on his interpretation of the condominium declaration. The court found that the policy excepted the terms of the declaration, and thus there was no coverage for any such dispute:

> This matter arose out of plaintiffs' (as co-owners) claim of ownership of a common element contrary to any other co-owner's right to that same common element. As the policy at issue specifically states that it will not insure against loss or damage arising by reason of a co-owner's rights in common elements, Transnation owes no coverage to plaintiffs on their complaint.[11]

An estate or interest held by a party other than the insured, such as a mineral estate or life estate, is typically recited either to the land described in Schedule A or as an exception in Schedule B. When the policy discloses an outstanding estate or interest in the land, there is no compensable loss. Accordingly, an exception for "[r]eservations contained in patents from the United States of America" fully excepted mineral rights reserved in a patent and later purchased from the U.S. by a private party.[12] Similarly, an exception for a mineral reservation in a deed removed coverage as to the mineral claim by the current holder of the mineral interest.[13] Also, when mineral interests of record were properly noted on the policy, the insurer was not responsible for giving notice of possible subsidence caused by mining activity.[14] Further, when title was insured subject to a reservation for highway purposes over a portion of the property described, the policy was found not to have insured any interest in the highway land. Thus, the insured suffered no loss by a declaration that the fee simple of the highway parcel was not owned by the insured.[15] The policy did not protect against a flowage easement, even though it was not excepted on Schedule B, when the purchase price was found to have reflected the value of the property subject to the easement, the Schedule A legal description referred to a survey which depicted the easement, and thus the land described in Schedule A implicitly incorporated the easement by reference.[16]

Certain interests related to land are personal in nature and do not create estates in land. A personal right to use the land or to take from it, such as a profit à prendre, does not affect title, and there is no policy coverage against such a right. For example, a recorded timber deed was found to constitute an interest in the land, and thus cause a loss, but the dissent would have found the right to cut timber as not being an estate in the land.[17]

The owner's policy assurance that title is vested as shown is a protection against pre-existing third party claims of ownership as to the property. It is not, however, an assurance that the conveyance to the insured is recorded or properly posted in the public records so as to give constructive notice of the insured's interest.[18] Thus, if the deed is a valid conveyance between buyer and seller, but is not recorded, the policy coverage is not triggered unless a third party asserts a pre-existing claim of title to the land. In Alford v. Chicago Title Ins. Co.,[19] the insured's deed was delivered to the title insurer for recording but not recorded. The insureds did not discover this fact for ten years. The insureds argued that they had not been properly vested in title, invoking the "title vesting" insuring provision. The court disagreed, because as between the seller and buyer the conveyance was valid, and no third party contested the insured's title.[20]

[18] The ALTA Homeowner's Policy contains a specific assurance (Covered Risk 27) against loss if the deed "is invalid because it was not properly signed, sealed, acknowledged, delivered or recorded." This coverage should not be read to be an affirmative assurance that a vesting deed is recorded, but rather a protection against a claim that the lack of recording renders the deed invalid as to third parties. Thus, the result in Alford would have been the same if the claim had been made under a Homeowner's Policy, which policy is further discussed at §9.14.2.

The policy insures the title to the land described on Schedule A or C of the policy.[21] The policy does not protect the insured against an attack on the title to land lying beyond the boundaries of the parcel described in the policy, or any rights the insured may have in adjacent lands.[22] When possession and recording of a purchase-money deed of trust. Therefore, the judgments were not liens which impaired the insureds' title. Further, before the trial on the coverage case, the judgment liens lapsed as a matter of law.

[21] For example, in Lawyers Title Guaranty Fund v. Milgo Electronics, 318 So.2d 416 (Fla.App. 1975), cert.den. 336 So.2d 602 (Fla. 1976), the court found no policy coverage for a claim about the title to a strip of land owned by the insured and adjacent to the insured parcel, but not included in the Schedule A description. In Schiller v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 444 P.3d 459 (Table), 2019 WL 3202204 (Nev.) (unpublished), the insured, Schiller, was told that his property was on the shore of Lake Tahoe. He later discovered that there was a buffer strip between his platted lots and the shore of the lake, which is man-made. The court held that there was no policy assurance that the parcels touched the lake shore, and that by describing the insured Land by reference to the subdivision plat the policy incorporated by reference the boundaries of those lots as shown on the plat.

[22] See §12.3.6 for a discussion about the lack of coverage for any gap or gore between insured parcels. See §8.9 regarding adjacent streets and so-called abutter's rights. In Hawkins v. Weichert Title Agency, 2011 WL 4466883 (N.J.Super.A.D.) (unpublished), a survey was presented at closing and that description was used in the policy. Later, a neighbor claimed some accreted land outside the boundaries of the insured parcel, and the insured sued the insurer claiming the policy insured him as owning that parcel. The court disagreed, saying that the neighbor "sought coverage to quiet title to property that falls outside the parcel of land insured in the title policy. The metes and bounds description in the title policy and the property survey clearly show that the adjoining property line between the Hawkins and their neighbors stops at a maple stump at the 'original high-water mark' of the lake." Likewise, in Geiger v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2011 WL 3802724 (Wis.App.) (unpublished), the court ruled that the policy did not include additional land shown on a survey obtained by the insured after closing but not included in the policy description. Therefore, the insurer was not obligated to prosecute the insured's lawsuit to claim the additional land or to indemnify him when he "lost" the land. When neither the insured mortgage nor the policy included a second parcel, the insured properly did not seek compensation from the insurer for the lack of that parcel. First Nat'l Bank of Northbrook, N.A. v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 279 Ill.App.3d 188, 664 N.E.2d 310, 215 Ill.Dec. 913 (Ill.App. 1 Dist. 1996), rev.den. October 2, 1996 (Table, no. 81240). In 631 North Broad Street, LP v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 2018 WL 4051798 (E.D.Pa. 2018) (unpublished), aff'd 2019 WL 3383878, 778 Fed.Appx. 164 (3rd Cir. (Pa.) 2019) (unpublished), the insurer was not required to defend its insured in a lawsuit about ownership of a portion of a wall located adjacent to the insured parcel, because the policy did not insure the title to the wall or the land on which it rested. The court buttressed its ruling with the survey exception. Further, the insurer was not "estopped" from denying coverage by having agreed to defend the neighboring owner, which was also an insured, because the wall was located on that insured's parcel. In Pandora Distribution, LLC v. Ottawa OH, LLC, ___ F.Supp.3d ___, 2019 WL 2924995 (N.D. Ohio 2019) (not yet released for publication), reconsid.den. 2019 WL 5729932, the court held that the insured received title to an aging overhead conveyor bridge spanning railroad tracks adjoining the warehouse that it bought, which allegedly reduced the value of the property. The court held that the policy did not insure the title to the conveyor bridge, and therefore the insurer was the policy insures title to a certain parcel, and the insured later discovers that the parcel insured is not the parcel that the insured expected to receive by deed or mortgage, the policy does not indemnify the insured for its failure to receive the expected parcel.[23] Similarly, an insurer is not liable for any defect in or encumbrance on the title to land conveyed to the insured as an additional parcel, but that was not included in the title insurance policy.[24] As one court explained:

> The title insurance policy expressly covered only the 98 and 28 acre parcels. The policy does not refer to the 14 acre tract. Therefore, Chicago Title could not have breached a contract to handle appellant's claim against Flood [the adverse owner] when there was no coverage for the 14 acres. In light of the plain language of the policy, there is no issue of material fact concerning existence of a contract covering the 14 acres.[25]

The policy does not insure the title to or indemnify against the "loss" of land included in the purchase contract but that was not included in the policy or deed.[26] An insured has no policy claim based on a parcel that was neither conveyed to the insured nor included in the title insurance policy.[27] A title insurer does not contract to procure title on behalf of the insured by committing to not required to pay a loss to its insured based on its claimed negative value.

Id. at 11. A nearly identical claimed duty to inform the insured was also rejected in Hoy and in *Kondaur Capital Corp. v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. insure the title that is conveyed to the insured.[28] The insurer has no duty to defend or indemnify the insured as to a parcel claimed or owned by the insured that was not insured in the policy, including any land claimed or purchased after the policy date.[29]

Sometimes, the facts show that a policy includes a parcel by mutual mistake, particularly when the insured did not bargain for its purchase and/or did not receive it as part of the conveyance, and thus the policy must be reformed to excise the parcel. See §8.4 for a complete discussion of that issue.

8.3 Variance Between Land Insured And Land Possessed Or Claimed

The policy insures the title to whatever land was conveyed to the insured. The insurer does not choose the legal description used in the deed or the policy. Most commonly, the deed to the insured contains the historical legal description. Very often, the same description has been used in many prior conveyances.

The insured's subjective expectation or understanding that he or she was buying land not included in the insured deed does not add to the land the policy assures the insured as owning.[30] The insured was to have provided the access to the property, the insurer owed the diminution caused by the lack of access.

[28] See Union Street Tower LLC v. First American Title Ins. Co., 42 Misc.3d 1229(A), 2014 WL 763233 (N.Y. Kings Cty. 2014) (unpublished) (insurer that insured building parcel but not air rights on parcel next door, because those rights were not conveyed, was not liable under policy or in tort for alleged failure to procure rights for insured).

[29] In Casero v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2018 WL 830225 (D.Md.) (unpublished), the insureds recorded a deed to themselves, five years after the policy, altering their boundary to include more land. The court found that the insurer had no duty to defend the lawsuit brought by the neighbor to contest title to the land claimed in the post-policy deed.

[30] In Wei v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 2018 WL 1870400 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), the court held that the policy did not insure ownership of neighboring land that was on the insured's side of a fence built inside the neighbor's boundary. The Wei court relied on Manneck v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 28 Cal.App.4th 1294, 33 Cal.Rptr. 771 (Cal.App. 2 Dist. 1994), in which the insureds discovered that they did not own what they thought was their back yard and the structures built on it. The Manneck court pointed out that no one ever attacked the title to the land the insureds did own. Rather, their entire claim was based on the insureds' desire "to obtain a greater amount of land than they purchased..., albeit to satisfy their reasonable expectations at the time of purchase." In Kreider v. Correia, 2018 WL 359285 (Pa.Super.) (unpublished), a house was advertised for sale as including a garage, but that garage was built on a separate parcel that was not owned by the seller or included in the deed. The court held that the policy did not insure the title to the garage, and a reference in the policy to the garage's tax parcel did not create that coverage. The subject of encroaching structures is fully discussed at §12.3.10.2, particularly in relation to the survey exception. In Schiller v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 444 P.3d 459 (Table), 2019 WL 3202204 (Nev.) (unpublished), the insured, Schiller, was told that his property was on the shore of Lake Tahoe. He later discovered that there was a buffer strip between his platted lots and the shore of the lake, which is man-made. The court held that there was no policy assurance that the parcels touched the lake shore. The court said that the policy did not assure the correctness of representations made by others to the insured about the property, saying: "Finally, a title insurance policy does not insure against losses due to a seller's misrepresentations or a buyer's failed expectations. See Barlow Burke, Title Insurance Defined, L. Title Ins. § 2.01 (3d ed.) ('For instance, a covenant in an insured's deed may be covered, but representations by a vendor to an insured during the course of a purchase about the covenant are not.'). It was Schiller's duty to confirm that the advertised land was waterfront. See Land Baron Inv., Inc. v. Bonnie Springs Family LP, 131 Nev. 686, 693-97, 356 P.3d 511, 517-19 (2015) (holding that a commercial buyer of real property assumed the risk of mistake as to whether the purchased land was accessible and included water rights)."

policy does not insure title that the seller did not own, or that both buyer and seller (or lender and borrower) did not both agree was to be conveyed (or mortgaged). A title insurance policy could not insure the ownership of a parcel that was not conveyed to the insured and that he or she does not own.

The policy does not insure the title to a parcel that is not described in Schedule A of the policy, based on a reference in the policy to an additional parcel or its tax parcel number or street address.[31] The insurer is not required to obtain title to a parcel that was not included in the deed or mortgage due to an error by the insured or a mutual mistake.[32] Conversely, the insurer is not obligated to "defend" an insured owner against the lender's action to reform the mortgage to include a parcel owned by the insured but on which no mortgage was granted.[33] If the legal description could be read to include more or less land, the policy insures the title to only the land validly conveyed to the insured.[34] However, if a parcel was conveyed to the insured but omitted from the policy by [31] In Deutsche Bank Nat'l Trust Co. v. Fadili, 2011 WL 4703707 (D.N.H.) (unpublished), the policy correctly recited the legal description for the vacant parcel to which the insured mortgage attached, but Schedule A recited the street address assigned to the adjoining parcel with a home on it that the insured lender expected to mortgage. The court held that the recitation of the address did not cause the policy to assure that the mortgage was also a lien on the house. It relied in part on Exclusion 3(a). In Love v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2016 WL 4045400 (Tex.App.-Dallas) (unpublished), the court held that the policy did not implicitly represent or insure that the land described in the policy was associated with a certain postal address, especially given the fact that the policy did not recite any street address. The insured had inserted the address that he claimed to "own," which was not the insured parcel, on a deed that he gave after the policy date. In Kreider v. Correia, 2018 WL 359285 (Pa.Super.) (unpublished), the policy did not insure the title to a second parcel based solely on a reference in the policy to the second tax parcel. However, in Michael v. Stock, 162 A.3d 465, 2017 PA Super 99 (Pa.Super. 2017), both the deed to the insured and the policy described the land as only one of two parcels owned by the seller. The appeals court held that a reference in the policy to a tax parcel number that might have included both parcels might have been enough to give the insured a "reasonable expectation" that the policy insured the title to both parcels, creating a question of fact. It reversed the trial court's grant of summary judgment to the insurer and remanded the case for further proceedings.

[32] In Krajewski v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 2016 WL 2754435 (Pa.Super.) (unpublished), the insured owners claimed title to a second parcel because of an ancient covenant by a former owner stating that the two parcels would always be conveyed together. The court held that the insurer was not required to obtain title to the second parcel, which was not conveyed to the insureds and to which they had no valid claim.

[33] In Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. McClain, 2016 WL 1436613 (Penn.Super. 2016) (unpublished), reargument denied June 16, 2016, 145 A.3d 777 (Table), the court held that a title insurer was not required to pay the cost of "defending" owner insureds in a lawsuit brought by their lender to reform the mortgage to add a second parcel that the lender mistakenly failed to include in its mortgage. The court said: "When Appellants purchased the Property, Wells Fargo lent Appellants sufficient funds to purchase both lots in exchange for a mortgage on both lots. Due to clerical error, the mortgage was only recorded on one lot. The fact that the trial court in the quiet title action ordered that the mortgage be placed on both lots does not mean that Appellants 'lost' a property interest in the quiet title action. Appellants never had the right to own Lot B without a mortgage on it."

[34] In Walker Rogge, Inc. v. Chelsea Title & Guar. Co., 222 N.J.Super. 363, 536 A .2d 1309 (A.D. 1988), rev'd in part, aff'd in part, 116 N.J. 517, 562 A.2d 208 (1989); appeal after remand, 603 A.2d 557 (N.J. Super. 1992), the insured claimed that it thought it was receiving more acres than it did. The court determined that the insured received exactly the land owned by the seller and that was conveyed to the insured, and that the policy did not make any representation to the contrary. Therefore, there was no defect in title and no loss payable by the insurer. In Fischer Sand and Aggregate, LLP v. Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 2017 WL 1316130 (Minn.App.) (unpublished), the court held that the title insurer mutual mistake of the insurer and insured, the policy may be reformed to add the parcel.[35] Also, if the seller later disputes the size or configuration of the parcel conveyed to the insured, the seller's claim may invoke policy coverage.[36]

A loan policy does not insure that the mortgage encumbers land that is not described in the mortgage.[37] When a borrower owns two or more parcels, it is often less than clear which parcel or parcels the lender intended to take as collateral for its loan.[38] The insured lender does not obtain coverage for an additional parcel not included in the mortgage based on a survey coverage.[39]

had no duty to pay for a lawsuit over ownership of a parcel that was not included in Schedule A, because the policy contained a survey exception and an exception for the lack of clarity in the insured parcel's legal description. As in Walker Rogge, the dispute arose mainly because two adjoining parcels were described based on acreage that was not accurate. The court rejected the insured's argument that she had a "reasonable expectation" that the policy would insure her title to the disputed area. However, in Lagomarsino v. San Jose Abstract & Title Ins. Co., 178 Cal.App.2d 455, 3 Cal.Rptr. 80 (1960), the policy description included both physical monuments and survey calls. The survey calls were inaccurate. The court held that the policy insured the land bounded by the survey calls, not the monuments, and the insurer was liable for the value of the land that was the difference between the two.

[35] See §§8.4, 11.2.3 and 11.4.2 concerning reformation of a policy to remove land that was conveyed to the insured by mutual mistake. In Denny's Restaurants, Inc. v. Security Union Title Ins. Co., 859 P.2d 619 (Wash.App. 1993), the insured's unrecorded lease included a 60 foot strip of land for parking and signage. The recorded memorandum of lease did not include the area, and neither did the Schedule A policy description. However, the insurer deleted the survey exceptions based on an inspection that referred to the area. The insured later lost title to that area. The appeals court held that company practices, the insured's expectations in paying extra premium for extended coverage and other the facts about the inspection and survey all supported reformation of the policy to include the strip of land. Perhaps the key finding was that the insured had an insurable interest in the land and possessed it, which is typically not the case when an insured seeks to add a parcel to Schedule A.

[36] In Loflin v. BMP Development, LP, 427 S.C. 580, 832 S.E.2d 294 (S.C.App. 2019), the insureds contracted to buy a vacant lot in a new subdivision before the plat was final. The size of the lot was specified in their contract. The plat was recorded and the policy issued, with the recorded plat depicting the lot with the expected size and configuration. Four years later, however, the developer informed the insureds that, in his opinion, they owned a smaller lot as depicted on an unrecorded amended plat. The court held that the policy might protect the insureds against the developer's claim that the insureds own the lot as revised, because Covered Risk 3 of the Residential policy protects against fraud.

[37] New South Fed. Sav. Bank v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 940 So.2d 739 (La.App. 3 Cir. 2006) (no coverage was invoked due to the fact that the insured mortgage encumbered vacant parcel next to house but did not include house parcel). In U.S. Bank, N.A. v. HLC Escrow, Inc., 919 F.3d 17 (1st Cir. (Me.) 2019), the policy insured a mortgage that encumbered the vacant parcel next to a house but did not include the house parcel. The insurer denied the claim because the policy insured the title to the same parcel that had been mortgaged. The court dismissed the policy claims based on the statute of limitations, without ruling on the merits of the insured's claim that the policy contained only a unilateral and not a mutual mistake. The sole claim that survived dismissal was based on Maine's Unfair Claims Settlement Practices Act.

[38] See West RADC Venture 2010-2, LLC v. Indymac Venture, LLC, 2017 WL 6273838 (Cal.App. 4 Dist.) (unpublished), in which a lender apparently took a deed of trust on the wrong lot, by mistake. However, that lien was in first position. The court would not allow the lender to establish its "priority" over another deed of trust on that lot unless it could first prove that its security instrument was recorded against the correct parcel. West RADC did not involve a question of title insurance policy coverage.

[39] In New South Fed. Sav. Bank v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 940 So.2d 739 (La.App. 3 Cir. 2006), the

The policy also does not protect the insured if the insured takes possession of a parcel that is different from the land conveyed to the insured. The insured's mistaken possession of the wrong parcel, or a mistake that causes the insured to take title to a parcel or condominium unit other than the one that the insured expected to purchase, does not create a defect in the title to the insured land.[40]

In some cases, the insured possesses some but not all of the land conveyed to the insured and described in the policy. The insured often discovers such an issue when the insured obtains a survey after the policy is issued.[41] The policy does not insure that the possessed land is the same as the insured parcel. For example, in Bothin v. California Title Ins. & Trust Co.,[42] there was no overlap in the chain of title, but the buildings owned by the insured and his neighbor were all about 14 feet off the record title line. The neighbors sued each other and obtained judgments of adverse possession that had the effect of moving the title lines to the lines of possession. The insured then sued the insurer for his claimed loss. The court held that there was no loss payable for the loss of land adversely possessed by the neighbor, and no coverage for the land the insured obtained by his own adverse possession. The court found that the property that the insured wound up with was the same land he intended to purchase.[43] The court then held that the neighbor's adverse possession did not create a loss, because it depended on possession only, and was not evidenced in the chain of title:

insured lender took a mortgage on a vacant parcel rather than the borrower's residence. The policy recited the residence address but the legal description of the vacant parcel. The lender urged that the policy should be reformed to insure the title to the residence parcel, because the street address rendered the policy ambiguous. The court rejected the argument, finding that the policy insured the correct parcel. It said that "[a]ny error initially occurred at the time of the mortgage and prior to the contract of insurance." The insured also argued that it got additional coverage through the survey coverage in its short form policy (similar to Covered Risk 2(c) in the 2006 ALTA Loan policy). The court found that the insured did not bootstrap into coverage through the survey Covered Risk because, while the description error would have been discovered through a survey, that error did not affect the title to the land insured.

[40] In Kessee v. First American Title Co., 2015 WL 5842957 (Cal.App. 4 Dist.) (unpublished), the court held that policy coverage was not invoked by the fact that the insured was conveyed the lot next door to the one that she allegedly intended to buy. The court noted that the purchase contract, deed, subdivision plat, policy and other documents were remarkably consistent, and that essentially the only evidence that the insured was "mistakenly" conveyed the "wrong" lot was the insured's own oral testimony to that effect. Kealy v. JP Morgan Chase Bank, N.A., 2018 WL 3045593 (Cal.App. 4 Dist.) (unpublished), involved a condominium in which the street addresses went in one direction and the unit numbering went in the opposite direction. The insured owner "bounced back and forth" in his claims about which unit he owned, and also took possession of both units at different times. The court reformed his deed and deed of trust based on evidence of intent gleaned from the testimony of others. The court never reached the issue of policy coverage for the dispute.

[41] A related issue is the effect of a determination that the area or distances recited in a recorded description do not match those found in the field or by lines of occupation. See §8.6 for a discussion of the effect of erroneous dimensions in the Schedule A legal description, and §§12.3.7 and 12.3.8 concerning errors in area and distance in relation to the survey exception.

> It is quite clear from the conditions of that instrument that what was insured by the respondent was that the record title to the lot was in appellant. … The only title which Partridge had was a title to a portion of the lot acquired by adverse possession, but this the respondent not only did not insure, but expressly declared it did not, in that provision of Schedule B wherein it is stated that, among other defects of or objections to the title not insured against, was the "tenure of the present occupants."
> … Necessarily the record title is all that a title insurance company can safely or judiciously insure. While the title to real property may be disclosed by the record to be in one person, it may, in fact, be in another through adverse possession, or in one in occupation of the property under an unrecorded conveyance. It is the possibility of the existence of these conditions as to the title which an insurance company provides against by insuring the record title, and none other. In the case at bar the policy only insured the record title, and as that is conceded to have been in appellant, and the title of Partridge to the portion of the lot in question resting solely upon adverse possession, against which respondent did not insure, there was no breach of the policy of insurance.[44]

The court's rulings as to adverse possession of the insured property hinge on the parties in possession exception. See §12.2.4 regarding adverse possession and the possession exception. Also, cases holding that the policy insures title to a building owned by the insured but encroaching onto the neighboring property are discussed in §8.2.

8.4 Land Erroneously Included In Policy

When land has been included in the policy description by error or accident, and the insured is found not to own the land, the existence of coverage or a loss depends on the insured's and insurer's intent. If the land was described in the policy due to an error, the court may determine that there is no coverage and that the insured cannot suffer a loss due to the lack of title to the parcel.[45] The court may also reform the policy on the grounds of mutual mistake,[46] or in some circumstances determine that there is no coverage for the parcel due to a survey exception in the policy.[47]

[45] In Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. Wooden, ___ F.Supp.3d ___, 2019 WL 175134 (N.D.Ala. 2019) (permanent citation not yet available), a bank foreclosed on land that had been unplatted when it took its mortgage. After the mortgage was granted, however, the land had been subdivided. One lot had been sold and the buyers built a house on it. The bank conveyed the land to the insureds after foreclosure, using the metes and bounds description from its mortgage. The court stated that it would need to hear trial testimony to decide if the insureds "agreed to" receive title to the house lot. The title insurer sought, in the same lawsuit, to reform the policy to exclude the house lot, and argued that the insureds could not suffer a loss due to their lack of good title to that parcel.

[46] In Branch Banking & Trust Co. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 714 S.E.2d 514 (N.C.App. 2011), the policy included as part of a larger unplatted parcel a subparcel on which existed a prior deed of trust that was not excepted in the policy. Chicago Title sought to reform the policy to remove the parcel. The court found insufficient allegations or evidence that the insured had not intended to include the parcel in its deed of trust, and dismissed the reformation claim. The court said

Reformation is typically the most appropriate remedy when the policy insures ownership of a parcel conveyed by accident or mutual mistake.[48] The insurer must establish that the mistake was mutual and not unilateral. If the insured intended to purchase the parcel included in the policy, the insurer must show that the seller did not own the parcel or did not intend to sell it, or that the purchaser price did not include consideration for the additional parcel.[49] When the insurer is asked to defend an insured purchaser in an action by the seller to reform the deed, the duty to defend will depend on what the seller alleges and what the insured purchaser alleges in response as to whether or not there was a mutual mistake.[50]

The subject of reformation of the policy to exclude a parcel conveyed to the insured by mutual mistake is further discussed at §11.2.3, which discusses reformation and Exclusion 3(a), and at §11.4.2, which discusses reformation and the "no loss" exclusion.

8.5 Deficiencies In Legal Descriptions

The policy insures the title to whatever land was conveyed to the insured. The insurer does not choose the legal description used in the deed or the policy. Most commonly, the deed to the

that the evidence suggested a unilateral mistake by the insurer in overlooking the deed of trust. In Cantrell v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 787 F.2d 1258 (8th Cir. 1986), the policy description included two acres of land that were not owned by the insured and which were part of a neighboring national forest. The court reformed the policy and held that the insurer was not liable for the "loss" of Forest Service land. The appeals court found that the only testimony suggesting that the policy was intended to include the land was from the insured's surveyor. The evidence showed that the seller did not intend to sell the land, the buyer did not intend to buy it, and the insurer had not intended to insure the parcel. In Demetrio v. Stewart Title Ins. Co., 124 A.D.3d 824, 3 N.Y.S.3d 75 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept. 2015), app.den. 25 N.Y.3d 906 (May 12, 2015), the court reformed a policy that described the insured property as one lot, but also incorporated by reference a metes and bounds description that encompassed seven lots, so that it insured the title to only the one lot that the insured purchased and for which it paid.

[47] See §12.3.6 regarding the survey exception.

[48] In Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. Golf Links Development Corp., 87 F.Supp.2d 505 (W.D.N.C. 1999), a legal description prepared by the seller accidentally included a platted lot previously conveyed by the seller. The lot was included in the commitment, and the approved attorney admitted that he "wasn't careful enough" in reviewing the legal description. The insured claimed to have intended to purchase, the lot and sued the insurer for its value. The insurer was granted summary judgment reforming the policy. The insured argued that the insurer's mistake precluded the use of the equitable remedy of reformation. However, the court noted that the purchase contract gave the insured's attorney a due diligence period in which to confirm the legal description, and he did not correct it in that time. The court therefore ruled: "[N]egligence on the part of one party [which induces the mistake] does not preclude a finding of mutual mistake. In other words, the fact that the mistake arises because the party who is seeking reformation supplied the incorrect information does not make the mistake unilateral. … [The insured's] attorney readily admitted he mistakenly allowed the description to remain in the contract and the deed."

In Kentucky Title Co. v. Hail, 219 Ky. 256, 292 S.W. 817 (Ky.App. 1927), the court found the insurer liable for the "loss" of land which the seller never owned and that the purchaser insured probably did not think he was purchasing. The court noted, however, that the insurer's title exam disclosed that the seller did not own the parcel, suggesting a unilateral mistake by the insurer.

insured contains the historical legal description. Very often, the same description has been used in many prior conveyances. The insurer is not at liberty to modify the legal description of the parcel to be insured. The recitation of the legal description in Schedule A of the policy is not itself an assurance of any kind, but rather is merely the identification of the parcel whose title is insured.

On very rare occasion, the legal description in the insured's deed is so vague or defective that a surveyor is unable to locate the parcel on the ground.[51] The insurer may elect to take some step to clarify the boundaries of the land insured and conveyed, although such action is very rare and the policy does not impose on the insurer a positive duty to reform the insured parcel's legal description. In some cases, the insurer will elect to obtain a survey that provides a more accurate description of the land, such as by adding a tie to a government section corner or other reliable tie line or monument, or by providing more accurate calls and distances.[52]

The description of the insured land is not ambiguous due to the insured's assertion that there is a difference between the land the insured intended to receive and the land actually conveyed to him or her. In such cases, the insured often asserts that the claimed ambiguity in the policy should be construed in favor of the insured so as to find that the policy insures title to land not conveyed to the insured. Such claims are discussed at §§8.3, 8.4 and §11.2.3.

On occasion, the insured or another party asserts that a particular legal description is vague, ambiguous or uncertain. In extreme cases, the party asserts that title is rendered unmarketable by the alleged vagueness or ambiguity in the legal description.[53] In almost all such cases, the seemingly [51] In Lennen v. Marriott Ownership Resorts, Inc., ___ F.Supp.3d ___, 2019 WL 1440092 (M.D.Fla. 2019) (permanent citation not yet available), appeal filed August 21, 2019, the insureds purchased interests in time share condominiums that were part of a complicated interval ownership regime. The insureds sued both the seller and their title insurer, First American. They asserted that their deeds were void because they lacked adequate legal descriptions. The court let that claim stand, noting that Florida law says that, "[t]o effect a valid conveyance of real property, a deed or other instrument must describe the property such that it is evident that a particular parcel, and not a different or unspecified one, is to be conveyed." Mendelson v. Great W. Bank, F.S.B., 712 So. 2d 1194, 1196 (Fla. 2d DCA 1998). Also, "a description is sufficient if, by relying on the description read in light of all facts and circumstances referred to in the instrument, a surveyor could locate the land." The court said it was "undisputed that the property descriptions contained within the Consumer Deeds, alone, are inadequate." The defendants argued that the descriptions were valid once parol evidence was taken into consideration. The deed referred to the MVC Trust Memorandum, which in turn said that the legal descriptions for the Trust property were recited in other recorded instruments. They said that, by reviewing all of those documents, "a surveyor would be able to locate all of the Trust Property that an MVC Trust Owner has a nonspecific, undivided interest in." However, the court was considering a motion to dismiss, and was not entitled to consider parol evidence, so it refused to dismiss the claim.

[52] In Miller v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 112 F.Supp. 221 (E.D.Va. 1953), the policy described the land by reference to a recorded "plat." In fact, the "plat" was a drawing containing no description, calls or distances, survey monuments or tie-ins to government monuments. The insured obtained a survey to determine what property he had bought, and the court required the insurer to pay for the survey. In Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. Wetherington, 127 N.C.App. 457, 490 S.E.2d 593 (N.C.App. 1997), rev.den. 347 N.C. 574, 498 S.E.2d 380 (1998), the insurer purchased the property from the insured for policy limits. The court said that the policy "correctly described a .38-acre tract; however, because the description of the beginning point was incorrect, the tract could not be precisely located on the ground. Despite the problem associated with locating the beginning point, a subsequent survey was conducted in 1988 where the .38-acre residence tract was located within a 16-acre tract which was owned by defendant." After purchasing the land from the insured, the insurer brought suit to quiet title based on adverse possession.

warring elements within the legal description can and must be reconciled, producing an adequate description of a defined parcel locatable on the ground. The insurer and others should learn and employ the legal principles governing legal descriptions in order to establish that title as insured is marketable and that the described parcel may be found on the ground by a competent surveyor.

A metes and bounds or perimeter legal description contains a number of elements. In some cases, a description does not mathematically close, or one call may be difficult to locate. In conducting field work, "the surveyor is obligated to consider any and all evidence."[54] When one element of the legal description actually or apparently conflicts with another element, those elements are prioritized based on an established hierarchy known as the order of control. The accepted order of control is as stated in Clark on Surveying and Boundaries,[55] as follows:

1. Lines actually run in the field;
2. Natural monuments;
3. Artificial monuments;
4. Adjoiners;
5. Courses;
6. Distances;
7. Area or quantity.[56]

Natural monuments are physical objects, such as bodies of water or trees.[57] Artificial reference to the land of an adjoiner who owned many years ago was modernized by means of a Torrens action, but the court found the insurer liable not just for the cost of the curative action but for policy limits, based on supposed expert testimony about the devaluing effect of an "ambiguity" in a legal description. In Hedgecock v. Stewart Title Guaranty Co., 676 P.2d 1208 (Colo.App. 1983), the legal description in the policy was the same as had been used in the chain of title for the prior 65 years. However, a surveyor hired after the policy date was unable to determine the point of beginning. The insurer refused to insure the new survey description until quit claim deeds were exchanged with neighbors. The court concluded that the insured property description was so defective that it rendered the title unmarketable. See the discussion of the marketability coverage at §9.8.3.

"Lines actually run in the field" means lines between section corners set by government surveyors working for the General Land Office (later the Department of the Interior, Bureau of Land Management). Clark also states the priority rule this way: "A recent Maine decision clarified the approach. The court stated, that when using these calls, the boundaries in question were to be located in reference to the elements called for in the deed, in descending order commencing with monuments called for, courses, distances, and, finally, quantity. This opinion states that the surveyor should not select an element called for at will, but rather, he should first look for the evidence of the highest elements and then progress through the other called-for boundary." Walter G. Robillard, Clark on Surveying and Boundaries, Eighth Edition, The Michie Company, at §2.04, p. 28. The U.S. Supreme Court gave the same order of priorities in United States v. Redondo Development Co., 254 F. 656 (1918).

monuments are, in most cases, survey stakes, pins, caps and other markers. Such monuments must be referred to specifically in the conveyance, and must either be the original monument or a newer monument with an adequate chain of history: that is, the junior monument must be established by evidence as being in the same location as the original.[58]

Many parcels are described by use of calls to adjoiners. An adjoiner is the current or former owner of abutting land. A reference to an adjoiner typically fixes the end point of a boundary line at a point on the adjoiner's property boundary. For example, in Walker Rogge, Inc. v. Chelsea Title & Guarantee Co.,[59] the court accepted "lands now or formerly of James Grant" as good evidence of a boundary. Such adjoining land must be adequately described in the deed, contiguous, and locatable on the ground.[60]

A call to a monument controls over a recited distance, if the two are in conflict.[61]

The description formulated using the order of control yields only to the clearly-established intent of the parties to the conveyance that produces a contrary result:

> In the case of a description by boundaries, as in other cases, the intention of the grantor, as inferred from the terms of the description, is the controlling consideration, and any rules which the courts may have formulated as to the relative importance of various elements of the description are merely intended as aids in arriving at this intention.[62]

[60] Walter G. Robillard, Clark on Surveying and Boundaries, Eighth Edition, The Michie Company, at §15.08, p. 418. A call in a description to a road is a call to an adjoiner, although the courts did not recognize that principle in Patel v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 2013 Ark.App. 670, 2013 WL 6002069 (Ark.App.) (unpublished). In Mattson Ridge, LLC v. Clear Rock Title, LLP, 824 N.W.2d 622 (Minn. 2013), the court accepted the mistaken notion that a call to a former owner of an adjoining parcel was "ambiguous," when in fact the parties had not bothered to search the chains of title to locate the recorded deed to that person.

[61] See Bernhard v. Reischman, 33 Wash.App. 569, 658 P.2d 2 (1983) (distance call yielded to call to shore). In Lynburn Enterprises, Inc. v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 191 Ga.App. 710, 382 S.E. 2d 599 (1989), the insured property was described by courses and distances. The property was bounded by public streets or alleys on all sides. A survey was obtained and the survey exception removed. Later, the insured discovered that the insured property was smaller than as stated in the survey. The court construed the policy as insuring ownership to the monuments of the public streets and alleys, not the stated distances. In doing so, it used the general survey principle that monuments prevail over distances.

to one form of description as compared with another are not absolute but are mere aids to be used in the construction of the deed to discover the real intent of the parties, such intent being the thing which governs where there is latent ambiguity.[63]

A parcel may also be legally described as being a certain number of acres, such as "the west ten acres of" a larger tract, such as a government quarter section. In such cases, there are well-developed surveying and legal principles that determine the boundary of the described parcel. Also, in some cases, a parcel legally described as being a certain number of acres contains more or less than that area as a matter of law and based on the actual acreage of the parent tract versus the acreage assumed at the time the description was prepared. Nonetheless, the legal description remains valid and enforceable, and the parcel can be located on the ground by an accurate survey. A "shortage" in area does not invoke a policy coverage, as discussed in §8.6.

8.6 Distance Or Area Shortage In Legal Description

The policy insures the title to whatever land was conveyed to the insured. The insurer does not choose the legal description used in the deed or the policy. Most commonly, the deed to the insured contains the historical legal description. Very often, the same description has been used in many prior conveyances. The insurer is not at liberty to modify the legal description of the parcel to be insured. The recitation of the legal description in Schedule A of the policy is not itself an assurance of any kind, but rather is merely the identification of the parcel whose title is insured, as is discussed at §8.2.

For these reasons, no policy coverage is invoked if the distances stated in the metes and bounds legal description of the insured parcel are not the same as would be used on an accurate survey of the parcel.[64] The policy also does not protect against a claimed shortage in the number of acres recited in the legal description for the insured parcel. If the dimensions can be reconciled so that the parcel can be located on the ground by a surveyor, title is marketable and no loss exists.[65] Any incorrect dimensions in the legal description are reconciled with other elements of the legal description to establish a description that closes and that is consistent with adjoining parcels.[66]

Stewart Title Guar. Co.*, 2018 WL 1870400 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished) (ALTA Homeowner's policy did not insure that parcel had dimensions stated in legal description of policy and deed).

[65] In Lauritzen v. First American Title Ins. Co., 424 P.3d 1043, 2018 UT App 58 (Utah App. 2018), the court held that an overlap of one lot's boundary line in a recorded plat did not make title to other lots in the subdivision unmarketable.

[66] In the leading decision on the issue, Walker Rogge, Inc. v. Chelsea Title & Guarantee Co., 222 N.J.Super. 363, 536 A. 2d 1309 (A.D. 1988), rev'd in part, aff'd in part, 116 N.J. 517, 562 A.2d 208 (1989); appeal after remand, 603 A.2d 557 (N.J. Super. 1992), the legal description located one boundary line by both a call and distance and a reference to the land of an adjoiner. The distance in the call was incorrect. The court held that the policy insured the land to the adjoiner.

Exclusion 1(a) of the policy removes coverage for any issue about conditions or use limitations imposed on a subdivision map, as discussed in §11.1.3.[67]

The survey exception confirms the lack of policy coverage for any difference between a distance or area shown in the insured's legal description and the actual distance or area as measured on a survey, as is discussed in §§12.3.7 and 12.3.8.

8.7 Improvements And Personal Property

A title insurance policy insures only the title to the rights held by the insured that make up the title to the real property. Certain property rights are related to real estate but are not rights or estates in land. These include options (which in most states are contract rights only) and profits a prendre, which give the right to carry off game, fish, timber or other removable items. A title insurance policy does not insure a right that is transferred to the insured but that does not create an interest or estate in the land.[68]

The title insurance policy does not insure the title to personal property that may be located on the insured parcel.[69] The definition of "Land" includes "improvements affixed thereto which by law

The insured received all of the property owned by the grantor, although the parcel was not as many acres as the grantor had represented it to be. The doctrine of the order of control in legal descriptions is fully discussed at §8.5.

[67] In Lauritzen v. First American Title Ins. Co., 424 P.3d 1043, 2018 UT App 58 (Utah App. 2018), in which one boundary of a new subdivision plat created an overlap with an adjoining parcel, the court held that setback lines imposed on the lot by the municipality when the plat was amended did not affect title or create losses payable under the policy, and that the loss was limited to the diminution in value to the lot due to the "loss" of the overlap area. Nonetheless, in Burgess v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 65 Va. Cir. 311, 2004 WL 1713732 (Va.Cir.Ct. 2004) (unpublished), when the policy described the property as being two separate lots, but the municipality took the position that there was only one parcel, the trial court refused to dismiss an insured's claim of unmarketable title. It said that "the number of lots to be conveyed is a core issue relating to the legally recognized rights of the parties." The insurer correctly argued on demurrer that it used the existing legal descriptions, the issue of one parcel versus two does not make title unmarketable, and that the policy does not assure the existence of more than one parcel. The court was not willing to dismiss the case at this early stage, however.

[68] However, Parker v. Ward, 614 So.2d 975 (Ala. 1992), held that the policy protected against an unexcepted but recorded timber deed, despite the fact that an Alabama statute classifies such rights as being personalty. The dissent argued: "When timber has been conveyed to and is therefore owned by a person other than the owner of the land on which the timber stands, the timber is considered a chattel, not real property. [citation omitted] (emphasis in original). ... Based on the foregoing, I conclude that the title insurance policy Commonwealth issued to Parker did not insure the timber on the property, because the policy insured only 'land,' which was defined in the policy as 'real property'... ." Id. at 980.

[69] In Geo Finance, LLC v. University Square 2751, LLC, 2014 WL 7369940 (E.D.Mich. 2014) (unpublished), the insured bought an office building at a mortgage foreclosure sale. It later learned that there was a geothermal water supply system with pipes and other equipment hooked up to the building. The court held that, if the system was personal property, it was not insured under the policy. If it was a fixture, the policy still did not provide coverage, because the insured did not obtain title to the system through the sheriff's deed. In Mattlage v. Dividend Solar Finance, LLC, ___ F.Supp.3d ___, 2019 WL 6464006 (W.D.Tex. 2019) (not yet released for publication), the court held that a title insurer's listing of a financing statement as an exception in a title insurance commitment was its business decision, not a legal opinion or an assertion that the instrument was a cloud on title. The lender asserted that the financing statement was a lien only on the solar power equipment that it installed, which it considered to be personal property.

constitute real property."[70] If both real and personal property are conveyed to the insured, the policy insures the title only to the land and any fixtures.[71] Such things as telephone systems, washers and dryers, store display cases, and kitchen machinery and appliances do not usually constitute fixtures under state law. When the buyer and seller agree to treat an item as personal property conveyed by bill of sale, the policy did not insure the title to that item, and the policy need not contain any reference to or exception for the personal property.[72]

The policy indemnifies the insured against loss caused by a fixture filing against the property, unless that financing statement is excepted in the policy.[73] A Texas court found that the policy provided an assurance against mechanic's liens that attached only to fixtures that could be removed without injury to the permanent structure.[74]

The survey exception negates any assurance of title to buildings encroaching onto neighboring land.[75] The policy also does not insure title to non-building improvements that encroach, [71] In re Biloxi Casino Belle Inc., 368 F.3d 491 (5th Cir. (Miss.) 2004), which concerned title to a gambling boat. A title insurance policy was issued for the land along the Mississippi at Biloxi at which the craft was to be moored. While the boat was under construction in Gulfport, the project ground to a halt due to cost overruns, and a watercraft lien was filed by the builder. The lender asked the insurer to defend against and remove the lien. The court ruled that the policy did not insure title to the ship, or the lender's lien on it. It found that the ship was not within the definition of "land" under the policy. Further, the insured mortgage did not impose a lien on the boat, even if Schedule A was interpreted as including an accidental reference to personal property financing statements. The court also noted that Louisiana law limits the issuance of title insurance to interests in land; thus, the issuance of a UCC-type policy by a title insurer is not authorized, and is a separate line of insurance. In Pandora Distribution, LLC v. Ottawa OH, LLC, ___ F.Supp.3d ___, 2019 WL 2924995 (N.D. Ohio 2019) (not yet released for publication), reconsid.den. 2019 WL 5729932, the court held that the insured received title to an aging overhead conveyor bridge spanning railroad tracks adjoining the warehouse that it bought, which allegedly reduced the value of the property. The court held that the policy did not insure the title to the conveyor bridge, and therefore the insurer was not required to pay a loss to its insured based on its claimed negative value. The insured and other owners had hotly disputed the nature of the conveyor bridge, as either realty or personalty.

[72] Cunningham v. Security Title Ins. Co., 241 Cal.App.2d 626, 50 Cal.Rptr. 724 (Cal.App. 5 Dist. 1966). Cunningham was an action for escrow negligence, and the court found that the argument about policy coverage was beyond the scope of the complaint. To that extent, the court's holding as cited above may be considered dictum.

[73] In Saul v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 36 Misc.3d 1217(A), 2012 WL 3029672 (N.Y. City Civ.Ct.), 2012 N.Y. Slip Op. 51376(U) (unpublished), the court held that a UCC fixture filing is a lien on a fixture, and fixtures are real estate, so such a lien is covered by the policy: "Here, the title insurance policy at issue provided Saul coverage for loss occasioned by a defect, lien or encumbrance on the title or unmarketability of the title of real estate fee simple interest. Since, as set forth above, a fixture is part of real property, a fixture lien constitutes a lien or encumbrance on a real property's title. Defendant has failed to meet its burden of showing that the title policy expressly excludes fixture liens. Therefore, the title insurance issued by Fidelity encompasses the UCC–1 fixture filing at issue."

[74] GCI GP, LLC v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 290 S.W.3d 287 (Tex.App.-Houston (1 Dist.) 2009). The court rested its decision primarily on the fact that the policy coverage against mechanic's liens did not limit that coverage to liens on "land."

absent a special affirmative coverage. In Transamerica Title Ins. Co. v. Northwest Building Corp.,[76] the policy was found not to insure title to a parking area and driveway that were depicted on the insured's survey but that were located outside the perimeter of the land described on Schedule A.

However, the removal of the survey exception has been found to provide coverage to the insured against losses resulting from the encroachment of the insured's structure onto adjoining property. The policy does not insure the title to such a structure, or any right of the insured to the land on which it rests. Thus, coverage has been found to exist through the back door of the marketability coverage. An encroaching structure of sufficient size has been deemed an encumbrance on title. It is this encumbrance that, in turn, renders title unmarketable. Thus, in Rackouski v. Dobson,[77] a barn and fence encroached onto the neighboring land, and the neighbor sued to have them removed. The survey exception had been removed from the policy. The insurer refused to defend, because the policy did not insure the title to the encroaching structures. The appeals court found coverage through the marketability provision, saying:

> First, construing the definition of the word "land" from the "Definition of Terms" section of the policy to exclude coverage for the encroachment in this case would contradict the apparent intent of the parties demonstrated by the execution of the policy with the standard exclusion deleted. We construe such an ambiguity in favor of the appellant [insured]. [citations omitted] Second, the policy at issue is a "Policy of Title Insurance." The policy insures against defects or clouds in appellants' title to the land, not the land itself. Appellants' amended third-party complaint alleges that the encroachment of the barn onto plaintiff's land caused a defect in title to appellants' land which rendered appellants' title unmarketable. Thus, we believe that the definition of "land" in the policy does not preclude coverage.[78]

The same result was obtained in First American Title Ins. Co. v. Dahlmann,[79] which relied in part on Rackouski. In Dahlmann, the Wisconsin Supreme Court held that the combination of the removal of the survey exception from the policy and the marketability coverage protected the insured against the effect of the encroachment of an underground parking structure into an adjacent street. One factor distinguishing Dahlmann from Rackouski was that even an accurate survey would not have disclosed the encroachment, as evidenced by the fact that the survey delivered to the insurer at closing did not depict it. The court emphasized that, although the survey exception was not a coverage, the payment of additional premium for its removal increased coverage; thus, the same coverage would not have existed if the policy had contained the survey exception:

> We are satisfied that the deletion of exceptions does not, in and of itself, create coverage where none exists. See Barlow Burke, Law of Title Insurance, § 9.03 at 9-10 (3d ed. 2000) ("An exception is not the opposite of coverage and so eliminating it does not automatically provide coverage."). However, the effect of the deletion of the Schedule B standard exceptions supports Dahlmann's position, that the policy covers an encumbrance on title, in at least two ways. First, the deletion of the Survey and Encroachment exceptions has an effect on the plain meaning of the policy, which, along with the additional premium Dahlmann paid, may be properly read as having created an "extended" policy. Second, the elimination of the two exceptions speaks to the reasonable expectations of the parties, especially the insured, to the contract. …
>
> First American argues that it waived the Survey and Encroachment exceptions from Schedule B because the policy was amended to include coverage for the known encroachment of the parking garage wall and the vent into the four-foot right-of-way. First American … contends that its policy does not insure against the risk of unknown encroachments. …
>
> First American's arguments are, ultimately, unconvincing. In its willingness to delete the Survey exception, and rely on the accuracy of the Johnson survey, First American assumed the risk that it would be providing coverage for an encroachment not documented on the land survey. If the policy exceptions were intended to be waived only with respect to the known encroachment, First American certainly was experienced and sophisticated enough to state this limited waiver of the exceptions by so stating in the policy. Its failure to do so leads to the logical conclusion that the parties contracted to cover encroachments through the deletion of the exception.
>
> Under a standard policy in which all Schedule B exceptions are present, no encroachments are covered by the policy, even substantial ones. Under an extended policy, the parties may agree to remove some exceptions to coverage, exposing the title insurer to greater liability under the policy. … The effect of removing much of the substance of Subsection B, along with the additional premium Dahlmann paid, had the effect of providing Dahlmann with "extended coverage." …
>
> … We agree that the definition of "land" is ambiguous, in light of the omission of the Survey and Encroachment exceptions. Therefore, because ambiguous terms in an insurance policy are construed against the drafter, we conclude that the definition of "land" is not controlling on the scope of coverage, and, therefore, that the definition of "land" in Schedule A does not limit coverage.[80]

[80] 291 Wis.2d at 172-3, 715 N.W.2d at 618-9.

The 2006 policies did not modify the definition of "Land." Further, the 2006 policies contain an affirmative survey coverage, unless it is negated by a Schedule B exception or endorsement. See §9.9.1 for a discussion of the 2006 policy survey coverage. However, that coverage does not specifically insure title to structures encroaching onto neighboring land. The Residential policy contains a protection against forced removal of structures that encroach onto neighboring land. See §9.14.1 for a discussion of that policy generally, and §3.2.3.1.7 concerning resolution of claims involving forced removal.

Even when the survey exception is removed, the policy does not insure title to buildings or other structures built after the date of policy.[81] When a house was built entirely on the wrong lot after policy date, the policy did not insure title to the misplaced house.[82]

The policy may insure the title to a building or other structure by describing the improvement in Schedule A. In one case, Schedule A specifically included title to improvements by adding the following phrase:

> And also the building now being erected on said premises known as the "Bowling Green offices"; the lands the title to which is hereby intended to be insured, being that on which said building now stands as shown by the survey of Francis W. Ford, dated February 27, 1897, a duplicate of which survey is hereto annexed.[83]

In addition, the policy had attached to it a copy of a survey showing the building as being entirely within the boundaries of the land. Based on these two assurances, the court held that the policy insured title to that portion of the building that was not located on the insured land.

[81] Exclusion 3(d) of the 2006 ALTA policies states: "The following matters are expressly excluded from the coverage of this policy, and the Company will not pay loss or damage, costs, attorneys' fees, or expenses that arise by reason of: Defects, liens, encumbrances, adverse claims, or other matters... (d) attaching or created subsequent to Date of Policy (however, this does not modify or limit the coverage provided under Covered Risk 9 and 10)… ."

8.8 Appurtenant Easements And Rights

FORM 19, Appendix A
Appurtenant easements not insured

The policy may recite an easement or other right in Schedule A, which causes the policy to indemnify the insured in the event the easement or right is invalid or unenforceable by the insured for the benefit of the insured parcel.[84] The insurance of access rights on Schedule A is discussed at §9.7. ALTA policies state that they do not insure any rights in adjacent streets, or any rights beyond the parcel shown in the policy. Most ALTA policies make this statement in the definition of "land." The ALTA Homeowner's Policy, however, makes that statement in Exclusion 6. The Homeowner's Policy is further discussed at §9.14.2. See also §12.3.15, concerning the effect on the survey exception of the attachment of a survey to the policy.

The unambiguous terms of the ALTA policies thus make it clear that they do not insure additional rights by implication. Most but not all courts have refused to add rights by implication. When a policy described the insured land by referring to a recorded deed and the deed included an appurtenant easement, the court concluded that the policy had insured the easement.[85] Similarly, in Santos v. Sinclair,[86] Schedule A insured "Tract(s) 3 of short plat no. 702, as recorded... ." The short plat description of Tract 3 was as follows: "[t]he East 250 feet ...TOGETHER with an easement for road and utilities purposes, ...over the existing old road which meanders east and west... ." By referring to the plat, the court found, the policy had implicitly insured the rights specifically granted in the plat description of Tract 3.

However, Santos was limited in Dishman v. Stewart Title Guar. Co.,[87] in which the insureds argued that the policy assured the public nature of an adjacent street because the policy attached a map that recited the street name. The court said it found no case saying that such a reference gives an assurance of rights "outside the described property," and that there was no incorporation by reference in the title insurance policy:

> [T]he Dishmans … claim the policy, by incorporating the plat, guaranteed the legal status of property not conveyed to them. But there is no reasonable construction of > the policy that would lead an average purchaser of insurance to believe that by guaranteeing "a right of access to the land," Stewart Title meant to guarantee "the existence of all streets shown on the incorporated plat map." The Dishmans seek coverage for something that is simply not covered under the policy. We hold that the policy guaranteed only that some right of access to the property existed at the time of sale, and did not guarantee a right of access from Putman Street or any other particular street shown on the referenced plat.[88]

(unpublished) (concerning adverse possession claim to part of parcel encumbered by an easement insured in Schedule A). In IDC Properties, Inc. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 974 F.Supp.2d 87 (D.R.I. 2013), the inclusion in Schedule A of the phrase “development and special declarant rights in and to" the insured condominium was found to cause the policy to insure the right to expand the condominium to include units later declared on land that was not described in Schedule A, which units did not exist on the policy date, and which the same insurer later refused to insure.

Thus, the policy does not incorporate easements or other right depicted on a plat simply by using the platted description. The platted description is the only correct legal description, and its use in the policy does not denote any special intent to include rights beyond the boundary of the lot and block. As the Dishman court said, "this function of the plat map is necessarily limited to describing what it is that has been conveyed."[89]

Other courts have also refused to find that the attachment of or reference to a map with the commitment or policy has the effect of expand the rights or parcels insured by the policy.[90] In Decker v. First American Title Ins. Co.,[91] a California case, the insured's deed granted the right to use a private road that was not insured in the policy. The court rejected the insured's argument that he had a reasonable expectation that the policy would insure rights in the private road.[92]

[90] In Forbes v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2012 WL 541509 (Cal.App. 5 Dist.) (unpublished), the owners intended to transfer two parcels on either side of a road into their trust. The commitment and deed conveyed only one parcel, but the preliminary title report recited the one tax parcel that included both lots and attached a map with arrows pointing to both parcels. The court said that the preliminary title report was an offer to issue a policy, not a representation, and merged into the policy when issued. The map was not part of the policy, and the insured had no cause of action based on it. In Kloster v. Roberts, 179 Wash.App. 1025, 2014 WL 470742 (Wash.App. Div. 3) (unpublished), rev.den. 181 Wash.2d 1009 (Wash. Oct. 8, 2014), when the policy did not insure an access easement in Schedule A, the attachment of a map to the policy did not cause it to insure rights in an easement shown thereon, which was later discovered to be defective. However, see Lee v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 188 Cal.App.4th 583, 115 Cal.Rptr.3d 748 (Cal.App. 1 Dist. 2010), in which the insurer was denied summary judgment when the insureds claimed they thought they had bought a second parcel because the preliminary title report listed two tax parcel numbers, excepted taxes for both parcels, and attached a map with arrows pointing to both parcels. Their contract of sale also included two tax parcels. In Schiller v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 444 P.3d 459 (Table), 2019 WL 3202204 (Nev.) (unpublished), the court found that a policy that insured lots near the shore of Lake Tahoe did not insure that the parcels touched the shore, relying largely on the definition of Land in the policy. The court also held that no such coverage was granted or implied from the fact that a map was attached to the policy that showed nearby Lake Tahoe.

[91] 2001 WL 1508035 (Cal.App. 4 Dist.) (unpublished).

[92] "First, the policy specifically stated, 'The estate or interest in the land described in Schedule C and which is covered by this policy is: A Fee'--i.e., a possessory estate in a tangible area of land, as opposed to a servitude, such as an easement or right of way. [citations omitted] Moreover, Schedule C described only the property conveyed to Decker in parcel 1 of the grant deed; there was no reference to parcel 2 or the easement or right of use described therein. Under these circumstances, as a matter of law, it was not reasonable for Decker to expect coverage under the policy for claims pertaining to parcel 2. (Havstad v. Fidelity National Title Ins. Co. (1997) 58 Cal.App.4th 654, 659-661.)"

Twin Texas decisions hold that an easement is implicitly insured when the policy describes the property by reference to a deed which includes the easement, but there is no incorporation by reference when the policy describes the property by metes and bounds and does not recite the easement in Schedule A. In Clements v. Stewart Title Guar. Co.,[93] the court held that a policy insured an easement because Schedule A described the insured land by reference to a deed which included the easement grant. In Kuper v. Stewart Title Guar. Co.,[94] the insured's deed included an easement. The policy did not describe the land by reference, but recited the full legal description of the fee simple parcel, and did not include the easement in Schedule A. The appellate court first issued a decision holding that the policy impliedly assured the easement, simply by using the same description as in the deed, based on Clements. The court withdrew and reversed that opinion, however, holding that the easement was not incorporated by reference:

> Clements is distinguishable, however. ... No metes and bounds description was included [in the Clements policy]. Therefore, the deed, which referenced the easement, was necessarily incorporated into the title policy. By contrast, Kuper's title policy described the land by its metes and bounds. We conclude that, because the metes and bounds legal property description was set forth in Kuper's title policy, the deed description was not necessarily incorporated into his policy.

The middle ground factually between Clements and Kuper is found in Aubuchon Realty Co. Inc. v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co. of New York.[95] In that case, the policy described the insured parcel as "fee simple vested in [the insured] by means of a deed," the recording information for which was recited. The insured argued incorporation by reference. The insurer urged that the policy referred to the insured estate as fee simple and did not insure the easement because it was not recited. The appeals court did not make a ruling; it found each position "equally plausible and reasonable," and remanded for findings of fact.

California has held that the policy insures the right to water from the land as an appurtenance. In White v. Western Title Ins. Co.,[96] the insurer admitted liability for omission of an easement for extraction of water from the property. The Supreme Court held that the policy insured appurtenant water rights, and their loss was a compensable element of damage separate and in addition to the loss caused by the easement. An Arizona case rejected a claim that the insurer was responsible for loss based on the insured's claim of water rights on an adjacent parcel. However, that decision was not based on a determination that the policy does not insured appurtenant water rights, but rather that the insured did not in fact have any water rights in the adjacent land. The case could thus be read to agree with the holding in White.[97]

8.9 Adjacent Streets And Waterways

FORM 70, Appendix A
Road, waterbody not "Land"

The policy does not insure any rights in adjacent roads or bodies of water. Condition 1(g) of the 2006 ALTA policies (Conditions & Stipulations 1(d) of the 1992 ALTA policies) defines Land as follows:

> "Land": The land described in Schedule A, and affixed improvements that by law constitute real property. The term "Land” does not include any property beyond the lines of the area described in Schedule A, nor any right, title, interest, estate, or easement in abutting streets, roads, avenues, alleys, lanes, ways, or waterways, but this does not modify or limit the extent that a right of access to and from the Land is insured by this policy.

The ALTA Homeowner's policy places this coverage limitation in the Exclusions.

The title insurance policy does not assure ownership of any land taken for public road, or the fee title to land subject to a road right-of-way.[98] A policy may be written to intentionally assure identified rights in an adjacent street or body of water as part of the insured Land. For example, the policy can be written to assure an easement for riparian rights in the water body, such as to build and maintain a pier or dock. However, absent such an affirmative, intentional inclusion of rights beyond the property lines, the policy does not assure any such rights. The mere reference to the street or body of water as being the boundary line does not create any assurance about that adjacent way.

Earlier forms of California Land Title Association policies gave an affirmative assurance that the insured has the "ordinary rights" of an abutting owner in any adjacent public street. The current version of the CLTA standard coverage owner's policy does not give such an assurance. See §9.7 for a discussion of the insuring provision regarding a right of access.

In California, the presumption is that adjacent lot owners hold the fee title to public streets, subject to an easement for the street. Thus, a conveyance of a platted lot impliedly conveys the fee in the roadway. In Murray v. Title Ins. & Trust Co.,[99] construing the earlier form of policy, the court held that:

> ... a title insurance policy on property bounded by a street necessarily includes within its coverage insurance of the grantee's title to the center of the bounding street. ...

[98] In Hofmann v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 107 Wash.App. 1010, 2001 WL 803756 (Wash.App.Div. 1 2001) (unpublished), the policy was found not to insure title to an adjacent road to which the metes and bounds legal description called, although the description also failed to except a highway deed that gave additional land for highway. The court relied on the survey exception rather than the definition of land in making its analysis, however.

[99] 250 Cal.App.2d 248, 58 Cal.Rptr. 273 (1967).

> [B]y implication it likewise insures the presumed ancillary titles and privileges attached to the property.

The Murray holding regarding the insurance of implied rights appurtenant was not followed, although also not specifically overturned, in later California cases involving CLTA standard-coverage policies.[100] However, in Havstad v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co.,[101] the policy was found not to insure any rights in an area on the recorded plat marked as "not a public street." The court held that the policy definition of land establishes that there is coverage only for the described land, and a reference to a map does not invoke coverage for any appurtenant rights created thereby.

> Thus, the written title insurance contract provisions "clearly and explicitly" insure a fee title in lots 1 and 23; "clearly and explicitly" do not cover "any property beyond the lines of the area described or referred to in schedule A, nor any right, title, interest estate or easement in abutting streets;" and "clearly and explicitly" contain no separate indorsements covering an easement in the nonabutting property known as "not a public street." An ordinary reading of the land's description indicates coverage for two pieces of property--lot 1 and lot 23. Reference to the subdivision maps is included to provide guidance as to where the graphic representation of the property can be located. In our view, the policy is completely unambiguous in its description of the land covered... .[102]

The court also rejected the insureds' argument that they had a "reasonable expectation" of coverage, since the policy was not ambiguous. An exception for an easement in Schedule B is not an assurance that the insured is the beneficiary of the easement.[103] In Decker v. First American Title Ins. Co.,[104] the insured argued that the abutter's rights coverage assured him rights in a private road that did not in fact abut his property. The court found that the coverage only applies if the road abuts, and is not an assurance that the road does in fact abut.[105]

[105] "Finally, there is no suggestion on appeal that the dirt fire road qualifies as an "open street or highway" abutting Decker's property, and indeed, the record demonstrates that the City of Laguna Beach erected a permanent road block restricting vehicular access over this road. Therefore, as a matter of law, there was no coverage under the abutter's rights

The definition of land also excludes any rights in adjacent "waterways." Under the public trust doctrine, the states assert ownership to the bed of certain water bodies, and the right to regulate the placement of structures on the beds of navigable waters and the use of the surface. See §12.3.12 for a general discussion of water boundaries in legal descriptions. The standard form ALTA policies do not provide an assurance of any rights the insured may have in an adjacent body of water,[106] or that the insured Land abuts the shore of a nearby water body.[107] However, the "other" defects provision in Covered Title Risk 14 of the Residential policy was found by a New Jersey court to protect against the forced removal of a dock in a riparian zone between a bulkhead line and a pierhead line, when the policy legal description included the "land" up to the pierhead line.[108]

The examining practice in many states is to insert one or more exceptions for the rights of the public and the state in the adjacent body of water. Given the policy definition, these exceptions are not strictly necessary, but they do serve to amplify the lack of coverage.[109] A policy containing an [106] In R.W. Docks & Slips v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2001 WL 856431 (Minn.App.) (unpublished), rev.den., the insurer had issued policies on marina condominium units. The policy contained exceptions for rights of the public in submerged lands, and governmental rights to regulate the surface. The court found that the policy did not have a duty to prosecute an appeal from the denial of a dredging permit in which the state DNR had threatened to claim that the condominium regime violated the public trust doctrine. The court found that the insurer was not obligated to defend "Docks's title in or use of Lake Superior's bed against Wisconsin's right to regulate" because the policy did not claim to assure that Docks owned the bed of Lake Superior. Further, Chicago Title could not have warranted that Docks owned title to Lake Superior's bed because Wisconsin law does not allow private citizens to own any part of Lake Superior's bed. Under its public trust doctrine, the state holds the beds of navigable waters, including Lake Superior, in trust for all of its citizens." The right to take water from an adjacent river or lake is a valuable appurtenance in certain states, and is further discussed at §8.8.

[107] In Schiller v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 444 P.3d 459 (Table), 2019 WL 3202204 (Nev.) (unpublished), the court found that a policy that insured lots near the shore of Lake Tahoe did not insure that the parcels abutted the shore, relying largely on the definition of Land in the policy. The court also held that no such coverage was granted or implied from the fact that Schedule B contained a water exception, and a map was attached to the policy that showed nearby Lake Tahoe. The central issue in the case was the fact that Lake Tahoe is a man-made lake whose bed is not owned by the littoral owners. The court observed that the policy insured the title to platted Lots 2 and 3, and that the plat "distinctly depicts a strip of land, designated 18 feet wide, separating lots 2 and 3 (Schiller's land) from the meander line (Lake Tahoe)." The court recited ancient and settled law that establishes that a legal description that calls to a meander line is a call to the shore, whereas a call to a line short of the meander establishes that the parcel does not abut the shore. The court also cited Christensen v. Mikell, 476 S.E.2d 692, 694 (S.C. 1996), for its holding that a title insurer owes no policy duty concerning the title to land that is not included in the insured parcel.

[108] Florio v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 2006 WL 1520175 (N.J.Super.A.D.) (unpublished).

[109] In R.W. Docks & Slips v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2001 WL 856431 (Minn.App.) (unpublished), rev.den., the policy contained exceptions for rights of the public in submerged lands, and governmental rights to regulate the surface. The court found the state's rights to the bed and waters excepted. It said: "At oral argument, Docks conceded that if it has title to the 71 condominiums, the exclusion applies. Docks argued that Chicago Title nonetheless has a duty to "defend" the perceived challenges to title before it can rely on the exclusions. We disagree. Even if we disregard the requirement in Wisconsin law that the duty to defend can only be triggered by allegations in a complaint, not a defendant's answer to a complaint, and accept the rather dubious assertion that the State of Wisconsin and WDNR's answer challenged title to the exception for the rights of the public in the adjacent lake bed "excludes assurance of title ... of submerged land ... ."[110]

There is no abutter's rights coverage in the ALTA policy forms. Other states' laws vary as to the lot owner's rights in adjacent streets. In Kansas, for example, the statutory presumption is that dedication of a road conveys the full fee simple. Therefore, a lot owner has no ancillary right or title in the street. Based on this analysis, the court in J & S Building Co., Inc. v. Columbian Title & Trust Co. held that the policy does not insure any interest in the street.[111] Similarly, an Ohio court held that a policy had not insured that an adjacent alley was public, which would cause the insured to hold fee title to the alley by implication, simply because the parcel's legal description referenced the alley.[112] Finally, the insured suffered no compensable loss when the adjacent "street" was determined to be an easement rather than a public, open thoroughfare, especially given an exception in Schedule B for "streets not physically opened."[113]

An older form of California Land Title Association policy did not protect against the effect of private restrictions that prohibited the construction of a driveway connecting to the adjacent street, because the policy did not insure any title right in the street.[114] See §9.7 generally for a discussion of the insuring provision regarding a right of access.

9 Covered Risks

9.0 Title Insurance Policy Types

The title insurance policies most commonly used in the United States are those promulgated by the American Land Title Association. The standard ALTA policies currently in use are the owner's and loan policies adopted on June 17, 2006.[1] The 2006 policies replaced those adopted in 1992, which were decertified on June 17, 2007. ALTA promulgated owner's and loan policies in 1990, 1987, 1984, 1970 and several earlier versions. See the discussion of the genesis of the standardized ALTA policies in §9.1.3.4. The California Land Title Association has promulgated an owner's policy form. Texas and New Mexico regulators promulgate policy forms, the current versions of which are very similar to ALTA policy forms.[2] The State of Iowa does not authorize the issuance of title insurance policies covering land in that state. However, the Title Guaranty Division of the Iowa Finance Authority issues guarantees that are very similar to title insurance policies, through licensed attorney-agents.[3]

There are two forms of owner's policies promulgated by ALTA other than the 2006 policy, for use with residential real estate—the Residential policy and the Homeowner's policy. The covered risks of those policies are discussed at §§9.14.1 and 9.14.2, respectively, and their other terms are discussed at the appropriate sections of this book. ALTA has also promulgated a Short Form Residential Loan Policy, discussed at §9.14.3, and a Residential Limited Coverage Junior Loan Policy, discussed at §9.14.4. The ALTA has promulgated a United States of America Policy, as discussed at §9.14.5. ALTA adopted a Limited Pre-Foreclosure Policy on December 3, 2012, which protects a lender seeking to foreclose against certain liens and other matters not described in the policy, as discussed at §9.14.6. Finally, the ALTA Expanded Coverage Residential Loan Policy is discussed at §9.14.7.

This chapter discusses the various defects, liens and adverse claims against title which are covered by the owner's and loan policies, other than construction liens, which are discussed separately in Chapter 10. For the most part, this chapter is organized by the nature of the risk rather than by coverage. Section 9.9 discusses coverages added in the 2006 ALTA policy forms. Section 9.10 discusses loan policy coverages. Section 9.11 discusses coverages added by endorsement.

9.1 Nature And Scope Of Title Insurance Policy; Rules Of Construction

Title insurance is unlike any other line of insurance, in a number of respects. The history of this American form of insurance is recounted in §9.1.3.4. The title insurance policy provides coverage only for matters that occurred prior to the policy date. It does not protect against future perils or risks, and is built on a model of risk elimination rather than risk assumption.[4] The insured pays a one-time premium,[5] and yet the policy does not have a stated or definite policy term.[6] One court labeled title insurance as being unique in the insurance world, for all of the above reasons.[7]

As a result, one commentator noted that:

> Title insurance has been regarded as a separate type of contract not falling within any of the three basic classes of insurance.[8]

---

[4] In Crossman v. Yacubovich, 290 S.W.3d 775, 779 (Mo.App.E.D. 2009), the court noted: "Title insurance differs from most other types of insurance because it seeks to eliminate risk of loss arising from past events, rather than assuming risk of loss for future events and then distributing the risk among policyholders. Stephen M. Todd, Title Insurance, in 1 Mo. Real Estate Practice 2–1, § 2.2, at 2–4—2–5 (Mo. Bar ed., 4th ed. 2000)." See also GMAC Mortgage, LLC v. First American Title Ins. Co., 464 Mass. 733, 985 N.E.2d 823 (Mass. 2013) ("title insurers attempt to eliminate or reduce risks prior to the issuance of a title insurance policy"); Farrington v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 86 Wash.App. 399, 936 P.2d 1157 (1997) ("unlike most insurance, which aims to reduce risk from unforeseen future events, title insurance primarily seeks to eliminate risks and losses caused by defects in title arising out of past events") (citing Washington State Bar Ass'n, Real Property Deskbook sec. 35.3, at 35–3 (2d ed. 1986)).

[5] As noted in Crossman v. Yacubovich, 290 S.W.3d 775, 779 (Mo.App.E.D. 2009).

[6] These same unique characteristics of title insurance were noted in S. Quiner, Title Insurance and the Title Insurance Industry, 22 Drake L.Rev. 711 (1973), which was quoted in Chicago Title Ins. Co. v. Huff, 256 N.W.2d 17 (Iowa 1977), which held the Iowa statutory ban on the writing of title insurance in that state.

[7] In BB Syndication Services, Inc. v. First American Title Ins. Co., 780 F.3d 825 (7th Cir. (Wis.) 2015), the court said: "Unique in the insurance world, title insurance differs from other forms of property and liability insurance in that it only covers losses from defects in title and lien priority (and similar title-related risks), usually requires only a one-time premium, and lasts for as long as the insured holds title (or, in this context, a security interest). ... This model works because title insurance is retrospective rather than prospective; it generally protects against defects in title that arose prior to the issuance of the policy, allowing the insurer to reduce or eliminate risk by conducting a careful title search to identify defects. These features, however, cause some complications in the construction-loan context."

[8] R. Keeton, Insurance Law 17 (1971), as quoted in Commercial Union Ins. Co. v. Sponholz, 866 F.2d 1162, 1163 (9th Cir. (Calif.) 1989).

Courts have used the above factors to distinguish between title and casualty insurance.[9] Courts have also held that title insurance operates under different principles than those that apply to general liability insurance.[10] This section examines the general principles on which the title insurance policy is based, and the rules used to construe the policy's terms.

9.1.1 Nature Of Policy Coverages

The title insurance policy indemnifies the insured against loss if the title to the insured parcel is held by someone other than the insured. It also indemnifies as to defects in or liens or encumbrances on title other than those shown in the policy schedules. Schedule B refers to those matters against which the insurer does not indemnify, both of general application (unfiled construction liens, for example) and those specific to the described property.

In addition to the indemnifications as to the title, the policy indemnifies the insured if the property is found to lack a right of access, or if title is found to be unmarketable as shown in the policy. The assurance as to marketability is closely related to, but not inseparable from, the assurances about title. The access right assurance goes beyond the subject of the title to the land. Rather, it has to do with a fundamental privilege attached to the ownership of the real property.

The ALTA loan policy includes four assurances specific to the mortgage or deed of trust held by the insured: indemnity as its validity, enforceability and priority generally, and priority specifically as to unfiled construction liens.

The title insurance policy insures the title to real property.[11] Title is synonymous with [9] In Commercial Union Ins. Co. v. Sponholz, 866 F.2d 1162, 1163 (9th Cir. (Calif.) 1989), the court held that a casualty insurance policy is different in nature from a title insurance policy. It found support for that proposition in Nevers v. Aetna Ins. Co., 14 Wash.App. 906, 546 P.2d 1240 (1976), which distinguished between the same two lines of insurance by holding that "[d]efective title is clearly not a 'physical loss or damage.'"

[10] In GMAC Mortgage, LLC v. First American Title Ins. Co., 464 Mass. 733, 985 N.E.2d 823 (Mass. 2013), the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court held that that title insurance is "fundamentally different" from general liability insurance in that it eliminates or reduces existing risks rather than assumes future risks. It ruled that the in- for-one, in-for-all rule does not apply in the "unique title insurance context." The Massachusetts high court reiterated this ruling in Deutsche Bank Nat'l Ass'n v. First American Title Ins. Co., 465 Mass. 741, 991 N.E.2d 638 (Mass. 2013). In Philadelphia Indem. Ins. Co. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 771 F.3d 391 (7th Cir. (Ill.) 2014), the Seventh Circuit Court of Appeals also held that the rationale of the in-for-one rule does not apply to title insurance. The court said: "[t]he complete-defense rule reflects and enforces the broad defense promise in standard general liability policies and makes sense given the comprehensive coverage provided by this kind of insurance. Title insurance is much narrower. A title insurer only assumes risks associated with defects in property title." In Cherry Hills Farm Court, LLC v. First American Title Ins. Co., ___ F.Supp.3d ___, 2019 WL 6682835 (D.Colo. 2019) (not yet released for publication), appeal filed January 6, 2020, the court held that the complete-defense rule adopted in Colorado for liability policies does not apply to title insurance, "which differs from general liability insurance in significant ways." Those decisions are fully discussed at §4.7.

[11] "A title insurance policy does not insure the value of any particular property. In fact, it does not insure the property at all. If the value of the property appreciates or depreciates, the title policy is not affected. Instead, the defendant is insuring the title against defects which may damage the plaintiffs' interest in the property." McLaughlin v. Attorneys' Title Guar. Fund Inc., 61 Ill. App.3d 911, 378 N.E. 2d 355 (1978).

ownership. Thus, a title insurance policy insures the ownership of an estate in real property. A title insurance policy protects the insured against a claim by another to own the real property, defects or flaws in the insured's own claim of ownership, and encumbrances and liens that burden the title. There are two aspects of real property titles: the ownership right, and the evidence of that ownership right. Such evidence of ownership, sometimes called the muniments of title, typically includes an instrument that serves as the root of title, such as a government patent, together with subsequent deeds that form a chain of title to the property.[12] The muniments of title may also be deemed to include the document or documents that evidence the chain of title, such as an abstract of title. A person holding good evidence of his or her title qualifies as a bona fide purchaser, which status is protected in each state against adverse ownership claims by a thoughtful pattern of statutes and case law.

Covered Risk 1 of the ALTA title insurance policies indemnifies the insured if title is not vested in the insured. An interest in real property is deemed to be vested when it belongs completely and unconditionally to a person, and the right cannot be impaired or taken away without the consent of the owner.[13] [12] See the following representative decisions discussing the concept of muniments of title: Merrill v. Rocky Mountain Cattle Co., 26 Wyo. 219, 181 P. 964 (Wyo. 1919); Cochran v. Stewart, 57 Minn. 499, 59 N.W. 543 (Minn. 1894); Turner v. Rice, 178 Ark. 300, 10 S.W.2d 885 (Ark. 1928); and H & F Land, Inc. v. Panama City-Bay County Airport and Industrial District, 736 So.2d 1167 (Fla. 1999) (describing the elements of title that make up its muniments, and relating them to the state Marketable Record Title Act).

[13] "The vested right is property which the law protects and is an immediate vested right of present or future enjoyment. To be vested in its accurate legal sense a right must be complete and consummated, and one of which the person to whom it belongs cannot be divested without his consent. A vested right is the power to do certain actions or possess certain things lawfully and is substantially a property right and may be created either by common law, by statute or by contract." Security Bank & Trust Co. of Miami, Oklahoma v. Barnett, 169 Okl. 298, 36 P.2d 874, 880, as quoted in Scamman v. Scamman, 90 N.E.2d 617 (Montgomery Cty. Ohio Common Pleas 1950). Section 40 of the New York Real Property Law defines a remainder interest as being vested "when there is a person in being, who would have an immediate right to the possession of the property, on the determination of all the intermediate or precedent estates." In In re Canfield's Will, 105 N.Y.S.2d 654 (Surrogate's Court, Ulster County 1951), the court said "[a]n estate is said to be 'vested' under the laws of this State, where there are persons who will have an immediate right to possession of the property if the precedent estate therein should now cease according to the terms of the instrument creating it." It said that the courts favor the vesting of estates in land, "because vesting estates tend to result in fixed, definite rights, stripped of uncertainty and the element of change." The court relied on Matter of Steinwender's Estate, 176 App.Div. 517, 163 N.Y.S. 309 (1917). In Curtis v. Citizens Bank & Trust Co. of Lexington, 318 S.W.2d 33 (Ky.App. 1958), the court observed that "[t]he rule against perpetuities … is concerned with the remote vesting of estates. … The objective is to insure that the fee simple title shall have vested in some person or persons within the statutory period." The court then wrestled with the issue of when a future estate in land is deemed to have become vested in its holders, particularly when the holders are not identified by name in the instrument that grants those rights.

The issue of whether a property right is vested is frequently considered in relation to the rule that a statute may not be applied retroactively if such effect would be to take away vested rights in property. See, for example, WSSC v. Riverdale Fire Co., 308 Md. 556, 564, 520 A.2d 1319, 1323 (1987) (a "statute, even if intended to apply retrospectively, will not be given that effect if it would take vested rights"); and Waters v. Montgomery County, 337 Md. 15, 29, 650 A.2d 712, 718 (1994) ("In the final part of a retroactivity analysis, a court must determine whether the retroactive application of the statute or ordinance would interfere with vested rights"). In fact, in Dua v. Comcast Cable of Maryland, Inc., 370 Md. 604, 805 A.2d 1061 (Md.App. 2002), the court said that, in the statutory context, the term vested property right has become merely a label, because "it has long been recognized that the term 'vested rights' is conclusory—a right is vested

Covered Risks

In most situations, title vests in a purchaser when an instrument of conveyance is delivered from the rightful owner of the property to that purchaser, or whenever the conditions have been met for passage of title under the state's Statute of Frauds. Some conveyances are not made by deed. When title passes from a deceased owner to his or her heir or devisee, state law determines when the heir or devisee becomes vested in title.[14] Similarly, state law determines when title obtained by adverse possession vests in the possessor.[15] When property is foreclosed by a lender, state law determines the date on which title vests in the foreclosing party.[16]

A person must have a recognized ownership interest in real property in order to obtain a policy insuring the ownership of that interest.[17] In fact, the ALTA title insurance policies define "Title" based exclusively on the estate or interest held by the insured that is identified in the policy.[18] Almost any interest in real estate may qualify for the issuance of a title insurance policy, such as a fee simple estate, life estate, leasehold estate, the interest of a purchaser under a land contract or contract for deed, an easement, mortgage or deed of trust, or an option (in those states in which an option right is considered to be an interest in land). The policy insures the identified estate in the real property. The policy explicitly or implicitly references in Schedule A the instrument by which that interest was conveyed to the insured.

Conversely, a title insurer rarely if ever issues a policy in favor of a person who does not hold a recognized estate or interest in the real estate. Some state laws may prohibit the issuance of policies to persons not having an insurable interest in the property. See §7.1 concerning insurable interests in real estate. Some forms of the non-imputation endorsement give an assurance to a shareholder, partner or member of the entity that owns the real estate. However, the non-imputation endorsement is issued in conjunction with a policy insuring ownership of that real property.

The legal system in the United States provides a stable footing for the insuring of titles to real estate, particularly in contrast to certain other countries and regions. The certainty of the vesting of real estate titles allows Americans to easily transfer property, and to obtain capital through loans secured by real estate, not mere personal credit. This highly reliable land transfer system gives the United States an advantage over much of the rest of the world, and has been a large factor in the country's economic growth, as economists have observed.[19] The American situation stems from the

when it has been so far perfected that it cannot be taken away by statute."

[14] See, for example, In Re Schmidt's Estate, 134 Wash. 525, 236 P. 274 (Wash. 1925); and Matthews v. Goodenough, 206 Ala. 229, 89 So. 708 (Ala. 1921).

[18] The definition of "Title" given in Condition 1(j) of the ALTA policies is "The estate or interest described in Schedule A."

[19] "If you live in the U.S. or U.K., you can take recorded deeds for granted; the notion of enforceable rights to real estate goes back to feudal times. On that foundation of ownership is built a huge edifice of capital that includes trillions original colonies' adoption of good land records laws a century before independence.[20] American courts have promoted the certainty of real estate titles ever since then. San Francisco's 1906 earthquake and fire burned up the county land records, creating uncertainty in land titles. The United States Supreme Court upheld a law providing for speedy quieting of title, because protection of real estate titles served an essential inherent power of government.[21] In 1980, a federal court ruled that a foreclosure deed could be overturned even after sale to a third party.[22] The Supreme Court struck down that decision because, if the ruling had stood, "[t]he title to every piece of realty purchased at foreclosure would be under a federally created cloud."[23] Thus, the American legal and land record systems have established and preserved certainty in the vesting and transfer of real estate titles.

The coverages of the title insurance policy have been fashioned to allow the insurer to defend its insured's title based on the law protecting the rights of bona fide purchasers for value. Such laws are the primary defenses available to any owner of real estate. It is for this reason that the title insurer will only issue a policy that insures an interest in property that has been recorded in that set of records that, by state law, imparts constructive notice of rights in real property. Also, the ALTA policies contain several exclusions for losses that may be suffered by the insured if it fails to qualify as a bona fide purchaser for value.[24] If the insured's title is attacked, the title insurer defends title based on the various laws protecting the rights of a purchaser who holds superior record title versus a party holding an unrecorded deed or one recorded after the insured's deed.[25] When appropriate, the title insurer will assert a marketable record title act to extinguish or subordinate a claim by the holder of an encumbrance or ownership interest that is barred under such a law.

[24] Those exclusions include Exclusions 3(a), for matters "created, suffered, assumed or agreed to" by the insured; 3(b), for matters known to the insured before it received its interest, and 3(e), which negates coverage for matters "resulting in loss or damage that would not have been sustained if the Insured Claimant had paid value for the" Title or Insured Mortgage. All exclusions are discussed in Chapter 11. The survey and parties in possession exceptions also negate coverage for matters that, in most states, are binding on a purchaser, based on inquiry notice. See Chapter 12.

[25] See, for example, § 3.4.7.4, discussing how a title insurer can defend title based on race-notice recording laws, and § 3.4.7.5 concerning the defense of the insured's title against a party whose conveyance is outside the record chain of title. See Basye, Clearing Land Titles, 3rd Edition, West Publishing Company, for a detailed analysis of title curative laws in all 50 states.

encumbrances on title, a dispute invokes policy coverage only if there is an attack on the property's ownership as insured in the policy.[26] Many disputes about the use of property or improvements on the land do not actually concern ownership of the real property, and therefore do not invoke policy coverage.[27]

Similarly, many kinds of issues can decrease the value of real estate. Only matters that attack title as insured invoke title insurance policy coverage. It is possible to hold flawless title to land having no value or that is not usable, in which case there is no claim payable under a title insurance policy.[28] See § 9.8.3 for a complete discussion of physical conditions that decrease a property's market value but that do not affect its title.

The policy also does not protect the insured against his or her own tortious conduct in obtaining ownership of property or related to its title.[29] The subject of fraudulent or other wrongful procurement of title is fully discussed at §11.2.7. The policy also does not protect against an action to rescind the contract under which the insured obtained title. Such situations include actions for rescission, the imposition of a constructive trust, or to remove the insured from title because of the insured's own tortious conduct.[30]

[26] In C & G Farms Inc. v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2018 WL 1281847 (Ariz.App. 1 Div.) (unpublished), the insurer owed no duty when the insureds were found to hold good title to the insured property, and no one was attacking that title.

[27] See, for example, Cherry Hills Farm Court, LLC v. First American Title Ins. Co., ___ F.Supp.3d ___, 2019 WL 6682835 (D.Colo. 2019) (not yet released for publication), appeal filed January 6, 2020, in which the court held that the neighbors' demand for money equal to the value of improvements he built on the insured parcel did not affect title. The court said: "There was no dispute over ownership or possession—it was solely a claim to recover the value of the Zobolas' admittedly trespassory improvements. It is linked to the title only in that the improvements were located on the property. But this is no greater a link than, for example, a tort that occurred on the property. A claim does not affect title merely because it involves the property. Regardless of how the state court resolved the set-off counterclaim, Cherry Hills' title to the property would remain unaffected."

[28] "An individual can hold clear title to a parcel of land, although the same parcel is valueless or considered economically unmarketable because of some restriction or regulation on its use. A title insurance policy provides protection against defects in, or liens or encumbrances on, title. Such coverage affords no protection for governmentally imposed impediments on the use of the land or for impairments in the value of the land." Somerset Sav. Bank v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 420 Mass. 422, 649 N.E.2d 1123, 1126-28 (1995) (quoting from Hocking v. Title Ins. & Trust Co., 37 Cal.2d 644, 234 P.2d 625 (Cal. 1951)); quoted with approval in Bear Fritz Land Co. v. Co., 308 Ill.App.3d 819, 721 N.E.2d 693, 242 Ill.Dec. 414 (Ill.App. 2 Dist. 1999), holding that the policy does not protect the insured against a claim of tortious interference with an easement burdening the land. Sabatino is further discussed at §§4.5.2 and 11.5. Also, see Sullivan v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2017 WL 3494216 (D.Mont.) (unpublished), in which the court held that "criminal activities" the insured alleged to have occurred on the property that were somehow related to an easement did not affect title to the land.

[30] See, for example, Safeco Title Ins. Co. v. Moskopoulos, 116 Cal.App.3d 658, 172 Cal.Rptr. 248 (Cal.App. 2 Dist. 1981) (no duty to defend an "otherwise impeccable" title when sole allegation affecting it was that insured obtained title by fraud on seller).

The title insurance policy also does not protect against the effect of matters that affect or limit the use of the property but that do not affect its title, except to the extent of an endorsement such as a zoning endorsement. See § 11.1 concerning Exclusion 1, which confirms the lack of coverage for issues about the use of the property.

9.1.2 Policy Of Indemnity, Not Guaranty

The title insurance policy is a policy of indemnity as opposed to a guarantee or warranty of title.[31] The policy itself repeatedly and consistently declares that it is in the nature of an indemnification for actual monetary loss incurred by the insured based on covered matters.[32] A few early decisions likened the title insurance policy to a warranty of title.[33] This view, based on a construction of policies no longer in use, is inconsistent with the terms of modern title insurance policies.

The distinction between indemnity and guarantee or warranty is essential in two respects. First, the policy is written to indemnify the insured for losses resulting from a covered matter and no more. Second, the policy is not a representation or warranty that title is in the state that is recited in [32] The 2006 ALTA policies begin with the statement that the insurer "insures, as of Date of Policy … against loss or damage, not exceeding the Amount of Insurance, sustained or incurred by the Insured by reason of" the enumerated Covered Risks. The Covered Risks are not guarantees, but statements of the conditions under which the duty to indemnify will arise, which is why they are phrased in the negative. Conditions 8 of the 2006 ALTA policies (Conditions & Stipulations 7 of the 1992 ALTA policies), which explains how loss is calculated, begins with this statement: "This policy is a contract of indemnity against actual monetary loss or damage sustained or incurred by the Insured Claimant who has suffered loss or damage by reason of matters insured against by this policy."

the policy.

An insured sometimes suggests that a title insurance policy is a warranty or representation of the state of title to attempt to steer the insurer into selecting a particular option to resolve the claim. An insured may assert that the insurer is required to make title to be in the condition as insured. However, the policy gives the insurer numerous options in resolving a claim, in recognition that some ownership problems are insoluble or cannot be resolved in the insured's favor, and others could only be solved by paying the adverse party a ransom price. Those options are stated in §3.0. The insurer is not obligated to pay a ransom price to a third party in order to make title to be as insured.[34] The insurer also is not required to clear the insured's title by litigation, forsaking the option to pay the insured the diminution in value caused by the title issue.[35]

An insured may also use the warranty analogy to argue that the failure to except a title defect is a breach of the policy, the exclusive remedy for which is payment to the insured rather than the curing of title. The lack of an exclusion in the policy is not a breach of contract, however. One court rejected the insured's insistence that the insurer's only option was to pay diminution, because that interpretation would erase the insurer's right to clear title:

> We conclude that the latter view of what constitutes a "breach"--that the insurer is not immediately in breach simply because title is defective on the day the policy is issued--is more in line with both title insurance law and the standard form title insurance policy that we have before us. As we have observed, a title insurer does not guarantee the state of the title. Instead, a title insurance policy is a contract of indemnity. The view that a title insurer is in breach simply because there are defects in the title at the time the policy is issued would turn the title insurer into the guarantor of the grantee's title.[36]

Finally, it has been argued that the policy guarantees title, and any defect or encumbrance must be compensated even if there is no evidence that the insured has suffered loss as a result. Modern courts reject this argument, because it would relieve the insured of the duty to prove a loss.[37]

[34] In Hillsboro Cove, Inc. v. Archibald, 322 So.2d 585 (Fla.App. 1975), the insured paid $50,000 to get title to a 30-foot strip of land, then tendered the bill to the insurer. The court held that the insurer owed only the true value of the land, which was $6,000.

[36] Stewart Title Guar. Co. v. West, 110 Md.App. 114, 676 A.2d 953 (1996). The same analysis was used in First Federal Savings Bank v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 451 S.E.2d 916 (S.C.App. 1994), in which the court held that the insurer had the right to clear title at its option and, having done so, was not obligated to also pay diminution.

[37] In Sattler v. Philadelphia Title Ins. Co., 192 Pa. Super. 337, 162 A.2d 22 (1960), there was an undisclosed lien on the property, but no evidence that it would ever be enforced before it outlawed. The court said: "A title insurance policy is a contract of indemnity and not of guaranty. Unless and until a loss occurs, there is no liability." It ruled that the insured was not damaged unless and until the lien was enforced. Also see Schwartz v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 134 Ohio App.3d 601, 731 N.E.2d 1159 (Ohio App. 8 Dist. 1999), in which the title defect was asserted by the insured in a lawsuit

This iteration of the guaranty theory would also render other policy provisions meaningless, in certain circumstances. For example, under the final determination provision, when there is litigation about the title defect, there is no loss payable until that lawsuit is concluded. The final determination provision will not be short-circuited by the warranty or guarantee analogy.[38] See §3.4.5 for a full discussion of the final determination clause. Also, the insured may not do an end run on the no-loss exclusion by asserting that the policy is a guaranty. For example, when the policy mistakenly included some land that the seller did not own and the insured submitted no credible evidence of the land's value, the insurer was found not to owe a loss payment.[39]

Lenders have also asserted the warranty analogy in order to try to force insurers to pay liens before loss has been established. Most courts agree that there are three conditions to loss under a loan policy, however: a covered defect, default on the loan, and diminution in the lender's security in the property. See §3.2.4 for a complete discussion of the defect-default-diminution analysis of loss under a loan policy. If the insurer paid the lender the amount of an undisclosed lien but the lender later recovered the full debt from the collateral, the lender would be unjustly enriched by the insurer's payment. Also, if the lien of the insured mortgage is defended against the adverse claim or lien, the lender suffers no reduction in security. Therefore, the strong majority of courts have enforced the rule that the insurer is not obligated to pay an insured lender before the lender proves that it has suffered a loss.[40]A minority of courts have adopted the warranty view that the insured lender suffers a loss as of the policy date, and a duty to "indemnify" exists once the defect is known and quantified, without proof that the lender has suffered a loss.[41]

he filed, but his title was not attacked by anyone else. Ticor Title Ins. Co.*, 920 F. 2d 1058 (1st Cir. 1990). See, for example, Green v. Evesham Corp., 179 N.J.Super 105, 430 A.2d 944 (App.Div. 1981); and *Securities Service Inc. v. [41] In Bluff Ventures Limited Partnership v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 950 F. 2d 139 (4th Cir. 1991), there was a judgment lien on property purchased at foreclosure sale. The insurer denied the claim because the claimant was not the named insured. The claimant then settled the judgment and sued the insurer. The court found that the claimant was an insured, and that it had fixed the "loss" as the settlement amount. The insurer argued that no loss would be suffered until the judgment was enforced. The insurer pointed to the "indemnity contract" language in the policy as a basis for distinguishing Title Ins. Co. v. Industrial Bank of Richmond, Inc., 156 Va. 322, 157 S.E. 710 (1931), which had ruled that a lender need not prove a loss of security. The court adopted Industrial Bank. "The principal issue on appeal is whether Walde, Bluff Venture's predecessor in interest, suffered a loss covered by Chicago Title's policy. In Title Insurance Co. of Richmond v. Industrial Bank of Richmond, a case indistinguishable from the one at hand, the Supreme

The warranty analogy is also used to argue that the insurer is liable for any inaccuracy or misstatement of the condition of title in a commitment or policy. The insurer's position is that the policy is strictly a contract of insurance, and that the insurer's sole duty on breach is to indemnify the insured. Certain risks are taken as casualty risks. Insurers argue vehemently that it is their privilege to assume a risk, even if the result is that a particular matter is not disclosed in the policy or commitment. However, several cases held that the insurer could be liable for misrepresentations contained in the title insurance commitment.[42] An entire body of law has developed from these cases on the question of whether or not the policy contains representations for which the insurer may be liable in tort if proven untrue or unreliable. Again, by its terms, the policy makes clear that it is an indemnity contract. Whenever a case suggests that a particular phrase in a policy or endorsement might be considered a representation rather than an agreement to indemnify, the industry retires that language.[43] The so-called "duty to search" is the subject of Chapter 15.

9.1.3 Rules Of Policy Construction

In most respects, the title insurance policy is construed in the same manner as are all insurance policies.[44] The following principles are applicable in most jurisdictions. States vary somewhat in the gloss they put on rules of contract interpretation, so local law must always be consulted.

Court of Virginia, quoting from a case involving a purchase, held that '[t]he plaintiff's loss occurred at the time it, relying on the policy, made its purchase, and is not measured by what it might realize at some future time under other conditions.' 156 Va. 322, 334 (1931). Chicago Title argues that the contractual language mandates a different result than the Virginia Supreme Court reached in Industrial Bank. We do not agree."

[42] See White v. Western Title Ins. Co., 40 Cal.3d 870, 221 Cal.Rptr. 509, 710 P.2d 309 (1985).

[43] See the discussion of Alliance Mortgage Co. v. Rothwell, 32 Cal.Rptr.2d 592 (Cal.App. 1 Dist. 1994) in §15.12. In that case, the court suggested that an assurance about "any incorrectness in the following assurance" was "a guarantee, not merely a promise to indemnify, as in the conventional title policy." As a result of the Rothwell decision, numerous endorsement forms were altered by the California Land Title Association and American Land Title Association. Rothwell has since been mooted by statutory changes and case law. In 1500 Viewsite Terrace, LLC v. Pickford Escrow, Inc., 2017 WL 4309755 (Cal.App. 2 Dist.) (unpublished), for example, the insured cited Rothwell to support the argument that title insurance commitments made representations of fact. The court responded that the commitments "did not constitute representations, or conceal anything, about liens or clouds on title."

9.1.3.1 Insurance Contract Interpretation Principles

There are a number of rules that have been developed for the interpretation of insurance contracts. A complete listing of those rules, and the authority for them, is beyond the scope of this book, and the reader should consult a treatise that provides a comprehensive review of those rules.[45]

Most states agree that, because a title insurance policy is a contract, an insurer does not assume a fiduciary duty to an insured by issuing an insurance contract to him or her or in the handling of a policy claim.[46]

A commonly-accepted principle is that an ambiguity in the insurance contract is to be construed against the insurer, because the insurance company drafted the policy language.[47] This is

[46] Courts agree that the mere issuance of an insurance contract does not impose on the insurer a fiduciary duty toward the insured. Time Ins. Co., Inc. v. Burger, 712 So.2d 389, 391 (Fla.1998) ("unlike the fiduciary relationship existent in a third-party claim, the relationship between the [insured and insurer] is that of debtor and creditor"). Time Insurance was quoted and adopted in the title insurance decision of Kahama VI, LLC v. HJH, LLC, 2013 WL 5177843 (M.D.Fla. 2016) (unpublished). In Estate of Myrman v. U.S. Bank, N.A., 2016 WL 3264120 (Ariz.App. 1 Div.) (unpublished), the court held that an insurance company does not owe a fiduciary duty to an insured. In Schwartz v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 134 Ohio App.3d 601, 731 N.E.2d 1159 (Ohio App. 8 Dist. 1999), the court held that an insurer in Ohio does not have a fiduciary duty to an insured. See also In re Johnson, 292 B.R. 821 (E.D.Pa.Bankr.2003); Contawe v. Crescent Heights of Am. Inc., 2004 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 20344 (E.D.Pa. 2004); and Davis v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 2007 WL 782158 (N.D. Ohio 2007) (unpublished). A title insurer owes no duty, fiduciary or otherwise, to a borrower, after having issued a policy to the lender. East Coast Athletic Club, Inc. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 39 A.D.3d 461, 833 N.Y.S.2d 585, 2007 N.Y. Slip Op. 02878 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept. 2007). A title insurer does not have a fiduciary duty toward the insured to clear title. Pruitt v. Colonial Mortgage Co., 548 So .2d 1039 (Ala. 1989). A title insurer does not have a fiduciary duty to accurately report the state of title. Barstad v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 145 Wash.2d 528, 39 P.3d 984 (Wash. 2002); Anderson v. Title Ins. Co., 103 Idaho 875, 655 P.2d 82 (1982); Williams v. Land Title Co. of Dallas, 1997 WL 196345 (Tex.App.-Dallas) (unpublished); Park v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2011 WL 1991651 (Cal.App. 4 Dist.) (unpublished); Gildea v. Guardian Title Co. of Utah, 970 P.2d 1265, 357 Utah Adv.Rep. 7 (1998); Eller Media Co. v. DGE, Ltd., 2004 WL 2002449, 2004 Ohio 4748 (Ohio App. 8 Dist. 2004) (unpublished); Fogg v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 89 A.3d 510 (D.C.App. 2014). See §15.12 for a complete state-by-state analysis of such claims. Also, an insurer does not owe a fiduciary duty to an insured to monitor or control an independent policy-issuing agency. In Faith Assembly v. Titledge of New York Abstract, LLC, 106 A.D.3d 47, 961 N.Y.S.2d 542 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept. 2013), a title agency owner stole money that was being held under a construction escrow for renovation of a church. The customer sued the title insurer. The court ruled on a motion to dismiss that the insurer had no fiduciary duty to detect or protect against the theft. Further, courts generally agree that an insurance company does not owe a fiduciary duty to an insured in the handling of a policy claim. In Johnsen and Allphin Properties, LLC v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2016 WL 6459579 (D. Utah 2016) (unpublished), the court held that an insurer does not have a fiduciary duty to the insured in settling a policy claim. In Security Title Guar. Corp. of Baltimore v. McDill Columbus Corp., 543 So.2d 852 (Fla.App. 1989), when the insured and insurer jointly sought to recoup their losses after the insurer paid the claim, the insurer was found not to have a fiduciary duty to disregard its own interest and agree to a settlement that only benefited the insured. However, an insurer can assume a fiduciary duty by entering into an overreaching agreement with the insured in resolving a claim. For example, in Matison v. Transamerica Title Ins. Co., 845 F.2d 867 (9th Cir. (Cal.) 1988), when the insurer settled the part of a lawsuit affecting title in exchange for the insured's agreement to repay the insurer by diligently pursuing non-title claims in the same lawsuit, the court held that the agreement violated the insurer's "duty of 'a fiduciary nature' not to benefit at the expense of its insured."

known as the contra proferentem doctrine. One commentator notes that, "[b]ecause in the vast majority of cases it is undisputed that the insurance company drafted and prepared the policy form, the contra proferentem rule has been automatically applied against insurers in thousands of reported decisions."[48] The drafter rule is broader than insurance; it is a basic rule for the construction of any contract. As such, the contract is sometimes not construed against the drafter when the other party is sophisticated and has negotiating power.[49]

The premise of the drafter rule, that the insurer that issued the policy wrote its language, is true for other insurers but not for title insurance policies. The policies in use today are all derivatives of a policy form written exclusively by customer life insurance company lawyers in 1928, known as the Life Insurance Company or LIC policy. Then, in 1929, a special committee of the American Title Association trade association produced a loan policy for general use in all states that was a variation on the LIC policy. No one insurer drafted the 1929 ATA policy. See §9.1.3.4, Insurer As Drafter Rule As Applied To Title Insurance, for a detailed description of the history of the drafting of the title insurance policies.

The following is a recitation of some of the rules of construction that courts have adopted, particularly as they have been applied to title insurance policies.

An insured is obligated to read the policy and is bound by its terms, and an unsophisticated individual insured is not excused from reading the policy, or from being bound by its terms if he or she elects not to read the contract.[50] The overall goal in interpreting an insurance policy, as with any contract, is to give effect to the expectations of the parties.[51] The policy is to be read "according to reh.den., the court said: "A policy is ambiguous only if it is not 'plain to a person of ordinary intelligence and understanding.' [citation omitted] 'A contract may be ambiguous because it is unclear or omits terms or ... 'if the terms used to express the intention of the parties may be understood to have two or more plausible meanings." [citation omitted] 'However, policy terms are not necessarily ambiguous just because one party seeks to endow them with a different interpretation according to his or her own interests.' … Rather, the other interpretation proposed must be plausible and reasonable in light of the language used."

Waikiki Beachcomber Investment Co.*, 839 P.2d 10 (Haw. 1992), the court stated the rule this way: "Where the language of a contract is 'susceptible of two constructions, one of which makes it fair, customary and such as prudent men would naturally execute, while the other makes it inequitable, unusual, or such as reasonable men would not likely enter into, the interpretation which makes a fair, rational and probable contract must be preferred.'" The rules of construction on insurance contracts are explained and well annotated with non-title insurance decisions in Dzien and Turner, Not All Insurance Policies are Adhesion Contracts: A Case Study of the ALTA Loan Title Policy, 33 Tort & Ins.L.J. 1123 (Summer 1998).

its plain and ordinary meaning."[52] The "words in an insurance policy are to be interpreted as a layperson would interpret them, in their 'ordinary and popular sense.'"[53] Strained or absurd interpretations will not be adopted.[54] The entire policy is read in order to discern the intent and meaning of each provision.[55] Policies "should not be given interpretations that would render some portions superfluous," if possible.[56]

Insurance policies are contracts, and a court determines their interpretation as a matter of law.[57] The court may not resort to any fact outside the text of the policy in order to determine what it means.[58] Likewise, expert witness testimony on the meaning or interpretation of the policy is irrelevant if the court or trier of fact can establish a term's plain and ordinary meaning, but may be considered to explain a term of art or industry custom.[59]

Courts should, "in general, look to dictionary definitions to establish the ordinary and popular meaning of an undefined word in the policy."[60] Further, "unless there is some reason to conclude that a word was used in a technical or legal sense, a non-legal dictionary should be used," and a "standard non-legal dictionary is a more reliable guide to the construction of an insurance contract than definitions found in legal dictionaries."[61] However, a special definition of a term given by state law or in a legal dictionary may be used when "the nature of the policy evidences that such a technical meaning was intended."[62]

The insured has the burden of proof to establish that the title defect comes within the scope of the policy.[63] The burden then shifts to the insurer to prove that a defect within the policy scope is

Many terms used in a title insurance policy are terms of art or are arcane and precise terms used in the conveyance of real estate interests, which can make expert testimony helpful to the trier of fact. The court may also use state conveyancing law to define a term. See Allan D. Windt, Insurance Claims & Disputes: Representation of Insurance Companies and Insureds, Sixth Edition, § 6.2, Contract Interpretation, Thomson Reuters.

[61] Allan D. Windt, Insurance Claims & Disputes: Representation of Insurance Companies and Insureds, Sixth Edition, § 6.2, Contract Interpretation, p. 6-7, Thomson Reuters. For example, in Pasha v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 5510931 (Ky.App.) (unpublished), the court construed an exception for "[a]ny easements or servitudes appearing in the public records." Because the word "servitude" was not defined in the policy and the insureds were consumers, the court turned to Merriam-Webster's Collegiate Dictionary, which provided a definition that the court found to be plain and understandable. It compared that definition to state court decisions that have defined the term, and found the two definitions to be consistent. Also, see the many decisions compiled at §11.2 that have used both lay and legal dictionaries to arrive at definitions for the terms "created," "suffered," "assumed" and "agreed to." In Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. Woody Creek Ventures, LLC, 830 F.3d 1209 (10th Cir. (Colo.) 2016), the court quoted Black's Law Dictionary (10th ed. 2014) for its definition 5 of the word "right," which is "The interest, claim, or ownership that one has in tangible or intangible property," and for the word "access," which Black's defines as "A right, opportunity, or ability to enter, approach, pass to and from, or communicate with."

[62] Allan D. Windt, Insurance Claims & Disputes: Representation of Insurance Companies and Insureds, Sixth Edition, § 6.2, Contract Interpretation, p. 6-7 to 6-8, Thomson Reuters. Many terms used in a title insurance policy are terms of art or are arcane and precise terms used in the conveyance of real estate interests. Courts frequently elect to use a layman's dictionary, a legal dictionary, state conveyancing law or all three to determine the best definition for a term used in a title insurance policy but not defined therein. See LJW Land, LLC v. Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 2016 WL 4370052 (W.D.N.C. 2016) (unpublished), which used the Black's Law Dictionary (Second Edition) definition of the term "suffer."

In Rosen v. Nations Title Ins. Co., 56 Cal.App.4th 1489, 66 Cal.Rptr.2d 714, 97 Cal. Daily Op.Serv. 6444 (Cal.App. 2 Dist. 1997), the court explored the burdens of proof on both insured and insurer: "Insurance policies are written in two parts: an insuring agreement which defines the type of risks being covered, and exclusions, which remove coverage for certain risks which are initially within the insuring clause. Therefore, before considering whether any exclusions apply, a court must nonetheless excluded or excepted from coverage.[64] The court "will not allow an exclusion to eliminate coverage that is expressly and specifically provided for in the same policy form."[65]

These and other rules exist to assist the court in its goal to construe all of the policy terms together, to discern the parties' intent. If the insurance contract is ambiguous, after the court applies all rules of construction that would produce its plain and intended meaning, "the interpretation that is most favorable to the insured will be adopted."[66] Policy language "should not be held to be ambiguous, however, unless it can be given two alternate reasonable interpretations."[67] If the language used in an endorsement conflicts with the terms in the body of the policy, the endorsement controls.[68] If an exclusion controls, "there should be no coverage regardless of the inferences that might be argued on the basis of exceptions or qualifications contained in other exclusions."[69] Also, "[t]ypewritten provisions supersede printed provisions when the two conflict."[70] If "there is no coverage under the terms of the insuring clause, coverage cannot be created based on the exceptions examine the coverage provisions to determine whether coverage exists at all. [citation omitted] This rule is significant for two reasons. First, when an occurrence is clearly not within the coverage clause, it does not also have to be specifically excluded. 'Second, although exclusions are construed narrowly and must be proven by the insurer, the burden is on the insured to bring the claim within the basic scope of coverage, and (unlike exclusions) courts will not indulge in a forced construction of the policy's insuring clause to bring a claim with the policy's coverage.' or qualifications contained in the exclusions."[71] An exclusion is not rendered ambiguous due to the fact that it is broad enough to encompass both matters within and without of the scope of the covered risks.[72]

An exclusion or exception is not ambiguous if its language is clear and understandable. An exception is "conspicuous, plain and clear" when it is not capable of two or more constructions,[73] and is not "buried in" the insuring provisions.[74] When an exclusion or exception is plain, the insurer is under no duty to advise the insured of the effect of the exclusion or exception.[75] As with a statute, when the policy makes a statement or coverage and then lists exceptions to that statement or coverage, the list of exceptions is considered to be complete and others will not be implied.[76] When a specific provision negating coverage follows a general provision asserting coverage, the specific provision controls.[77]

An exception that is capable of two or more reasonable meanings may be found to be ambiguous unless saved by another rule of construction. If it is ambiguous, the exception is given its most narrow reasonable construction.[78] Also, when the insurer fails to make a specific exception for an instrument that affects a parcel, a general exception may be found ambiguous, and thus read in a light most favorable to the insured.[79] When more than one party had a right of redemption, an exception for "[r]ights of redemption from foreclosure of mortgage" was found ambiguous because it gave inadequate notice of the IRS's redemption rights. The agent's decision not to use the underwriter's more descriptive exception was found to be evidence that the agent had taken the risk of confusing or misleading the insured.[80]

An insurer is entitled to place reasonable limitations on the coverages provided by the policy.[81] The insured may modify some policy terms on payment of an additional premium.[82] The acceptance of the policy without objection or request for modification is an implicit agreement to the policy's terms and limitations.[83]

New Jersey has consistently found that the title insurance policy is an adhesion contract. Some references include: Manchester Fund, Ltd. v. First American Title Ins. Co., 332 N.J.Super. 336, 753 A.2d 740 (1999); Sears Mortgage Corp. v. Rose, 607 A.2d 1327 (N.J. Super.1992) and Sylvania v. Stein, 177 N.J.Super. 117, 425 A.2d 701 (Ch.Div.1980). In Amidano v. Donnelly, 615 A.2d 654 (N.J. Super. 1992), the court said: "In recognition of the parties' unequal bargaining power and the title insurer's specialized expertise in its field, New Jersey courts have consistently treated such policies as contracts of adhesion. See Zuckerman v. National Union Fire Ins. Co., 100 N.J. 304, 320-321 (1985); Allen v. Metropolitan Life Ins. Co., 44 N.J. 294, 305 (1965)." In Akin v. Business Title Corp., 264 Cal.App.2d 153, 70 Cal.Rptr. 287 (1968), the California court found a standard form of escrow instruction to be a contract of adhesion. However, in Rooz v. Kimmel, 55 Cal.App.4th 573, 64 Cal.Rptr.2d 177 (Cal.App. 1 Dist. 1997), an indemnity and hold harmless agreement used for accommodation recordings was found not to be an adhesion contract. Thus, not all escrow forms are adhesion contracts, even in California.

[87] "We likewise reject plaintiff's contention that the 'accurate survey' exception should be deemed unenforceable because the title insurance policy represented an adhesion contract. Title insurance policies without exceptions are also available, although at a higher premium. Thus, plaintiff was not without a choice and could have bargained with his seller for the provision of a title insurance policy without exceptions." Muscat v. Lawyers Title Ins. Corp., 135 Mich.App. 26, 351 N.W. 2d 893 (1984). "Secondly, there is no evidence of the factors generally found supporting a court's resort to the principles relating to adhesion contracts. … Appellant purchased a standard coverage policy. There is no evidence that this coverage was offered to him on a "take or leave it" basis. At additional cost he could have purchased a policy affording extended coverage insuring against risks such as those involved in Corona's claim. … The purchase of such extended coverage would have necessitated his obtaining a correct survey, however …, and the boundary dispute would in all likelihood have become known to the insurer." Stearns v. Title Ins. & Trust, 18 Cal.App.3d 162, 95 Cal.Rptr. 682 (1971).

[88] The reasonable expectations doctrine was applied to the title insurance policy in Jarchow v. Transamerica Title Ins. Co., 48 Cal.App.3d 917, 941, 122 Cal.Rptr. 470 (1975); *Cale v. applies only if the policy provision at issue is ambiguous.[89] The court in White v. Western Title Ins. Co.[90] stated the rule as follows:

> '[A]ny ambiguity or uncertainty in an insurance policy is to be resolved against the insurer and ... if semantically permissible, the contract will be given such construction as will fairly achieve its object of providing indemnity for the loss to which the insurance relates.' The purpose of this canon of construction is to protect the insured's reasonable expectation of coverage in a situation in which the insurer-draftsman controls the language of the policy. Its effect differs, depending on whether the language to be construed is found in a clause providing coverage or in one limiting coverage. 'Whereas coverage clauses are interpreted broadly so as to afford the greatest possible protection to the insured ... exclusionary clauses are interpreted narrowly against the insurer.'[91]

The court held that the access rights that the insureds claimed they had "expected" to receive were not reasonable, as well as being considerably different from the rights they got. "Courts will not act to distort policy language in the face of a reasonable interpretation of the policy provision," it said. But see *Dickins v. Co. v. Rombough, 384 Mich. 228, 233, 180 N.W.2d 775 (1970), in view of the unambiguous and clearly set forth 'accurate survey' exclusion in the policy and the absence of any misrepresentation of the policy to him."

[91] White also cited another seminal California case, Jarchow v. Transamerica Title Ins. Co., 48 Cal.App.3d 917, 122 Cal.Rptr. 470 (1975), which applied the reasonable expectations doctrine to title insurance: "In determining what benefits or duties an insurer owes his insured pursuant to a contract of title insurance, the court may not look to the words of the policy alone, but must also consider the reasonable expectations of the public and the insured as to the type of service which the insurance entity holds itself out as ready to offer. [citation omitted] Stated in another fashion, the provisions of the policy, '"must be construed so as to give the insured the protection which he reasonably had a right to expect" [citation omitted]… ." 48 Cal.App. 3d at 941.

The reasonable expectations rule can be used to interpret a policy term, but should not be used to give the insured more coverage than he or she bargained for.

> "[I]f an insured's 'reasonable expectations' contravene the plain meaning of a policy, even ... [the policy's] plain meaning can be overcome." [citation omitted] Still, courts "should not write for the insured a better policy of insurance than the one purchased."[92]

9.1.3.4 Insurer As Drafter Rule As Applied To Title Insurance

The premise that an insurance contract should be construed against the insurer because it drafted the policy does not apply to title insurance policies.[93] Title insurance is a unique line of insurance, as discussed in §9.1. One of its unique aspects is that the modern title insurance policy is the offspring of a policy written by customers, and has been the product of joint drafting that began in 1929.[94]

The first title insurance company was formed in Philadelphia, after an 1868 decision of the Pennsylvania Supreme Court refused to find a lawyer liable for having given an incorrect opinion about title to real estate in Philadelphia, leaving the owner with no recourse.[95] Commonwealth Land Title Insurance Company is the descendant of that first title insurer. After the first insurer was formed, other title insurance companies were formed in a number of states, and were domiciled in [93] In BB Syndication Services, Inc. v. First American Title Ins. Co., 780 F.3d 825 (7th Cir. (Wis.) 2015), the court noted that, although a Wisconsin court had previously applied the construed-against-the-drafter rule to a title insurance policy, there is "reason to doubt the application of this rule of contract construction in this context." The court said that the Wisconsin Supreme Court "has suggested various justifications for the rule, but all rely on the assumption that insurance policies are drafted by insurers." The core principle, in Wisconsin and elsewhere, is the view that, as the drafter of the policy, "the insurer is the party best situated to eliminate ambiguity in the policy... ." However, Wisconsin, like other states, also recognizes that the contra proferentem ("against the offeror") principle of contract interpretation does not apply to standard form insurance contracts drafted jointly by insurers and their customers. See Tri City Nat'l Bank v. Fed. Ins. Co., 268 Wis.2d 785, 674 N.W.2d 617, 621–22 (Wis.App.2003), stating that a fidelity bond should not be construed against the insurer because it was the product of joint drafting. The Seventh Circuit concluded: "The same is true of title insurance in the construction-loan context. The first standard-form policy—from which the more recent versions are derived—was drafted by lenders, and the construction-lending industry has since remained involved in the revision process. See Kenneth E. their states of origin. Most companies were based in large cities, such as New York, Chicago, Minneapolis, Detroit, Los Angeles, Houston, Philadelphia, Richmond, Atlanta, Baltimore and Milwaukee. Most of those companies were local. Every insurer drafted its own form of policy.

The policies in use today are all derived from a policy form written exclusively by customer life insurance company lawyers in 1928. In that year, representatives of several life insurers produced the Life Insurance Company Standard Loan Policy, sometimes called the LIC policy. The drafter insurance companies mandated that all title insurers issue that policy form to them.[96] The life insurers wanted to receive the same policy from all insurers in all states, with policy terms that were favorable to the insured. One commentator said this about the LIC policy:

> [T]he original title insurance loan policy form was prepared by four major lenders - the very "customers" that would be purchasing insurance on the form - so that the usual "contract of adhesion" reasoning applied in construing other types of insurance policies should have no application to the real estate title insurance loan policy.[97]

The LIC policy created an uproar with title insurers. In the following year, 1929, the American Title Association trade association formed a committee to produce a loan policy for general use in all states. That product was a slight variation on the LIC policy.[98] No one insurer drafted the 1929 ATA policy. Further, that policy was heavily negotiated with customer groups. In addition, since that time, ALTA has promulgated revisions to the loan policy and has developed an owner's policy derived from the loan policy.

The fact that no title insurer may claim rights in the policy language is boldly emphasized by

The insurance companies demanded that the LIC Form be used for all insurance given relative to their mortgage loans." James P. The Ness article recites the history of the ALTA loan policy forms, giving a strong argument that the form should be construed against the lender as drafter. The author recounts the history of the LIC policy and subsequent American Title Association and ALTA policy forms.

[98] "In 1929, after the terms and provisions were considered at joint meetings of representatives of the title companies and of the counsel for the life insurance companies, the form of policy known as the American Title Association Standard Loan Policy, or 'ATA Loan Policy,' was approved by the ATA. Subsequently, in 1943, after a number of conferences, the ATA adopted the ATA Loan Policy–Revised and the ATA Loan Policy–Additional Coverage." James P. the fact that the ALTA policy forms are copyrighted by American Land Title Association, and may be used only by its members and with its permission.[99]

The influence of governmental agencies, private lenders and real estate attorneys on the title insurance policy remains strong. The ALTA policies are revised only rarely and in small increments.[100] Most of the revisions that have occurred have been forced on the insurers by their customer groups.[101] Customer groups, including the federal government, regularly exercise veto power over changes that insurers would like to make. Loan and life insurer counsel have long had their own committees of the American Land Title Association.[102] These committees and their constituents have had significant influence on the standard terms of the ALTA policy forms, sometimes with disastrous results for the title insurer.[103] FNMA and FHLMC also have heavy influence on the terms of the policy. Large governmental bodies that buy title insurance, and large private industry customer groups, require policies as promulgated by these bodies.

The ALTA promulgated an owner's policy for the first time in 1959.[104] The revisions to that [100] "The policies were revised in 1962, 1969, 1970, 1984, 1987, 1988, 1990, 1992, 1997, 2001, 2006 and 2007." James P. McAndrews, History of Title Insurance and ALTA Forms, GPSolo eReport, Volume 1, No. 8 (March, 2012). The author omitted the fact that ALTA adopted a new loan policy in 1946. See the recitation of successive policy forms in Ray E. Sweat, Mechanics' and Materialmen's Lien Coverage, in Title News, Volume 53, Number 1 (January 1974), p. 24.

[101] The primary impetus for the policy revisions in 1984, 1987, 1988, 1990, 1992 and 2006 were to appease the concerns of customers by broadening coverages and expanding definitions of terms. See §9.12, Scope Of Policy Definition Of "Public Records" And Recorded Instruments That Do Not Affect Title; §9.9.2, Notice Of Enforcement Coverages; §9.9.3, Creditors' Rights Coverage; and §11.1, Land Use Laws, Police Power And Eminent Domain. Only once in modern times did ALTA modify a policy coverage without permitting customer groups to weigh in in advance, and that decision sparked considerable outrage from customer groups even though the removal of "creditor's rights" coverage was recognized as being essential for the very survival and solvency of the insurers. See §9.9.3, Creditors' Rights Coverage.

[102] See Dzien and Turner, Not All Insurance Policies are Adhesion Contracts: A Case Study of the ALTA Loan Title Policy, 33 Tort & Ins.L.J. 1123, 1143 (Summer 1998).

[103] Note the ambiguity in the governmental regulation exclusion as found by the court in New England Federal Credit Union v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 171 Vt. 326, 765 A.2d 450 (Vt. 2000), discussed at §11.1. The language that the court found ambiguous had been inserted in the policy at the insistence of lender groups, not insurers.

[104] "It was not until 1958 that consideration was given to having a form of owner's policy insuring marketability. In 1959, after many more conferences between the representatives of the title industry and the life insurance industry, two policy have always been in tandem with changes to the loan policy form, and are made using the same procedures. Lender groups also buy many owner's policies, and have exercised significant influence as to their terms also.

Also, following the pattern laid down by the life insurers in developing the LIC policy, the same ALTA policy forms are used by all insurers in all states except three. The insurance departments of two states, Texas and New Mexico, promulgate their own policies, which all insurers are required to use in the insuring of land titles in those states. The Title Guaranty division of the Iowa Finance Authority, similarly, has developed its own promulgated title guaranty forms.[105] In California, the California Land Title Association developed the CLTA standard coverage owner's policy, which is used verbatim by all insurers in that state when appropriate. Individual insurers are not permitted to modify any of these policy forms and yet have them retain the names of the promulgating bodies.[106]

The history of the ALTA and CLTA title insurance policy forms, and the promulgated policy forms that are derived from them, convincingly shows that the policies were not drafted by any one title insurer, and that they are the product of decades of joint drafting by the insurers who use them and the customers who buy them. The contra proferentem doctrine should not apply to cause a court to construe the policy against a title insurer as if it were the drafter. Although some courts have reflexively applied the contra proferentem doctrine to the title insurance policy, the only decisions that have considered the basis for the use of that doctrine have concluded either that the policies are the product of joint drafting, or that the insureds were sophisticated policyholders who were not entitled to the benefit of that doctrine.[107] No court that has considered the drafting history of the title insurance policies has ruled to the contrary.

forms of owner's policy were presented for approval and were ultimately adopted—one that insured marketability and one that did not." James P. McAndrews, History of Title Insurance and ALTA Forms, GPSolo eReport, Volume 1, No. 8 (March, 2012).

[107] In BB Syndication Services, Inc. v. First American Title Ins. Co., 780 F.3d 825 (7th Cir. (Wis.) 2015), the court noted that, although a Wisconsin court had previously applied the construed-against-the-drafter rule to a title insurance policy, there is "reason to doubt the application of this rule of contract construction in this context." The court said that the Wisconsin Supreme Court "has suggested various justifications for the rule, but all rely on the assumption that insurance policies are drafted by insurers." The core principle, in Wisconsin and elsewhere, is the view that, as the drafter of the policy, "the insurer is the party best situated to eliminate ambiguity in the policy... ." However, Wisconsin, like other states, also recognizes that the contra proferentem ("against the offeror") principle of contract interpretation does not apply to standard form insurance contracts drafted jointly by insurers and their customers. See Tri City Nat'l Bank v. Fed. Ins. Co., 268 Wis.2d 785, 674 N.W.2d 617, 621–22 (Wis.App.2003), stating that a fidelity bond should not be construed against the insurer because it was the product of joint drafting. The Seventh Circuit concluded: "The same is true of title insurance in the construction-loan context. The first standard-form policy—from which the more recent versions are derived—was drafted by lenders, and the construction-lending industry has since remained involved in the revision process. As to the sophisticated policyholder exception to the contra proferentem rule, see Amfac Inc. v. Waikiki Beachcomber Investment Co., 839 P.2d 10 (Haw. 1992), Falmouth National Bank v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 920 F. 2d 1058 (1st Cir. 1990) and other decisions discussed below, this section.

In addition to the fact that no one title insurer has written these policy forms, the insureds in many individual transactions are sophisticated insureds. Governmental bodies, lenders, developers and life insurers obtain modifications to the standard forms by exerting their ability to control the placement of thousands or tens of thousands of policies each year. Those entities and other sophisticated parties have an excellent knowledge of real estate and insurance, and are often represented by attorneys who are sophisticated and have the power to influence policy drafting.

Sophisticated insureds are not entitled to the presumption that the contract should be construed in their favor.[108] This is known as the "sophisticated policyholder" exception to the contra proferentem doctrine.[109] The sophisticated policyholder exception applies to institutional lenders and equity investors.[110]

Similarly, an endorsement or exception is sometimes specially negotiated between the insurer and the insured as part of a transaction. Whenever the insured or its attorney has written or heavily negotiated an exception or coverage, the insured is the drafter, and any ambiguity is construed against the insured as drafter.[111]

The sophisticated policyholder exception has been applied in several title insurance cases to negate the contra proferentem doctrine.[112] It was used against a title agency as the insured under an [108] In Falmouth National Bank v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 920 F. 2d 1058 (1st Cir. 1990), the court said: "The rationale behind interpreting ambiguities against the insurer would not seem to apply as strongly when the transaction is between two parties of equal sophistication and equal bargaining power," citing numerous authorities, including Eagle-Picher Indus., Inc. v. Liberty Mut. Ins. Co., 682 F.2d 12, 21 n. 6 (1st Cir.1982), cert. denied, 460 U.S. 1028, 103 S.Ct. 1279, 75 L.Ed.2d 500 (1983); and First State Underwriters Agency of New England Reinsurance Corp. v. Travelers Ins. Co., 803 F.2d 1308 (3d Cir.1986).

Caton, et al., The Rules of Insurance Policy Construction and the Myth of the Sophisticated Insured, 385 P.I./Lit. 9 (1990).

[110] In Falmouth National Bank v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 920 F. 2d 1058 (1st Cir. 1990), a bank was found to be a sophisticated policyholder and thus not entitled to have a claimed ambiguity in the policy construed against the insurer.

[111] See Amfac Inc. v. Waikiki Beachcomber Investment Co., 839 P.2d 10 (Haw. 1992), and Falmouth National Bank v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 920 F. 2d 1058 (1st Cir. 1990), discussed below.

[112] In Amfac Inc. v. Waikiki Beachcomber Investment Co., 839 P.2d 10 (Haw. 1992), the court refused to interpret a letter agreement, made in connection with the insurance over an easement, against the insurer largely because the insured was a sophisticated insured. The insured's sophistication was shown in part by the fact that the insured negotiated the terms of the letter agreement heavily. "Both parties alleged that the other side was responsible for drafting the language of the second condition of the Letter Agreement and Therefore that any ambiguities in the language should be construed against the drafter. However, the fundamental principle that any ambiguities in a contract should be interpreted most strongly against the party who has drafted the language is applicable only where a contract is open to more than one reasonable construction. … When the contract has been negotiated between two parties of equal sophistication and equal bargaining power, the rule of interpreting ambiguities against the drafter has been held inapplicable."

Also, in Willow Ridge Ltd. Partnership v. Stewart Title Guar. Co., 706 F. Supp. 477 (S.D. Miss. 1988), the court said that the insurer had no duty to tell a sophisticated insured what the policy exceptions meant: "Willow Ridge appeared to take the position at trial that Stewart Title breached its duty to Willow Ridge by failing to specifically inform Willow Ridge that if it lost title through foreclosure, the coverage of the policy would cease. In the court's opinion, a errors and omissions policy.[113] A variant of the doctrine was employed to defeat an indemnitor's claim that he was tricked into giving the cash collateral used to insure over the lien on the property he sold.[114] sophisticated business enterprise such as Willow Ridge, represented by counsel, did not need to be told to read its policy. And had it read the policy, surely it should have realized the implications of the foreclosure as concerned coverage."

Similarly, in Falmouth National Bank v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 920 F. 2d 1058 (1st Cir. 1990), the court found that a bank was a sophisticated insured, and thus the claimed ambiguity between the final determination clause and the measure of loss paragraph would not be construed against the insurer. The court said: "the sophistication of the Bank and the fact that it negotiated specific terms of the policy lead us to believe that the general rule of interpreting ambiguities in favor of the insured does not apply with the same force here and therefore does not compel us to adopt the Bank's interpretation."

The business savvy of an owner insured, plus his overreaching interpretation of the policy, together caused the court to refuse to employ contra proferentem in Malkin v. Realty Title Ins. Co. Inc., 244 Md. 112, 223 A.2d 155 (1966): "[t]he Malkins cast themselves in the role of simple, 'unsophisticated' people who relied upon the expertise and superior knowledge of appellee's settlement officer. We do not see it quite that way. Mr. Malkin's experience in the accounting field and his training in the law alone would seem to be enough to lift him out of the ranks of the 'unsophisticated.' Nevertheless, he employed a competent and experienced attorney to represent him at the settlement. We can certainly assume that his attorney knowledgeably and carefully inspected the deed, the deed of trust, the statement of settlement, the survey, and the title policy. It is very likely that Mr. Malkin did likewise. … The Malkins emphasize the payment of the larger premium for the owner's title policy and they seem to suggest that this should enhance their claim for damages. In the circumstances this must be rejected as being without merit. Mr. Malkin and his attorney were fully cognizant of the function and the value of tile insurance. The mortgagee policy had to be paid for in any event and it seems to us most unlikely a prudent attorney would recommend against an additional expenditure of $60 to protect a $26,000 investment. Nor do we think it likely either Mr. Malkin or his attorney thought that the appellee, for an additional $60, would undertake the obligation of evicting Montgomery County from its occupancy of part of the lot or, in the alternative, of paying the Malkins $2,500." In Dare Investments, LLC v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2011 WL 5513196 (D.N.J.) (unpublished), the court held that a commercial entity that bought a complicated loan, represented by two law firms, and which sought an exotic endorsement that its counsel drafted, was a sophisticated policyholder who was not entitled to claim the benefit of the reasonable expectation doctrine. The court cited a number of New Jersey cases adopting the sophisticated policyholder exception to the reasonable expectation doctrine. In Community Credit Union v. AmeriTitle & Abstract, Inc., 344 Wis.2d 519, 822 N.W.2d 737 (Table), 2012 WL 3930615 (Wis.App.) (unpublished), the court held that a credit union was not entitled to assert an alleged ambiguity in the policy's access coverage because it was "experienced and sophisticated" on title matters. In Notaro Homes, Inc. v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 309 Ill.App.3d 246, 722 N.E.2d 208, 242 Ill.Dec. 719 (Ill.App. 2 Dist. 1999), the court found that a claim for negligent misrepresentation must be judged based on the level of knowledge and sophistication of the insured. The sophisticated insured argument was rejected in Bragman v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 421 F.Supp. 99 (E.D. Pa. 1976). There, however, the insured's expertise was not asserted to avoid a claimed ambiguity being construed against the insurer. Rather, the insurer argued that the claimant's expertise made him aware of the matter that it failed to except in the policy. The court refused to judicially amend the policy simply because the insured had business smarts.

[113] Brokers Title Co. v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 610 F.2d 1174 (3rd Cir. 1979) (title agent is sophisticated policyholder, cannot argue ambiguity of errors and omissions policy).

[114] In Rockwell v. Klein, 2000 WL 1887846 (Conn.Super. 2000) (unpublished), the sellers tried to unwind a secured indemnity they gave to induce the insurer to protect the buyer against a judgment lien on the property. They argued that the insurer tricked them into handing over the indemnity collateral. The court said they were too savvy to have been tricked: "The Indemnification and Escrow Agreement of November 16, 1998 that the Kleins both signed states explicitly and unambiguously that the Kleins knew that the judgment lien filed by Mr. Collard was an encumbrance on 391 North Main Street. They also knew that these premises could not be sold to the Straights that day unless First American issued a policy of title insurance containing 'affirmative coverage over said encumbrance.' They also understood that the only

An institutional lender typically has bargaining power equal to or greater than that of a title insurer.[115] This is particularly true in the modern age, in which lenders have significantly greater financial strength and internal resources than do title insurers, and some lenders purchase hundreds of thousands of policies each year. The same holds true of life insurers:

> Even though the life insurance customers may not control as much lending business as they once did, for the purpose of the exception it would be difficult to imagine that an institutional lender would prevail on an argument that it was not a relatively sophisticated party or that it had not benefited by the negotiating clout of other lenders.[116]

Also, lender counsel frequently draft endorsements and special coverages.[117] Some of these later become industry-wide products. This factor also militates for a finding that the institutional lender is the drafter and thus not entitled to assert the contra proferentem doctrine.

way that First American would do this would be if an escrow of $150,000 was created. The Kleins wanted to sell their property and this was the only way to do so. The claim that Mr. Collard and/or First American tricked the Kleins is farfetched indeed, particularly as Mr. Klein is an attorney and both of them are very definitely intelligent and experienced in real estate matters. Furthermore, the Kleins were represented by an attorney at the closing and Mr. Klein participated in negotiating the terms of the Agreement."

[118] Conditions 15 of the 2006 ALTA policies states:

15. LIABILITY LIMITED TO THIS POLICY; POLICY ENTIRE CONTRACT

(a) This policy together with all endorsements, if any, attached to it by the Company is the entire policy and contract between the Insured and the Company. In interpreting any provision of this policy, this policy shall be construed as a whole.

(b) Any claim of loss or damage that arises out of the status of the Title or by any action asserting such claim shall be restricted to this policy.

(c) Any amendment of or endorsement to this policy must be in writing and authenticated by an authorized person, or expressly incorporated by Schedule A of this policy.

(d) Each endorsement to this policy issued at any time is made a part of this policy and is subject to all of its terms and provisions. Except as the endorsement expressly states, it does not (i) modify any of the terms and provisions of the policy, (ii) modify any prior endorsement, (iii) extend the Date of Policy, or (iv) increase the Amount of Insurance.

that the policy terms provide the exclusive remedy for a breach of the contract, (b) that the policy and all endorsements are one integrated contract, and (c) that the title insurance commitment merges into the policy and does not survive as a separate contract after the policy's issuance. The subject of the merger of the title insurance commitment into the policy is discussed at §6.2. Conditions 15(b), which is often termed the "exclusive remedy" provision, declares that the policy is not an abstract of title. That provision is discussed at §15.6.

This section discusses the third subject of Conditions 15, which is the statement that the policy and all endorsements as to be construed as a whole, that any amendment to the policy must be in writing, and that an endorsement alters the policy's terms only to the extent it does so expressly. These three provisions are known collectively as the integration provisions. All ALTA endorsements contain a standardized corresponding integration clause that declares the same principles.[119]

The integration provisions of the policy and endorsements have been applied and enforced. Court have held that all terms of the policy and any endorsements must be read together, rather than in isolation, in order to correctly interpret their meaning.[120] Courts have also held that policy terms

[119] The form of integration provision found in all current ALTA endorsements is as follows: "This endorsement is issued as part of the policy. Except as it expressly states, it does not (i) modify any of the terms and provisions of the policy, (ii) modify any prior endorsements, (iii) extend the Date of Policy, or (iv) increase the Amount of Insurance. To the extent a provision of the policy or a previous endorsement is inconsistent with an express provision of this endorsement, this endorsement controls. Otherwise, this endorsement is subject to all of the terms and provisions of the policy and of any prior endorsements."

[120] The policy provision actually merely incorporates and expressly states the fundamental contract construction principle that "insurance policies, like other contracts, are to be read as a whole." Blum v. 1st Auto & Cas. Ins. Co., 326 Wis.2d 729, 786 N.W.2d 78, 83–84 (2010), quoted in BB Syndication Services, Inc. v. First American Title Ins. Co., 780 F.3d 825 (7th Cir. (Wis.) 2015). That principle is often applied by the courts without any reference to the policy's integration clause. For example, Falmouth National Bank v. Ticor Title Ins. Co., 920 F. 2d 1058 (1st Cir. 1990), stated: "In attempting to discern the expectations of the parties, Massachusetts courts look at the insurance contract as a whole in order to effectuate its overall purpose. ... The corollary of this rule is that, whenever possible, each word in an insurance policy should be considered and given some meaning." The court cited Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. Phillips Title Agency, 361 F.Supp.2d 443 (D.N.J. 2005) and other authorities. In Pete Lien & Sons, Inc. v. First American Title Ins. Co., 478 N.W.2d 824 (S.D. 1991), the court held that that two mineral rights endorsements did not modify or delete the policy exclusions, because they did not expressly refer to or modify and of the policy Conditions. The court said: "Our statutes provide every insurance contract shall be construed according to the entirety of its terms and conditions as set forth in the policy and as amplified, extended, or modified by any rider, endorsement, or application lawfully made a part of the policy." It quoted this statement from 13A J. Appleman Insurance Law and Practice § 7538 (1976): "Endorsements or riders on a policy become a part of the policy, and must be construed with it. Such provisions in the body of the policy are not to be abrogated, waived, limited, or modified by the provisions of an endorsement or rider unless expressly stated therein that such provisions are substituted for those in the body of the policy, or unless the provisions in the policy proper and in the rider or endorsement are conflicting." Similarly, in 380 Kings Highway, LLC v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 2011 WL 6182117 (N.Y.Sup.), 2011 N.Y. Slip Op. 52223(U) (unpublished), the court did not quote the integration clause of the policy, but relied on the general insurance contract principle that, "in construing an endorsement to an insurance policy, the endorsement and the policy must be read together, and the words of the policy remain in full force and effect except as altered by the words of the endorsement." It concluded, based on the integration provision in the endorsement, that the endorsement did modify the policy's Conditions, and that the endorsement trumped the Conditions, but only to the extent that they were inconsistent with each other. See also §9.1.3.1, which recites this and other general principles of insurance contract interpretation.

apply to and control the administration of a claim in which the coverage was granted by an endorsement, except to the extent that a policy provision was explicitly amended or deleted by the endorsement.[121] Further, courts have enforced Conditions 15(c), which says that "Any amendment of or endorsement to this policy must be in writing and authenticated by an authorized person, or expressly incorporated by Schedule A of this policy."[122]

9.2 Vesting Of Title And Defects In Title

All ALTA title insurance policies indemnify the insured in the event that the party recited as being the owner of the property in Schedule A of the policy is not vested in title.[123] This most [121] In Pete Lien & Sons, Inc. v. First American Title Ins. Co., 478 N.W.2d 824 (S.D. 1991), the court held that that two mineral rights endorsements did not modify or delete the policy exclusions, because they did not expressly refer to or modify and of the policy Conditions. The court concluded: "The special endorsement contains no express language modifying the policy, and there is no conflict between the policy and the special endorsement. The special endorsement clearly states it was meant to insure against the potential risk of damage to the surface estate should someone properly exercise mining rights. As a result, the special endorsement does not modify the exclusions." In Levy Gardens Partners 2007, L.P. v. Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co., 706 F.3d 622 (5th Cir. (La.) 2013), the court rejected the insured's argument that the policy loss provision should not apply to a zoning endorsement because zoning affects the use of property, not its title, and thus loss should not be measured as a loss in its value. The court noted that the loss provision (Conditions 8(a) of the 2006 ALTA policies) does not limit the measure of loss to defects in title, but uses the phrase "the value of the Title subject to the risk insured against by this policy." Further, the court said, the insured's logic "is misguided because the zoning endorsement insures the value of the title in the event certain use is not allowed (here, multi-family housing), therefore the word 'use' is a necessary term in describing the coverage it provides. That does not transform it into stand-alone coverage insuring against any loss related to any use of the property apart from the value of the property's title." The court held that the policy and endorsement must be read together, as is expressly stated in Conditions 15 and the endorsement integration provision. Also, in Bank of Idaho v. First American Title Ins. Co., 156 Idaho 618, 329 P.3d 1066 (Idaho 2014), the court held that loss under a location endorsement was controlled by the measure of loss found in the policy's conditions, because all the endorsement said about loss was that "loss or damage" was payable, and that the endorsement was part of the policy. Similarly, in Commonwealth Land Title Ins. Co. v. Sun Valley Credit, LLC, 2015 WL 807055 (unpublished), the insured lender argued that the policy exclusions did not apply to its claim under a zoning endorsement, in part because the endorsement gave more specific coverage than the policy. The court rejected the argument because the integration provision of the endorsement said that it did not "modify any of the terms and provisions of the policy," and that the endorsement was "subject to all of the terms and provisions of the policy and of any prior endorsements." In addition, the court found that the endorsement did not modify the exclusions, and could not simply be read out of the policy: "The Zoning Endorsement is silent, however, with regard to disclosures of matters known to the insured but unknown to Commonwealth. Those terms are instead included in the exclusions provisions of the Policy. ... Because there is no conflict between the plain language of the endorsement and the exclusions, the terms of the Policy's exclusions are applicable here... ." Also, in RA Southeast Land Company LLC v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2016 WL 4591740 (D.Nev.) (unpublished), the court held that the fact that policy coverage emanated from an endorsement rather than a covered risk did not expand the policy's loss provisions or negate the application of the final determination clause. The court held that the integration clauses of the policy and the endorsement controlled.

[122] See Van Arsdale v. Metropolitan Title Guaranty Co., 103 Misc.2d 104, 425 N.Y.S.2d 482 (1980), which held that the modification of an exception by a closer was not enforceable because it did not qualify as a written endorsement to the policy. See §9.11 for a complete discussion of policy endorsements.

[123] Covered Risk 1 of the 2006 ALTA policies indemnify against "Title being vested other than as stated in Schedule A." Covered Risk 1 of the 1992 ALTA policies indemnifies in the event that "[t]itle to the estate or interest described in Schedule A being vested other than as stated therein… ." The ALTA Residential Limited Liability Junior Loan policy fundamental assurance of the title insurance policy indemnifies the insured against loss suffered by the insured if he or she is not the rightful owner of the property and is divested of title. See § 9.1.1 for a discussion of the meaning and definition of the terms title and vesting of title.

The insured may be found not to be the rightful owner of property, or be divested of his or her title, for a plethora of reasons. Most of these risks fall into three categories: problems with the conveyance to the insured that cause that transfer to fail, problems with a prior conveyance that cause the grantor to the insured to have no title to convey, and a competing claim of ownership emanating from a different source or root of title than the insured's chain of title.[124]

The risk that the insured owner will be found not to be the rightful owner of the real property is the most significant risk covered by the policy. The risk is equally serious for the insured lender, because if the borrower is not the rightful owner of the property, in most instances the insured mortgage is also void. Much of Chapter 3 is devoted to the discussion of the methods used by a title insurer to protect an insured against these threats.

When a person or entity is found not to be the rightful owner of real property, it is common to say that that party's title is defective. Covered Risk 2 of the 2006 ALTA policies protects against "[a]ny defect in or lien or encumbrance on the Title." Covered Risk 2(a) amplifies the coverage, by stating that the policy protects against "[a] defect in the Title caused by" any of seven enumerated circumstances and issues.[125] Further, Covered Risk 2 states that that coverage "includes but is not limited to" the recited risks.

provides a more limited indemnification as to vesting of title, protecting in the event that the "Grantee" recited in the policy is not "the named grantee on the last document recorded in the public records purporting to vest title to the fee estate in the land… ."

[124] One insurer's website lists over 70 ways in which a person can lose title, including 29 deficiencies in the conveyance and dozens of types of competing interests in the land that could be deemed paramount to the insured's deed. See First American's Title Insurance Company's 70+ Ways to Lose Your Property, found at http://www.firstam.com/title/resources/reference-information/title-insurance-reference-articles/70-ways-to-lose-your-property.html. Some of the threats it lists to the vesting of title are that the deed may be: forged; from a person who is insane or mentally incompetent; from a minor; from a corporate officer, partner or trustee acting without authority; from a legal non-entity; from a foreign citizen, on a conveyance that is unauthorized or defective under that country's laws; from a party fraudulently using a name deceptively similar to that of the true owner; void due to fraud, undue influence or duress; from an attorney-in-fact who has no authority or under a forged or expired power of attorney; emanating from a court order that is not final or that may be challenged as defective; procured from the true owner by trickery, sometimes known as fraud in the factum; or that may be challenged by heirs, a spouse, a former spouse or a co-owner. For example, in 212 Marin Boulevard, LLC v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., 2014 WL 8849641 (N.J.A.D. 2015) (unpublished), cert.den. 223 N.J. 280 (Oct. 5, 2015), the title conveyed by a deed from a railroad was attacked as void because the railroad failed to obtain the authority to abandon the rail line from state and federal regulators.

[125] Covered Risk 2(a) lists: "(i) forgery, fraud, undue influence, duress, incompetency, incapacity, or impersonation; (ii) failure of any person or Entity to have authorized a transfer or conveyance; (iii) a document affecting Title not properly created, executed, witnessed, sealed, acknowledged, notarized, or delivered; (iv) failure to perform those acts necessary to create a document by electronic means authorized by law; (v) a document executed under a falsified, expired, or otherwise invalid power of attorney; (vi) a document not properly filed, recorded, or indexed in the Public Records including failure to perform those acts by electronic means authorized by law; or (vii) a defective judicial or administrative proceeding."

Covered Risks

All or most of the issues listed in Covered Risk 2(a) will typically cause the conveyance to fail, which would also invoke Covered Risk 1, the vesting of title coverage. To that extent, the term defect in Covered Risk 2(a) overlaps the vesting of title assurance found in Covered Risk 1. However, the principal coverage in Covered Risk 2 is against liens and encumbrances on title. Courts have put the label of title defect on a number of issues, at least some of which would be better categorized as encumbrances on title.[126] If the term defect is understood to mean something that burdens the insured's title, without divesting that title, the use of the term defect in Covered Risk 2 is logical. Also, because Covered Risk 2(a) protects against a title defect caused by "fraud," the policy has been found to protect against fraudulent conduct by others that could render the insured's title to be defective.[127]

The vesting covered risk is invoked only if another party asserts a claim of ownership that is adverse to the insured's title.[128] A trespasser, by definition, does not attack the insured's title. Thus, the title insurance policy does not protect against trespass. See §9.3 regarding trespass generally, and §12.2.3 regarding trespass and the possession exception. The policy also does not protect against [126] In Old Republic Nat'l Title Ins. Co. v. RM Kids, LLC, ___ Ga.App. ___, 835 S.E.2d 21 (Ga.App. 2019), the policy did not contain an exception for a recorded notice advising that oil had leaked into the groundwater below the surface of part of the insured property. The court found an ambiguity in the policy because the terms "defect" and "encumbrance" were not defined. The court held that title was defective. It supported that ruling with this statement: "Indeed, as Old Republic's counsel acknowledged in its reply brief and at oral argument before this Court, an easement can be a title defect." The court refused to follow the numerous prior decisions holding that environmental contamination is a physical condition that does not affect title, finding this case distinguishable because of the recorded notice that was not excepted. There was no assertion in the case that the insured was not the owner of the property, or that the title conveyed to it was defective. In Loflin v. BMP Development, LP, 427 S.C. 580, 832 S.E.2d 294 (S.C.App. 2019), the insureds received a Residential policy. They contracted to buy a vacant lot in a new subdivision before the plat was final. The size of the lot was specified in their contract. The plat was recorded and the policy issued, with the recorded plat depicting the lot with the expected size and configuration. Four years later, however, the developer informed the insureds that, in his opinion, they owned a smaller lot as depicted on an unrecorded amended plat. The court held that the developer's attack on title created a title defect.

[127] In Loflin v. BMP Development, LP, 427 S.C. 580, 832 S.E.2d 294 (S.C.App. 2019), the insureds received a Residential policy. They contracted to buy a vacant lot in a new subdivision before the plat was final. The size of the lot was specified in their contract. The plat was recorded and the policy issued, with the recorded plat depicting the lot with the expected size and configuration. Four years later, however, the developer informed the insureds that, in his opinion, they owned a smaller lot as depicted on an unrecorded amended plat. The court held that the policy might protect the insureds against the developer's claim that the insureds own the lot as revised, because Covered Risk 3 of the Residential policy protects against fraud. The court said the term "incompetency" might also apply, because the insureds asserted that the developer recorded the wrong plat, suggesting that he was incompetent as a real estate developer. However, in Mortazavi v. Federal Ins. Co., 2019 WL 2609779 (Cal.App. 4 Dist.) (unpublished), the insured former owner was sued by his purchaser for various claims concerning encroaching structures he had built while he was the owner, including a claim for fraud. The court held that the term fraud in Covered Risk 2 is not invoked when the fraud allegation is made against the insured, citing Moskopoulos. See § 11.2.7 for a complete discussion of the cases holding that there is no coverage for the insured's fraudulent or tortious conduct in the obtaining of title.

[128] In C & G Farms Inc. v. First American Title Ins. Co., 2018 WL 1281847 (Ariz.App. 1 Div.) (unpublished), the insurer owed no duty when the insureds were found to hold good title to the insured property, and no one was attacking that title.

alleged defects in the insured's title that are asserted only by the insured.[129] There also is no coverage for defects in title that have been cured or are barred by law.[130]

The subsections below discuss the most common issues that can cause an insured's title to be divested or defective.

9.2.1 Forgery and Fraud

Forgery is the unauthorized execution of a document in the name of the true owner, and renders the deed void unless saved by a defense such as ratification. Forgery is a significant risk covered by the policy. Sometimes, a group of people conducts a scheme in which many properties are conveyed by forged deeds so that they can be sold or used as collateral for fraudulent loans.[131]

A form of fraud that is closely related to forgery is business identity theft, in which the fraudster purports to act for a company that owns real estate. The fraud often begins with the filing of a change of registered agent, naming the fraudster as the new registered agent, followed by delivery to the title company of a fabricated operating agreement naming the fraudster as the managing member of the company. The fraudster then sells or borrows against the real estate.[132]

Forgery and most of its relatives are "true" title risks that insurers often tout as being covered by the policy.[133] The title insurance policy protects the insured owner or lender against a claim that

In Elm Cabin John, LLC v. United Bank, ___ F.Supp.3d ___, 2019 WL 1755398 (D.Md. 2019) (permanent citation not yet available), a real estate developer filed and delivered documents naming himself as the managing member of an entity that owned vacant land in Maryland. He then borrowed money, giving a lien on the property as collateral. The true sole member of the owner entity, Nancy Long, sued the bank that lent the money, and the court refused to dismiss the complaint, disturbed by the fact that the bank knew that Long was the original sole member of the entity but never spoke to her about the loan.

[133] In fact, the industry's promotion of these risks in marketing material can make it difficult for an insurer to assert even appropriate limitations on these coverages. See Lawyers Title Ins. Corp. v. First Fed. Sav. Bank & Trust, 744 F.Supp. 778 (E.D.Mich. 1990); People's Building & Loan Ass'n v. Safeco Title Ins. Co. of Maryland, 1988 WL 72388, the insured deed or mortgage has been forged. The standard form 1992 and earlier ALTA policies do not insure against these risks by name. Rather, forgery and other issues that would divest the insured of title are encompassed by Covered Risk 1, which indemnifies in the event that title is not vested in the insured as shown in the policy. The 2006 ALTA policies, by contrast, protect against a "defect in the Title caused by forgery, fraud, undue influence, duress, incompetency, incapacity, or impersonation..." Covered Risk 2(a)(i), 2006 ALTA owner's policy. The 2006 ALTA loan policy also protects against forgery and related risks that would cause the owner's title to be void. Covered Risks 2(a)(i) and 9(a). Similarly, the Residential owner's policy protects against defects in title caused by "[f]orgery, fraud, duress, incompetency, incapacity or impersonation."[134] The Homeowner's policy provides assurances against claims of others affecting title arising out of "forgery or impersonation" or "fraud, duress, incompetency or incapacity."[135]

The policy protects against forgery and related defects that would divest the insured of title,[136] or that would void the insured mortgage.[137] The measure of loss for a forgery is the insured's actual loss, not policy limits.[138]

The coverage does not assure against forgeries that do not affect the vesting of title or validity of the insured mortgage, such as the non-title transaction documents. Thus, the policy does not insure that the note creating the underlying debt is valid and not forged.[139] If the note is forged, rendering the mortgage unenforceable, the forgery of the debt instrument alone does not invoke coverage. See §9.10. Conversely, there is no loss if the mortgage is valid, and an otherwise unenforceable note can be enforced by ratification, estoppel, unjust enrichment or some other theory.[140]

Forgeries and fraud committed by the insured also are not covered. Such situations fall under Exclusions 3(a) or 3(b). See §11.2.7 regarding fraud in the procurement of title and related matters, and §11.3.5 as to Exclusion 3(b) and the lender's knowledge of fraud or forgery by the borrower.

[140] Id.

In most cases of forgery, impersonation and fraud, there are victims who are not insureds. The policy provides no protection to those non-insureds other than whatever serendipitous effects may flow from policy coverage to the insured. The insurer owes no duty to the non-insured forgery victim.[141]

Policy coverage must be in place before the insurer is liable for damages caused by the forgery. Forgery detection is a key claims-prevention education subject.[142] When the insurer detected a forgery on the deed to be insured before the policy was issued, the insurer had the right to a judgment declaring that it was not obligated to issue the policy. The forged instrument was found not to satisfy the commitment requirement of a deed "to be executed by" the sellers, since one of the sellers did not in fact execute the deed.[143] Also, when a title insurance commitment was altered by the perpetrators to vest title in a party to their conspiracy as part of a loan fraud, and the mortgage was not recorded, the insurer had no obligation to issue the policy, and there was no claim payable.[144]

There is no claim payable as to a forgery that does not cause the insured's claimed loss. When the insured held a second mortgage claimed to be a forgery, but the insured lien was wiped out by foreclosure of the superior mortgage, the claimed forgery was "immaterial" and no compensable loss was suffered by the insured lender.[145] There is no loss payable when the insured's claim of a forgery is unsupported, or is contrary to a finding by a court.[146]

Ohio) (unpublished), which held that the person claiming that her signature on a deed was forged was not entitled to sue the insurer on a policy issued to the grantee, because the grantor was not an insured and the insurer owed her no duty. Slip Op. 06153 (N.Y.A.D. 2 Dept. 2017), a property owner sued a title insurer for aiding the sale of his property by a forged deed. The court dismissed the action based on the statute of limitations and did not address the question of whether or not the owner has a right to sue the buyer's title insurer.

9.2.2 Impersonation

FORM 88, Appendix A
Loan policy does not protect against impersonation

The ALTA title insurance policies did not identify impersonation as a defect in title for which the policy provides coverage until the 2006 ALTA policies, which list impersonation as a defect in title under Covered Risk 2(a)(i) along with forgery, fraud, undue influence, duress, incompetency or incapacity.

Impersonation is the act of pretending to be a different person. Impersonation is more than the use of an assumed name, because an impersonator is pretending to be a different but real person. False impersonation is the term commonly used to refer to impersonation conducted with the intent to use the other person's credit or other credentials for illegal gain.

When a person impersonates the true owner to convey or mortgage property owned by that party, the deed or mortgage given by the impersonator does not convey good title, because the impersonator lacks actual authority to act on behalf of the true owner.[147] This type of impersonation falls under Covered Risk 2(a)(i) of the 2006 ALTA policies. The issue in this type of impersonation is the lack of authority to act for an entity or person. This coverage is thus essentially synonymous with another risk identified in the same Covered Risk 2, for "failure of any person or Entity to have authorized a transfer or conveyance."

There is a different type of impersonation involving title to real estate, however, that does not invoke policy coverage. When a person comes into title using the name of another real person, or a fictitious name, the conveyance is not void. Title is held by the impersonator, despite the fact that the person has used another's name and that act may be a fraud on the person whose name was used. Thus, a mortgage granted by a person who took title in the name of another is valid and enforceable, despite the fact that the mortgagor took title in the name of another real person or a fictitious or assumed name.[148]

The 1992 and earlier ALTA policies did not contain an assurance concerning impersonation. Courts found that earlier versions of the title insurance policy did not to protect against an [147] In GO Properties, LLC v. BER Enterprises, LLC, 112 N.E.3d 200 (Ind.App. 2018), a person pretended to be the managing member of a limited liability company in conveying real estate owned by the entity by changing the registered agent and issuing fake resolutions. That deed was declared to be void, rendering the deed to the next buyer void also. The court used title insurance underwriting memos describing this type of entity authority fraud to show that a prudent title agent would have done more than rely on the impersonator's own claim to be a representative of the selling LLC. In recent years, title insurers have paid numerous claims involving total failure of title when a person has purported to sell or mortgage property on behalf of the owner entity, but the actor had no authority to do so. See Southern Title Ins. Corp. v. Syed Rizwan Mohiuddin (In re Mohiuddin), ___ B.R. ___, 2017 WL 2123870 (Bkcy.S.D.Tex.-Houston 2017) (permanent citation not yet available), which emanated from just such a fraud.

[148] In Howard v. Fidelity Nat'l Title Ins. Co., 2015 WL 5021768 (E.D.Mo. 2015) (unpublished), Mr. Howard took title to property and mortgaged it. When the lenders sought to foreclose and to pursue the real Mr. Howard for the loan debt, under the note, he asserted in filed pleadings that he had no knowledge of the loans and had been the victim of identity theft. However, after the lenders foreclosed and extinguished Mr. Howard's title, he sued the title insurer for his "loss" of title. The court found that Howard could not assert a policy loss, and that Exclusion 3(a) barred any such claim.

impersonation that did not cause title to be defective.[149] Thus, when a party took title and later mortgaged it using an assumed name, the insured mortgage was not rendered invalid and there was no loss under the policy.[150] Similarly, in Brucha Mortgage Bankers Corp. v. Nations Title Ins. of New York, Inc.,[151] Brucha Mortgage Bankers gave a mortgage loan to a borrower who "falsely represented his identity." The court did not explain whether the borrower assumed a fictitious name or impersonated a real person with good credit. The loan went into default, and then the lender discovered that the property had also been appraised for more than value. The lender foreclosed and took title without protest from the borrower. Brucha then sued Nations Title on the theory that the policy protected the lender against the borrower's use of a false identity. The appeals court gave the insurer summary judgment. The court noted cases holding that a lender has a title policy claim only to the extent that its security is impaired and to the extent of the resulting loss which it sustains. Therefore, the court said:

> [I]nasmuch as a valid title was transferred, and [Brucha] received a valid and enforceable first mortgage lien on the property, as evidenced by its ability to successfully foreclose, the defendant satisfied its obligations under the policy (see, Citibank v. Chicago Title Ins. Co., supra, at 222, 632 N.Y.S.2d 779).[152]

The court found that the successful foreclosure was evidence that the validity of the mortgage had not been disputed. The fact that the lender's security was worth less than it expected also did not create coverage, because the policy does not insure that the security for the loan is equal to the loan amount. Impersonation was also found not to be a covered title defect, on very similar facts, in Home American Credit, Inc. v. Investors Title Ins. Co.[153] In that case, the perpetrator apparently took title in the name of a deceased person, Ms. Aud, then used her credit and a phony appraisal to obtain a loan for more than the property's real value. As in Brucha, the lender received no contest in its foreclosure action. The court said:

> The essence of the suit and claim for title insurance by Home American is that the transfer of a valid deed to real property to an impersonator does not suffice, that the subject deed was never delivered to the "real" Aud, that title has not vested in Ms. Aud, that Home American's lien on the real property is invalid and unenforceable, > and that consequently Home American alleges the deed of trust lien on the property is invalid and unenforceable so that Home American cannot foreclose. However, on inspection of the record and a close review of the title insurance agreement between the parties, the court finds that there is no adverse claim against title by the prior owners of the property and no loss to the lender as a result of any title problem. Title insurance, which "operates to protect the purchaser or mortgagee against defects or encumbrances on title which are in existence at the time the insured takes his title," Mortgage Corp. v. Insurance Co., 299 N.C. 369, 374, 261 S.E.2d 844, 847 (1980), is irrelevant to the issue at hand, and a suit by a lender against the title insurance company is inappropriate.[154]

Thus, if the insured lender is able to foreclose the insured mortgage and take title without challenge, the coverage is not invoked because no defect in title results from the impersonation.

Impersonation is sometimes an element of a loan fraud scheme, in which the impersonator applies for a loan in the name of a real person who has good credit.[155] Such an impersonation scheme is often a facet of fraudulent property flipping.[156] Loan fraud involving impersonation was illustrated in First American Title Ins. Co. v. Vision Mortgage Corp.[157] In that case, the perpetrators stole the identity of a person named Zarifian. The property was then conveyed to Zarifian, and someone impersonated Zarifian as a borrower in a falsified loan. Baker ex rel. Hall Brake Supply, Inc. v. Stewart Title & Trust of Phoenix, Inc.[158] is another illustration of an impersonation scam. In that case, attorney Ben Friedman convinced scores of people to invest millions of dollars in limited partnerships he formed. Friedman bought land under assumed names, sometimes using the identities of real people. In each case, Friedman purchased property from legitimate sellers at market prices, and resold the property to the partnerships at inflated prices. Friedman used the partnership's own money to purchase from the legitimate sellers, and kept the resale profit. The defrauded parties were the partnership investors. A similar flipping operation was the source of the dispute in Mark [155] One article outlined three common flipping schemes. In the first variant, the perpetrator buys the property in a legitimate transaction. Then he obtains an inflated appraisal and borrows as much as possible from a mortgage lender in reliance on the phony appraised value. The participants split the "profit" (the loan proceeds) and, typically, walk away from the real estate. In the second scam, the perpetrator leases desirable property short-term and moves in. He then assumes the owner's identity and mortgages the property. The third scheme noted in the article is for a mortgagor to forge a satisfaction of his own mortgage, and then obtain a new loan. There are other variations as well, such as the vacation scam, in which the perpetrator forges a deed from the true owner to himself and takes possession while the true owner is on vacation, then sells the property to a legitimate buyer. Wilburn, Current Scams, Condell Private Letter, March 13, 1997, p. 14. Flip transactions are further discussed at §13.9.3.
